The HISTORY of the ARABS, to the taking of BAGHDAD by the TARTARS.

SECT. LIV.

- ^a AL MOSTADI'S death was no sooner publicly known, than Dhabîro'ddîn Ebn Al Nâser Ledini'llah Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed Ebn Al Mostadi is created Khalîf. Al Attâr, the Wazîr, by his activity and address, prevailed upon the grandees of the court, and the principal citizens of Baghdâd, to take the oath of allegiance to Al Nâser Ledini'llah Abu'l Abbâs Ahmed, his son. That prince was, therefore, inaugurated in form, and universally acknowledged Khalîf. After the ceremony of inauguration was over, Al Nâser conferred the post of master of the palace and judge of the empire upon Majdo'ddîn Abu'l Fadl Ebn Al Sâbeb; who, arrogating to himself the supreme authority, caused the Wazîr to be first put under an arrest in his own house, and afterwards to be conducted to Al Tâj, a place belonging to the imperial palace at Baghdâd, where he was thrown into irons. Not content with this, Majdo'ddîn forced him to deliver up all his wealth and substance into his hands; and, as two of the best Arab historians seem plainly enough to intimate, at last ordered him to be put to death. On Wednesday, the 12th of Dhu'lkaada, in the night, his body was carried by a common porter out of Al Tâj into the street; when the mob immediately rose, took it off the porter's shoulders by force, tied a cord about the privities, and dragged it through the city of Baghdâd. Then they put an old spoon, covered with ordure, into one of the defunct Wazîr's hands, to represent a pen; and said, "Sign us, O lord and master, the patent that we want." After these and many other indignities offered the corps of the unhappy minister, it was wrested out of the hands of the mob, and decently interred. The unparalleled barbarity of the populace on this occasion was the more remarkable, as the Wazîr was an excellent governor, a person of great temperance, probity, and honour, and had never injured any one either in his property or reputation. This, therefore, is a most flagrant instance, and convincing proof, of the more than brutal disposition of the lower sort of people at Baghdâd, the capital of the Moslem empire, when Al Nâser Ledini'llah, the thirty-fourth Khalîf of the house of Al Abbâs, ascended the throne^a.

In the 576th year of the Hejra, beginning May 28th, 1180, the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledini'llah sent the patent of investiture, the Kaftân of Soltân, and other ensigns of royalty, to The most remarkable transactions of the year 576.

Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb; constituting him, by those presents, prime minister, Emir Al Omrà, or Soltân. The defeat he received from the Franks, in 573, together with the plague and famine that raged the following year, had prevented that prince from undertaking any enterprize of moment before the year 576. But being now solicited for succours by Kilij Arslân, the Seljukian Soltân of Al Rûm, who sent ambassadors to him for that purpose; he led a powerful army to his assistance against Ebn Lâûn or Ebn Leon, the Armenian, and advanced to Karâ Hifâr, where he incamped. Having been joined by the forces of Aleppo, in conformity to one of the articles of the treaty concluded some time before with the Sâheb of that place, between Babnesa and the castle of Mansûr; he penetrated into the Armenian territories, ravaged a considerable part of them, took and demolished Ebn Lâûn's principal fortress, and obliged him to submit to an accommodation with Kilij Arslân upon the terms he thought fit to prescribe. Nay, if Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd may be depended upon, he effected by the terror of his arms a general pacification amongst the neighbouring princes, in which the Sâhebs of Al Mawfel and Diyâr Becr were included. Abu'lfeda, however, gives a different account of this expedition. He informs us, that Salâb'addîn marched against Kilij Arslân, the Sâheb of Belâd Al Rûm, and pitched his camp at Ra'bân. But, continues he, having afterwards entered into an alliance with Kilij Arslân, the Soltân made an irruption into the provinces subject to Ebn Lâûn, the Armenian, and laid waste the country through which he moved with fire and sword. Whereupon Ebn Lâûn, terrified by Salâb'addîn's devastations, sent him a large sum of money, and released all the Moslem prisoners he had taken; which so pleased the Soltân, that he immediately granted him a peace. In the month of Al Moharram, 'Azzo'ddin Kilij rebelled against Al Mâlec Al Sâleb, and set up for himself at Tel Kbâled in the territory of Aleppo; upon which, Al Sâleb sent a body of troops to reduce him. As we have not been told any thing farther of this rebel by the Arab writers, he was probably forced to lay down his arms. The third of Safar, this year, died of a consumption Saifo'ddin Gâzi Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel and Al Diyâr Al Jazîra, after he had reigned ten years, and three months; being about thirty years old, at the time of his decease. He was a prince of a beautiful aspect, perfect stature, and a fair complexion. He was also prudent, just, and abstemious; though jealous to such a degree, that he would suffer none but eunuchs that were boys to be with his women, dismissing them as soon as they grew up. He never fleeced his subjects, nor even so much as touched their property; though, on some occasions, he discovered signs of an avaricious disposition. He left to his brother 'Azzo'ddin Mas'ûd Ebn Mawdûd all his dominions, except Jazîra Ebn Omar, with the castles erected thereon; which he bequeathed to Sinjâr (A) Shâb, his son. After his death, his will was executed in every particular. This we learn from Abu'lfeda, in the piece so often referred to here; though he assigned to Nâfêro'ddin Cobec, his younger son, Belâd Al Hamîdiya and the castle of Shûsh, according to Abu'l Faraj. In this, however, both authors agree, that Mojâhedo'ddin Kaymâz, his executor, acted with so much prudence, that every thing was settled to the mutual satisfaction of all the parties concerned. The same year, Shamso'ddawla Tûrân Shâb Ebn Ayûb, Salâb'addîn's elder brother, departed likewise this life at Alexandria; the government of which city, together with that of almost the whole kingdom of Al Yaman, which he himself had conquered, this prince had obtained of the Soltân, the preceding year. He was so liberal, or rather profuse, that he did not only spend the immense treasures brought him from Zabîd, 'Aden, and other places in Al Yaman, as well as the money that came annually to his share out of the public revenues of Alexandria, but likewise vast sums that he found himself obliged to borrow, and could never afterwards pay. For, notwithstanding the opulent posts he was possessed of, he died 200,000 Egyptian dinârs in debt; which his brother Salâb'addîn, who returned to Al Kâbirah, in the month of Shaabân, after he had appointed 'Azzo'ddin Farkb Shâb Ebn Shâbînshâb Ebn Ayûb his nephew, the Sâheb of Baalbec, his deputy in Syria, or Al Shâm, very honourably paid. Tûrân Shâb is said to have been a great warrior, though this has been denied by some writers, but at the same time insolent, libidinous, addicted to drunkenness, cruel, and rapacious, to the last degree^b.

(A) Though we have followed the original Arabic of Abu'lfeda, in the orthography of this proper name; yet it ought, if we are not greatly mistaken, to be written Sanjar, that being a Turkish proper name which frequently occurs in the Arab writers. Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnah puts this point beyond dispute (1).

- a THE following year, being the 577th of the Hejra, commencing May 17th, 1181, Al and of the year
 far from the confines of Syria, formed a design to make himself master of the city of Medina, and all the territory appertaining to it. Of which 'Azzo'ddîn Farkh Shâh, the governor of Damascus, having received advice; he assembled a body of troops, penetrated into the district of Al Carac, and ravaged a considerable part of it. This obliged Al Bornas to stay at home for the defence of his own dominions, and lay aside all thoughts of the intended expedition. The same year, dissensions reigned amongst the lieutenants left by Tûrân Shâh, the brother of Salâh'addîn, in Al Yaman; insomuch that the Soltân was forced to send an army, under the command of some of his most experienced generals, into that country, to reduce them.
- b 'Azzo'ddîn Othmân, who had been appointed by Tûrân Shâh to preside over the people of Aden, and Hettân Ebn Câmel Ebn Monkad Al Kenâni, the governor of Zabîd, whose family had formerly reigned at Sbaizar, being therefore subdued by the Soltân's forces; a calm immediately ensued, and the public tranquillity was restored in every part of that opulent region. This year, died at Aleppo of the colic Al Mâlec Al Sâleb, the son of Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of that place; being about nineteen years old, at the time of his demise. He was seized with a violent fit of that distemper the ninth of Rajeb; obliged the grandees of his court to take the oath to his cousin 'Azzo'ddîn Mas'ûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, as his successor, the thirteenth; and expired in the citadel of Aleppo, the twenty-fifth of the same month. He was chaste, abstinent, and religious; and
- c not in the least tainted with any of those vices, to which youth have generally so strong a propension. During his last illness, the physicians ordered him to drink a little wine, apprehending that might be good for his distemper; but, out of a principle of religion, he chose to die rather than taste it. He was no sooner dead, than the officers of state dispatched a courier to 'Azzo'ddîn Mas'ûd at Al Mawfel to inform him, that the city and district of Aleppo had been bequeathed him by Al Mâlec, Al Sâleb, and that his subjects there impatiently expected to see him. Upon which, he soon after set out for Aleppo, in company with Mojâbedo'ddîn Kaymâz, to take the government into his hands; lest Salâh'addîn might be induced, by his absence, to attempt possessing himself of that place. However, by Kaymâz's advice, he agreed to exchange Aleppo for Senjar, 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd, the Sâheb of the latter of those cities; which, being at no great distance from Al Mawfel,
- d was much more defensible, and tenable with his Mesopotamian dominions, than the other. 'Azzo'ddîn having sent before him Modbaffero'ddîn Ebn Zîno'ddîn, one of his generals, and the prefect of Sarûj, who reached Aleppo, with a person appointed to swear the principal inhabitants, the 3d of Sbaabân; he arrived there himself, and occupied all Al Mâlec Al Sâleb's treasures, deposited in the citadel, the 20th of the same month. He also married Al Sâleb's mother, the 5th of Shawâl; and then, having left his son and Modbaffero'ddîn Ebn Zîno'ddîn with a sufficient garrison in the castle, he departed from Aleppo, and had an interview with his brother 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd at Al Rakka upon the Euphrates, where a convention relative to the above-mentioned exchange between them was signed.
- e This happened, on the 21st of Shawâl. Whereupon one of 'Azzo'ddîn's officers was admitted into Senjar, with a detachment of that prince's troops; and the town and citadel of Aleppo were delivered up to 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd, who entered the latter of those places, in consequence of this cession, the 13th of Al Mobarram, 578. Some authors relate, that an ambassador from the Greek emperor arrived now at Al Kâbirab, and brought about a peace between his master and the Soltân. They also give us farther to understand, that Salâh'addîn concluded a truce, or temporary cessation of arms, with the count of Tri-poli; and that the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledînî'llah himself aspired at the sovereignty of Aleppo, in vain, before the close of the year that we are now upon.
- f THE next year, being the 578th of the Hejra, which began May 7th, 1182, on the 5th Salâh'addîn of Al Mobarram, Salâh'addîn Yûsef Ebn Ayûb set out from Al Kâbirab (B) for Damascus; returns from where he arrived, according to Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the 17th of Safar, or, if Abu'lfeda Egypt to Da- may be credited, the 11th of that month. Soon after his arrival there, he undertook an ex- mafcus.

(B) We are told both by Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnah, that when Salâh'addîn was upon the point of beginning his march for Syria, and the grandees of the court, together with a vast croud of people, were assembled to take their leave of him, several poets appeared, with the valedictory verses they had composed upon the occasion. Amongst these, according to those authors, there was one, then preceptor to some of the Soltân's children; who, stepping out of the croud, spoke a distich to the following effect. "Enjoy the odour of the sweet-smelling camomile, whilst it is fragrant. O! how great is the difference between the common herbs and the camomile!" Which words were no sooner uttered, than the Soltân's countenance, before full of joy, was clouded with grief; that prince considering them as ominous, and being therefore not a little affected with them. All the company likewise then present, sympathizing with him, were thrown into confusion by pedition against Bayrūt, or Beyrūt, the Berytus of the antients, and laid siege to that place; ^a but without effect. Upon his return to Damascus, he was informed, that the Sāheb of Al Mawfel had sent an embassy to the Franks, in order to solicit their assistance, and instigate them to a rupture with him. Whereupon he came to a resolution to chastise that prince, for his infraction of the late treaty, and even to make himself master, if possible, of his capital; that the Moslems, being united under one chief, might be thereby enabled to act more vigorously against the Franks. 'Amādo'ddīn Zenki Ebn Mawdūd, the Sāheb of Aleppo, having received intelligence of the Soltān's design, and of his great military preparations, dispatched an express to Al Mawfel, to apprise his brother 'Azzo'ddīn Mas'ūd Ebn Mawdūd of the storm that was gathering, and to advise him to put himself in a posture of defence without delay. In the mean time, Salāb'addīn with a numerous army presented himself before Aleppo; and, on the 18th of the former Jomāda, invested that city. For the space of three days, he briskly attacked the place; but being repulsed with very considerable loss, he found himself obliged to draw off, the 21st of that month, and retire towards the Euphrates. After which he advanced to Harrān, and entered into an alliance with Modbaffero'ddīn, the Sāheb of that place; who, being afraid of the growing power of the Sāheb of Al Mawfel, for his future security, judged it proper to join his arms to those of the Soltān. Strengthened by this alliance, Salāb'addīn reduced the cities of Al Robā, Al Rakka, Nasībīn, and Sarīj. He also placed a commandant in Al Khābūr, and marched at the head of his army to Al Mawfel; incamping before that capital, the 11th of Rajeb. The Sāheb and people of Al Mawfel, finding themselves in this distressed situation, applied both to the Khalīf Al Nāser Ledinī'llah and Mohammed Pebelawān for succours; but without success, ^c neither of those princes being inclined to imbroil themselves with the Soltān. However, Salāb'addīn having spent several days ineffectually in making his utmost efforts to carry the place (C), he was forced to abandon the siege. This did not discourage him from sitting down before Sinjār, or Senjār, the 16th of Sbaabān; which, at last, after reiterated assaults, he took by storm, the 2d of Ramadān. The garrison, which was pretty numerous, commanded by Sbarfo'ddīn Ebn Kotbo'ddīn, a detachment of the Soltān's troops, by his order, escorted to Al Mawfel. Having left his nephew Takīo'ddīn, with a sufficient force, at Senjār, he directed his march towards Nasībīn; which, after having sustained a short siege, together with its citadel, had before surrendered to him. Nasībīn, with the territory be- ^d longing to it, he had given to Abu'l Hījā, an Emīr that generally attended him in his expeditions; but, for what reason we have not been told, deprived him of it, towards the close of the campaign. It appears from Abu'lfeda, that the Soltān, who began to move from Damascus, in the former Rabī, ravaged the country about Bānīās, or Paneas, Jānīn, and Al Gaur; putting many of the Franks, that he met with there, to the sword, and carrying with him out of that tract no small quantity of spoil. To which he adds, that having afterwards passed the Euphrates at Bīr, or Bīra, Salāb'addīn did not only draw Modbaffero'ddīn Ebn Zīno'ddīn, the Sāheb of Harrān, into a confederacy with him, but likewise prevailed upon Nūro'ddīn Mohammed Ebn Karā Arslān, the Sāheb of Hesn, or Hisn, Caifā, to follow his example; that, besides the places above-mentioned in Mesopotamia, he subdued ^e Karkīsīa, Mākesīn, and 'Arbān; that he appointed Jasīy'a, one of his officers, to command in Al Khābūr; and that he battered Al Mawfel with his military engines in such a terrible manner, that he shook the whole city. However, continues this writer, the artillery of the besieged being superior to that of the Soltān; he was obliged to raise the siege, and retire. Salāb'addīn himself, during the time of his incampment before the town, was posted on a spot opposite to the gate of Cunda, the Sāheb of Hesn Caifā at the gate of the Bridge, and by the unexpected event. And, in conformity to the poet's prediction, continue the aforesaid writers, Salāb'addīn never afterwards returned to Egypt; for which reason, they have assigned this accident a place amongst the remarkable occurrences of the present year (1).

(C) It appears from Abu'l Faraj, that the garrison of Al Mawfel, which consisted of horse as well as foot, was at this time extremely numerous; and that Salāb'addīn, as well as the principal officers of his army, was struck with a sort of terror, when he first appeared before the place. To which he adds, that this seemed to be heightened by an accident; which, in itself, was rather matter of ridicule. In a sally, made, as it should seem, by a party of the garrison, a common soldier, taking off one of his shoes, full of iron nails, after he had uttered much opprobrious language against the Soltān, struck Jāwālī Al Asadi, the chief and commander of the Asadites, with it upon the breast; and that with such force, that he grievously wounded him. The Mawfelites being beaten back into the town; and the shoe taken from the person to whom it belonged, Jāwālī brought it to Salāb'addīn, saying, "The Mawfelites treat us with such contempt, by attacking us with old shoes, as we never met with before; I will, therefore, not be any farther concerned in this siege." Whereupon the Soltān, finding that the people of Al Mawfel entertained not the least apprehension of him, and that he could not make himself master of their city, immediately decamped, marched to Senjār, and possessed himself of that place (2).

a Tāj Al Molūc, Salāb'addīn's brother, at the gate of Al 'Amādi. The siege was pushed on with surprizing vigour through the whole course of the month of Rajeb; notwithstanding which, the city being defended by a numerous garrison, as well as amply furnished with provisions and warlike stores, the Soltān found the reduction of it impracticable, and therefore drew off to Senjār, where he met with the success already mentioned here^d.

THE Sāheb of Al Mawfel's affairs at this juncture wearing a very indifferent aspect, he sent an embassy to the Sāheb of Akhlāt in Armenia, in order to solicit succours of that prince; who thereupon moved from Akhlāt, at the head of a considerable body of troops, to his assistance. He first advanced to Khorzem, and from thence dispatched a courier to Al Mawfel, to inform 'Azzo'ddīn Mas'ūd Ebn Mawdūd of his approach. The Armenian forces soon after joined the troops of Al Mawfel and Aleppo, as well as those of the Sāheb of Māredīn, one of 'Azzo'ddīn Mas'ūd Ebn Mawdūd's allies; after which junction, the combined army made the proper dispositions for taking the field. But, before the confederates entered upon action, the prince of Akhlāt sent Boḥtemar, or Baḥtamar, to the Soltān, with proposals for an accommodation; which being rejected, Salāb'addīn moved towards the Armenian camp, in order to attack it. In the mean time, the Sāheb of Akhlāt having received advice of the Soltān's march, and dreading his superior force; he deserted his allies, and returned home without striking a stroke. This obliged 'Azzo'ddīn Mas'ūd Ebn Mawdūd to fly to Al Mawfel; upon which, the army that was to have acted under his command immediately dispersed. Salāb'addīn, meeting with no enemy to oppose him in the field, presented himself before Amed, or Amida, and formed the siege of that place; which, after it had been battered by the Soltān eight days, surrendered to him, the 1st of Al Moharram, the following year. The city itself he made a present of to Nūro'ddīn Ebn Karā Aḥṣān, but the riches and valuable spoil acquired by this conquest he gave to Ebn Nisān. With the reduction of Amed, according to the Moslem writer now before me, the Soltān concluded the operations of this glorious campaign^e.

The prince of Akhlāt in Armenia moves to the assistance of the Sāheb of Al Mawfel; but is obliged to retire.

THE same year, Saif Al Islām Tagtakīn, Salāb'addīn's brother, marched with an army into Al Yaman, by the Soltān's command, in order to quell some commotions there. Notwithstanding Hettān Ebn Cāmel Ebn Monkad Al Kenāni, the governor of Zabīd, and 'Azzo'ddīn Othmān Al Zanjili, who presided over the people of 'Aden, had been obliged by the Emīr, sent thither by Salāb'addīn for that purpose, the preceding year, to submit to the Soltān; they had since found means to recover the prefectures they had formerly enjoyed, and render themselves independent on his lieutenant there. This was no sooner done, than the heats and animosities that had formerly subsisted between them revived. Hettān, having been apprized of Saif Al Islām's approach, abandoned Zabīd; and shut himself up in a fortress of great strength, at some distance from that place. Saif Al Islām, however, decoyed him from thence into his hands; and, with no small difficulty, gave him leave to retire into Syria. Having sent his baggage and valuable effects before, he waited upon Saif Al Islām, in order to take his leave of him; when, to his vast surprize, that prince caused him to be put under an arrest, commanded his baggage to be brought back, and seized upon all the wealth he had amassed. Having plundered his palace, Saif Al Islām met with there no less than seventy iron chests full of dinārs; all which he appropriated to his own use, and afterwards confined Hettān in a certain castle, where he at last ended his days. Azzo'ddīn Othmān Al Zanjili, being terrified at Hettān's fate, posted away with the utmost celerity into Syria; having before sent his riches into that country, by sea. But the vessel carrying these being taken by one of Saif Al Islām's ships, all the treasure he had hoarded up fell into that prince's hands. Thus Saif Al Islām appeased all the tumults and commotions in Al Yaman without any effusion of human blood, restored peace to that fertile and delightful tract, and settled seemingly upon a lasting foundation its future repose^f.

THIS year, the Sāheb of Al Carac fitted out a strong fleet on the sea of Aila, or the Red Sea, which he divided into two squadrons, with a proper number of land-forces on board. One of these blocked up Aila, or Ela, by sea; and the other steered its course towards 'Aidāb, as the place of its destination, in order to ravage the maritime coasts of Hejāz, and even, if an opportunity offered, to penetrate as far as Mecca and Medina. As the Franks had never before appeared with a fleet in the Red Sea, the Moslems did not suspect any enterprize of this kind, and consequently had made no preparations to oppose them. But Al Mālec Al 'Adel Abu Becr, Salāb'addīn's brother, the viceroy of Egypt, being informed of their design, in a very short time equipped a considerable fleet on the sea of 'Aidāb, and gave the command of it to Ho-sāmo'ddīn Lūlū, his Hājeb, an officer extremely well versed in naval affairs. Lūlū, who at this time had the sole management and direction of the marine of Egypt, first attacked the squadron that blocked up, or rather besieged, Aila; and, after an obstinate engagement, intirely defeated it, killing and taking prisoners most of the men on board. Then he sailed after the other without delay, and came up with it off Rabig, on the coast of Al Kbourá; upon which, a most fierce and bloody conflict ensued. At last, however, after the most vigorous efforts on both sides had been made, victory declared in favour of the Moslems; who sunk many of the enemy's ships, slew an incredible number of their men, and took most of the rest prisoners. Some of the latter Lílu sent to the valley of Mina, where they were inhumanly butchered; and the remainder to Egypt, where they to a man met with the same fate. We are told, that Arnold; or, as the Arab writers call him, Al Bornas, the Sáheb of Al Carac, actually formed the siege of 'Aidáb, and that he penetrated so far into the province of Hejáx, that he was not above a day's journey off Mecca; but was forced to return on board his ships, for want of water. To which it is farther added, that he put a large number of the Mohammedan pilgrims, or Hadji's, to the sword, threatened the demolition of the temple of Mecca, and spoke of Mohammed himself in very opprobrious terms; which probably occasioned Lílu's cruel treatment of the Christian prisoners that fell into his hands. Be that as it will, the Moslem writers, in the accounts they have handed down to us of this expedition of the Franks, are far from being perfectly agreed. Before the close of the present year, died Farkh Sháh Ebn Shábinsháh Ebn Ayúb, the Sáheb of Baalbec, who had formerly been appointed by Saláb'addin the governor of Damascus. He was brave, liberal, of an excellent disposition, a good poet, and a person in whom the Soltán reposed the most unshaken confidence. Saláb'addin, receiving advice of his death in Mesopotamia, sent from thence Shamso'ddin Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'almálec Al Mokaddem to succeed him at Damascus, and assigned to his son Babráin Sháh the government of Baalbec. The same year, Mas'úd Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mas'úd Al Nisábúri, a Fakih of the sect of Al Sháfe'i, born in the year of the Hejra 505, departed this life likewise at Damascus. This Imám excelled in divine knowledge, and was surnamed Kotbo'ddin, or the axis of religion. He travelled from Nisábúr in Khorasán, the place of his nativity, from whence he was denominated Al Nisábúri, to Damascus, where he composed for the Soltán a sort of creed, or confession of faith, out of which that prince instructed his children in their tender years. About this time, died also Al Sheikh Ahmed Ebn Al Rosá'i of Súad Wáfel, a great and good man, held in universal esteem. His scholars were extremely numerous, and some of them with no small justice afterwards attracted the public regard. We must not forget to remark, that Saláb'addin, in his march from Al Kábirah to Damascus, ravaged part of the territories of the Franks, who endeavoured to dispute his passage through the district of Al Carac, with a body of troops they had assembled there; that this diversion enabled Farkh Sháh to reduce Al Shakif, a fortress in the neighbourhood of Paneas, subject to the Franks, and pillaged the adjacent country; and that the devastations committed by Saláb'addin and Farkh Sháh, in the beginning of the campaign, probably excited the Franks, by way of revenge, to undertake the Arabian expedition^g.

THE 579th year of the Hejra, which commenced April 26th, 1183, proved as favourable as the preceding to the Soltán's arms. The city of Amed in Mesopotamia surrendered to him the 1st of Al Mobarram, after a siege of eight days, as has been already observed. 'Amádo'ddin Zenki Ebn Mawdúd, the Sáheb of Aleppo, about this time, advanced with a body of troops to A'záz, in order to seize upon and pillage that fortress, as he had done before to Caserlâtá, a castle at the foot of mount 'Amila, in the territory of Aleppo; which he had taken by force from Bocmasb, one of Saláb'addin's allies, the 21st of the former Jomáda, the preceding year. He had also attacked Báshar, in the possession of Duldurm Al Yárúki, another of the Soltán's allies; but without effect. These violences, which animated the Franks to make incursions into the Moslem territories, so incensed Saláb'addin, that he resolved to lay siege to Aleppo, and, if possible, possess himself of that place. 'Amádo'ddin receiving intelligence of the Soltán's design, after he had reduced Corzím, a fortress in the district of Aleppo, returned to his capital, and there made the proper dispositions for sustaining a siege. Saláb'addin, in pursuance of the plan he had formed, marched first to Tel Kbáled, a castle at no great distance from Aleppo; which he took, the 22d of Al Mobarram, with very inconsiderable loss. From Tel Kbáled he moved to Aleppo itself, and encamped before that capital, the 26th of the same month. As the Soltán's army was extremely numerous, and he pushed on the siege with the utmost vigour, 'Amádo'ddin Zenki Ebn Mawdúd thought fit to capitulate, about the middle of Safar; and therefore sent Hosámo'ddin Dbimán, as his agent and interpreter, to settle the terms of the capitulation with the Soltán. The principal articles were, that 'Amádo'ddin should be permitted to retire with all his riches and valuable effects; that in lieu of Aleppo, with its castle and dependencies, Saláb'addin should cede to him Sinjár, Násibin, Al Kbábúr, Al Rakka, and Sarúj, in Mesopotamia, most of which places had formerly been subject to him; and that he should be always ready to attend the Soltán at the head of his troops, whenever called upon, without presuming to offer any excuse for his absence. The negotiation, which terminated in this convention, was carried

- a on with so much secrecy, that nothing relative to it transpired before the capitulation was actually signed. After which, 'Azzo'ddin Jordic was sent out of the city to treat with the Soltân, on the part of the people and the troops; whom Salâb'addin took under his protection, when the oath of allegiance had been administered to them, the 17th of Safar, presenting at the same time the principal of them with most sumptuous vests. The 23d, died Tâj Al Molâc, Salâb'addin's brother, of a wound he received in the siege; which overwhelmed the Soltân, who had the most tender regard for him, with grief. The same day, 'Amâdo'ddin evacuated the citadel, paid his duty to Salâb'addin, and was magnificently entertained by that prince in his tent. He also received from the Soltân, as did likewise every one of his companions, a present of a royal Kaftân, or vest, and a beautiful horse. 'Amâdo'ddin having taken the rout of Karâ Hisâr, in his way to Senjâr, or Sinjâr, Salâb'addin took possession of the citadel of Aleppo; where he regaled in a most elegant manner Hosâmo'ddin Dbimân, who had been left by 'Amâdo'ddin to superintend the removal of his effects. The Soltân then ordered a detachment of his troops to reduce Hârem; which being done the 29th of Safar, he repaired to that fortress, and staid there two nights. Having settled every thing there, he returned to Aleppo; where he arrived, the 3d of the former Rabî. He left Ibrahim Ebn Sherwab to command in Hârem, began to move towards Damascus, the 22d of the latter Rabî, and entered that capital, the 3d of the former Jomâda. He did not, however, continue long there. For, on the 8th of the latter Jomâda, he advanced to Al Fawâr; and from thence to Al Kofair, where he pitched his tents for one night. The next morning, by day-break, he passed the ford of Al Kofair, and marched to Beisân; which the inhabitants abandoned at his approach. Having pillaged Beisân, and burnt all the spoil he could not carry off with him, the Soltân moved to Al Jâlût, or 'Ain Al Beisân; from whence he sent a detachment, under the command of 'Azzo'ddin Jordic, to reconnoitre the Franks. That general falling in with a party of the troops of Al Carac and Al Shawbec, a small town on the confines of Al Hejâz, inhabited by Christians, and adorned with many charming gardens, as well as two refreshing fountains, that were advancing to the assistance of the Franks; he attacked them with so much bravery, that they were soon put to the rout, had most of their men killed upon the spot, and about 100 taken prisoners. The Moslems lost only Babrâm Al Shâwawsh in the action, the enemy not making a very vigorous resistance.
- d The Soltân, animated by this first instance of success, drew up his forces in order of battle, and led them against the Franks; who having assembled their whole army at Seforiya, or Sepphoris, the strongest city of Galilee, marched to Al Fawla, and moved from thence towards the Egyptian forces, with an intention to engage them. But finding them more numerous than they at first imagined, and being a little dejected by the bad success they had met with, in the late skirmish, on the 10th of the latter Jomâda, they thought fit afterwards to decline an engagement. Nor could the Soltân, by all the methods he could devise, bring them to a general action. They, therefore, gradually retreated to Al Fawla, after they had lost in one or two smart reinounters a pretty considerable number of men; and from thence retired into their own territories, where they seemed to be apprehensive of a speedy visit from the enemy. But though the Soltân could not force them to a battle, he killed abundance of their men, carried off many with him into captivity, intirely dismantled 'Aferbalâ, Beisân, and Zer'in, three of their strongest towns, laid waste a very large extent of country belonging to them, and concluded the campaign on that side with the reduction of Al Fawâr. Abu'lfeda farther relates, that Salâb'addin presented himself before 'Aintâb, a city occupied by Nâsero'ddin Mohammed, the brother of Al Sheikh Ismael, and Nîro'ddin's treasurer, who had ruled in that place, which was given him by his master, to this time, the present year; and that Nâsero'ddin, by surrendering it to him, became one of the Soltân's favourites, was confirmed in the prefecture he had before enjoyed, and ranked thenceforth amongst the principal commanders of the Egyptian armies. To which he adds, that this happened before Aleppo was invested by Salâb'addin's troops; that 'Amâdo'ddin being fatigued by a long (D) siege, and tired with the importunities of his own officers, exchanged Aleppo for the above-mentioned cities in Mesopotamia; and that the treaty concluded by that prince with Salâb'addin was vastly disagreeable to the people of Aleppo, who could not forbear reproaching him for it in the following opprobrious terms, "O you as! you have sold your new milk for that which is sour." The last of which particulars may likewise be evinced from Abu'l Faraj; who clearly intimates, that the cession of Aleppo and its district to Salâb'addin, for a few villages and open fields, was considered by every one that heard of it as infamous to the last degree. The Soltân was no sooner master of Aleppo, continues Abu'lfeda, than he sent to Serkbac, 'Amâdo'ddin's governor of Hârem, to which post

(D) It seems to be intimated by Abu'l Faraj, that Salâb'addin erected a sort of huts for his troops on mount Jarufân, where he incamped, as an indication of his intention to continue long before the place; which, according to this author, induced 'Amâdo'ddin Zenki Ebn Marvâd, for an equivalent, to surrender it to him (1).

he had been advanced by Al Málec Al Sáleh, and summoned him to surrender that place ; which a he refusing to do, and endeavouring to call in to his assistance the Franks, the garrison mutinied, and delivered him up to Saláb'addín bound. About the same time, the fortress of A'záz submitted to the Soltán ; who sent Al Emír Solimán Ebn Jondar to reside as commandant there.
 Some of the MSS. of Ebn Shobnah give us to understand, that Táj Al Molúc Túri, Saláb'addín's youngest brother, died of a wound in his knee, received before Aleppo, during the operations of the siege ; whilst others assert the mortal wound to have been given by a spear, in his head. But the former of these lessons is the most consonant to the text of Abu'lfeda, which Ebn Shobnah generally follows, and consequently the most likely to be true. The news of that prince's death was brought to the Soltán, when he was in the height of his jollity at a grand entertainment which 'Amádo'ddín Zenki Ebn Mawdúd had prepared for him ; whereupon he ordered him to b be interred, but with a low voice, lest the mirth of the company should be interrupted by that tragical event. However, the loss of this favourite brother so strongly affected him, that he used frequently to say, " The acquisition of Aleppo, purchased by my brother Táj Al Molúc Túri's
 " blood, cost us dear ^h."

SALAH'ADDIN having fixed his son Al Málec Al Dháber, or Al Tháber, Gázi, in the government of Aleppo, and left a sufficient garrison in the castle, as well as at Húrem and A'záz, returned to Damascus. From thence he afterwards advanced to the Jordan, passed that river, laid Beisán in ashes, drove the Franks out of the field, and formed the siege of Al Carac. In order to render this enterprise successful, his brother Al Málec Al 'Adel had joined him with a large c body of the Egyptian troops, the fourth of Sbaabán. But the place being defended by a numerous garrison, about the middle of the same month, he found himself obliged to abandon the siege. Sbarfo'ddín Bargash Al Núri, an officer of distinction, was killed in one of the attacks.
 In the room of Al Málec Al Adel Abu Becr, who had now the government of Aleppo conferred upon him, Takío'ddín Omár Al Modhaffer, the Soltán's nephew, was appointed, the 15th of Sbaabán, to act as viceroy of Egypt. The season being now something advanced, Saláb'addín returned to Damascus, and entered that city, the 24th of the same month. He had not been long in that capital, when he commanded his son Al Málec Al Tháber to leave Aleppo, and repair immediately to Damascus ; who, in obedience to that command, though much against his inclination, set out, with Saifo'ddín Yázcu and Ebn Al 'Amíd, for the latter of those cities, which he reached, the 18th of Shawál, and met with a most gracious reception from the Soltán. d
 This young prince, the best beloved by Saláb'addín of any of his children, was, according to Bobáo'ddín, possessed of the finest intellectual endowments. He was a person of the utmost sagacity, the most ready parts, the quickest apprehension, the greatest application, especially to all affairs of government, and perfectly exact in every point of filial duty. At this time, the famous Sheikh Bedro'ddín, a most celebrated preacher of Baghdád, went, by the Khalíf Al Náser's permission, as ambassador on the part of the Sáheb of Al Mawfel, to the Soltán's court. Mo- bió'ddín Ebn Kemálo'ddín and Bobáo'ddín Ebn Sheddád attended Al Sheikh Bedro'ddín in this legation. But as the Soltán insisted upon the Sáhebs of Arbel, or Arbela, and Al Jazíra being left at liberty either to enter into an alliance with him or the Sáheb of Al Mawfel, which Mo- bió'ddín strenuously opposed, and would consider those princes in no other light than that of c allies of the Sáheb of Al Mawfel, the conferences broke off without success. The ambassadors, therefore, departed from Damascus, without executing the commission they were sent upon.
 However, before the close of this year, embassies came to Saláb'addín from all parts of the world ; and particularly from Sanjar Sháb, the Sáheb of Al Jazíra, and the prince of Arbel, who desired to be admitted into the number of his confederates and friends. Which having obtained, they returned to their respective courts. Al Málec Al 'Adel, the Soltán's brother, paid him a visit, the 4th of Dhu'lbajja, at Damascus ; and, having celebrated the feast called Id Al Korbán, or Id Al Adbá, that is, The feast of the sacrifice, beginning on the 10th of that month, he made the best of his way to Aleppo, from whence he came. This year, 'Azzo'd- dín Mas'úd Ebn Mawdúd deposed Mojábedo'ddín, his prime minister, and put him under arrest. f
 After the cession of the city and territory of Aleppo to Saláb'addín Yusef Ebn Ayúb, Mobío'ddín
Ebn Al Zakki, the Kádi of Damascus, observed in an encomium (E) he wrote upon the Soltán,

(E) It appears from Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shobnah, that this encomium was a poem, written by Mobío'ddín upon the reduction of Aleppo, containing a distich, preserved by them, in praise of the Soltán ; wherein, by a sort of poetical enthusiasm, he says, " Your subjugation of " Aleppo in Safar announces the conquest of Jerusalem by your arms in Ráje." Which prediction, as those authors pretend, was fulfilled by the taking of Jerusalem, the 17th of Ráje, in the year of the Hejra 583 (1).

- a that the conquest of Aleppo in the month of Safar presaged that of Jerusalem in the month of Rajeb; which both Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shobnah look upon as a prediction that was afterwards fulfilled, and for that reason assign it a place amongst the remarkable occurrences of the present year. We must not forget to remark, that Sokmán, or Sakmán, Ebn Tabīro'ddīn Ibrāhīm Ebn Sokmán Al Kotbi, the Shāh Armen, or prince of Akhlāt, died, after he had completed the sixty-fourth year of his age, towards the close of the year that we are now upon. Boṭemar, one of his father's Mamlūks, or slaves, who at that time held Mayyāfūrakīn, hastening to the capital, upon the news of his death, was placed on the throne of Akhlāt, and proclaimed Shāh Armen, in his stead. Here he reigned about ten years, having been cut off in 589, as from the Moslem historians will hereafter more fully appear^{*}.
- b IN the 580th year of the Hejra, beginning April 14th, 1184; Salāb'addīn assembled both the Syrian and Egyptian forces, in order to attempt once more the reduction of Al Carac; and appointed Nūro'ddīn Ebn Karā Arslān, who came with Al Mālec Al' Adel to Damascus, towards the close of the former Rabī, to command the troops to be employed in that expedition. Upon their arrival, they met with a most gracious reception from the Soltān, who was just recovered from an illness, that had confined him to his apartment for some time. Al Mālec Al Modbaffer reached Damascus, from Egypt, the 19th of the latter Rabī, bringing his family, and all his treasures, along with him. Nūro'ddīn Ebn Karā Arslān, having been reinforced by the Mesopotamian troops, advanced to Al Carac; and, according to Bobāo'ddīn, invested that place, the 4th of the former Ṣomāda. He soon after began to play upon it with the military engines he had brought with him, and attacked it with the utmost vigour. The Franks, receiving advice, that the Moslems had opened the campaign with the siege of Al Carac, marched to Al Wālib, a place not far from that fortress, and there incamped. As Al Carac in a great measure cut off the communication between Syria and Egypt, Salāb'addīn was determined at all events, if possible, to carry it; and, therefore, moving towards them, posted himself at Mā' Ain, in the neighbourhood of Al Wālib, where he made the necessary dispositions for an engagement, being resolved, if an opportunity offered, to give them battle. But finding this impracticable, and being informed, that the Franks, who decamped from Mā' Ain, the 26th of the former Ṣomāda, had thrown a body of fresh troops into Al Carac; he abandoned the lower town, which Nūro'ddīn Ebn Karā Arslān had taken, and immediately raised the siege. However, after having harassed the enemy's rear, he penetrated into Palestine, took Nāblos, or Naplosa, the Neapolis and Sichem, or Shechem, of the antients, ravaged the neighbouring tract, put many of the inhabitants to the sword, and carried a vast number of them with him into captivity. He also possessed himself of Jānīn, or Jinīn, a little town between Nāblos and Beisān, near the banks of the Jordan; and penetrated to Sebastiya, or Sebaste, where John the Baptist's remains are supposed to have been deposited. Here he released some Moslem prisoners, who had been thrown into irons by the Franks. He was not, however, able to reduce to his obedience the two castles of Nāblos. After this, he returned to Damascus, where he made his public entry, the 7th of the latter Ṣomāda; being accompanied by Al Mālec Al' Adel and Nūro'ddīn Ebn Karā Arslān, who had attended him in this expedition. The same month, an ambassador from the Khalīf Al Nūser Ledīnī'llah arrived at Damascus from Baghdād, waited upon Salāb'addīn, and brought him a royal vest, or the Kaštān of Soltān. Salāb'addīn's brother, his son Asado'ddīn, and Nūro'ddīn Ebn Karā Arslān were also honoured by the Khalīf, before the close of the month, with a similar present. About this time, an embassy came to the Soltān from Ebn Zīno'ddīn, with the news of an irruption made by Mojābedo'ddīn Kāymāz, with the army of Al Mawṣel, reinforced by the troops of Kozul, into the district of Arbel; soliciting succours of him, that Ebn Zīno'ddīn might be thereby enabled to drive the enemy out of his dominions. Mojābedo'ddīn had incamped before Arbel, and laid waste a considerable part of the adjacent territory with fire and sword. Notwithstanding which, Ebn Zīno'ddīn had routed that general, and obliged him to retire from Arbel, in the most precipitate manner, with considerable loss¹.
- f THE same year, died Kotbo'ddīn Ebn Aylgāzi Ebn Nojmo'ddīn Alebbi Ebn Tamartāsh, of the house of Artak, or Ortok, the Sāheb of Māredīn; and was succeeded by Hosāmo'ddīn Yulak Arslān, his son. As Hosāmo'ddīn was an infant, at the time of his father's death, Shāh Armen, the Sāheb of Khālāt, or Akhlāt, Kotbo'ddīn's uncle, took upon him the government of Miredin, and placed Nodbâmo'ddin Al Takasb, with his son, at the head of the administration there. Nodbâmo'ddin, being an upright and religious person, took care to give the child a good education, and married his mother. But finding Hosâmo'ddin, when he advanced towards manhood, to labour under a great defect of common sense, and not fit, on account of his levity, to be placed at the helm; he continued himself in the management and direction of public affairs, until the young prince's death. Hosâmo'ddin had a younger brother, named Kolbo'ddin, whom Nodbâmo'ddin, or Al Nodbâm, caused, by his address, to be elevated to the throne; though he was only a nominal prince, the supreme authority being vested in Nodbâmo'ddin himself, and Lîlî, one of his slaves. In this situation things remained, till the year of the Hejra 581; when Nodbâmo'ddin being sick, Kolbo'ddin went to see him, and, at his departure, was assassinated by Lîlî with a knife, who afterwards entered Nodbâmo'ddin's apartment, and dispatched him in the same manner. He then cut off both their heads, and exposed them to the view of the whole army; the officers of which hereupon declared for him, so that he immediately became master of Mîredin and Al Bîriya, with their respective citadels, as well as Al Sûr, or Al Sawra, according to Abu'l Faraj. After which, if that author may be credited, though he so villainously acquired his power, he discovered himself to be by no means deficient in point of valour. This year, died also Sadro'ddin Abd'alrahim Ebn Ismael Ebn Abu Sa'id, denominated by Abu'lfeda the Sheikh of Sheikhs. He was the Khalîf of Baghdâd's ambassador to Salâh'addin Yusuf Ebn Ayûb, sent by his master to bring about an accommodation, in conjunction with Shahâbo'ddin Bashîr, between 'Azzo'ddin Mas'ûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, and the Soltân. Those ministers, whose negotiation did not meet with the desired success, being taken ill at Damascus, were desirous of returning to Baghdâd, in order to recover their health. But the heats, at the time of their departure from Damascus, being excessive; Bashîr departed this life at Al Sukhna, and Sadro'ddin Abd'alrahim at Rababa upon the Euphrates. The latter of these, who, for his knowledge in both ecclesiastical and political matters, is styled by Abu'lfeda the phoenix of his age, was interred at Mashhad Al Bûk, at no great distance from the last mentioned city. As for Al Sakna, where Bashîr expired, it is a small town in the deserts of Al Sham, or Al Fâzira, between Tadmor, 'Ard, and Arec. It derived the name of Al Sukhna from a hot fountain on the road to Rababa, surrounded with palm-trees, near it, and is called in the maps Sukana. Before the close of the 580th year of the Hejra, Abu Yakûb Yusuf Ebn Abd'al'mûmen, Soltân of the Al Moâbedun, in Spain, likewise departed this life; being engaged, according to Ebn Shobnah, in a sacred expedition against the Franks, at the time of his demise. His remains were carried to (F) Ashbelia, Ashbiliab, or Seville, and there inhumed. After this prince's death, his son Yakûb Ebn Yusuf Ebn Abd'al'mûmen was proclaimed Soltân of the Al Moâbedun in his room. We must not forget to remark, that 'Azzo'ddin Mas'ûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, in the month of Al Mobarram, released Mojâbedo'ddin Kâymâz out of prison, and received him again into favour; nor that Salâh'addin ordered the sons of Al'Aded, the last Fâtemite Khalîf, to be confined more straitly than ever, for fear of a sedition in Egypt, where they were by the body of the people extremely revered, the present year^m.

Al Mawfel

besieged by Salâh'addin,

THE following year, being the 581st of the Hejra, commencing April 4th, 1185, Salâh'addin, having received advice of the hostilities committed by Mojâbedo'ddin with the combined army, consisting of the forces of Al Mawfel and those of Kozul, as has been already observed, against the territories of the Sâheb of Arbel, one of his allies, moved at the head of a numerous army, in order to lay siege to Al Mawfel. Having passed the Euphrates, he was met at Al Bîra by Modbaffero'ddin, the 12th of Al Mobarram, and from thence advanced to Harrân. Here he arrived, the 22d of Safar; having sent before Saïfo'ddin Al Meshtûb, with the main body of the army, to Râs Al'Ain, called by Ptolemy Rhafena. The 26th of the same month, the Soltân ordered Modbaffero'ddin to be put under arrest, for not appearing when he was commanded to attend him, and for having in other respects of-

(F) This is the name given by the Arabs to the city of Seville; which they made themselves masters of, in the beginning of their conquests in Spain. Al Mo'tamed Al Abadi, who reigned there, was driven from Ashbelia, or Seville, by Yûsuf Ebn Tâfessîn, emperor of Morocco, of the race of the Al Morabeta, or Almoravides, in the year of the Hejra 484. The surname of Al Ashbeli, or Al Ashbili, has been given to Ahmed Ebn Omar, who died in 401, and left behind him a book of jurisprudence, drawn up according to the principles of Mâlik Ebn Anas, as well as to the doctors Ebn Asfar, Ebn Kharath, Ebn Farah, Ebn Yurdûn, Ebn Tarkhan, Ebn Zaidûn, and other Arabic authors, either natives, or descended from natives, of this place (1).

- a fended him. That prince likewise deprived him of the government of the citadel of Harrân, and Al Rohî, or Edeffa; but Salâb'addîn conferred the former of those posts a second time upon him, made him a present of a royal vest, and took him again into favour, the beginning of the former Rabi. Soon after the Soltân had reached Râs Al 'Ain, an ambassador from Kilij Arslân had an audience of him; in which he informed him, that all the kings of the East had formed a confederacy against him, and were determined to come to an open rupture with him, if he did not desist from his enterprize against Al Mawfel and Mâredîn. But this formidable alliance by no means intimidating him, he marched to Dunîser; where he was joined by 'Amâdo'ddîn Ebn Karâ Arslân, with the troops of Nûro'ddîn, the Sâheb of Mâredîn, the 8th of the last mentioned month. Having treated that general with great marks
- b of distinction, the Soltân advanced to Al Mawfel, and incamped before that city, at Al Ismâ'ilân; the 21st of the aforesaid month; and, for some time, straitly besieged it. But 'Amâdo'ddîn Ebn Karâ Arslân being obliged to return to Mâredîn, on account of his brother Nûro'ddîn's death, and the people of Khalât, or Akblât, being desirous of submitting to the Soltân; he raised the siege of Al Mawfel, and moved towards Shâb Armen's, or the prince of Akblât's frontiers, without delay. But Boztemar, who succeeded Shâb Armen Sokmân Ebn Tabîro'ddîn Ibrahim Ebn Sokmân Al Kotbi in the sovereignty of Khalât, being drawn from his first attachment to Salâb'addîn by Al Pehelawân Mohammed, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Jebel, Al Ray, Esfabân, Arrân, and Adverbijân, who for that purpose had given his daughter in marriage to him; the Soltân found it impossible to possess himself of Akblât, and therefore laid aside all hopes of carrying into execution his former design. However, as he had
- c sat down before Mayyâfârahîn, he pushed on the siege of that place with the utmost vigour; and obliged the commandant, notwithstanding his brave defence, on the 28th of the former Jomâda, to surrender it to him. Whilst Salâb'addîn was engaged in the operations before Al Mawfel, Sakmân, or Sokmân, who ascended the throne of Mâredîn, Al Hîsn Caîsa, and Amed, after Nûro'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Karâ Arslân's demise, then under age, was brought to him, and confirmed by him in the possession of those fortresses, with their respective districts. As Sokmân was a child, Al Kawâm Ebn Samîkâ Al Ashardi governed his dominions for him; to whom the Soltân joined one of his Emîrs, and then dismissed the young prince in a very honourable manner. After the reduction of Mayyâfârahîn, Salâb'addîn returned to
- d Al Mawfel, pitched his camp at Casar Zimmâr, and, being reinforced by the Mesopotamian troops, under the conduct of Sanjar Shâb, attacked a third time that city. However, the summer heats growing excessive, the Soltân fell sick of a malignant distemper, that threatened him with the most dreadful effects; upon which, especially as 'Azzo'ddîn had before sued to him (G) for peace, he abandoned the siege, and retired to Harrân. When he arrived there, he was so reduced by the fatigues he had sustained in his march, that his life was despaired of. Nay, soon after his arrival, it was given out, that he was actually dead. In the mean time, 'Azzo'ddîn, having met with a denial both from the Persians and the Khalîf of Baghdâd, to whom he had applied for assistance, sent Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd and Bobâyo'ddîn Al Rabîb, as his ambassadors, to the Soltân, to procure a peace of him at any rate. These
- e ministers overtook Salâb'addîn upon the road, and concluded a treaty with him upon the following terms. I. The Sâheb of Al Mawfel shall restore Shabrezûr, with its district, to the Soltân. II. He shall likewise cede to him the prefecture of Al Karâbâli, and all the tract situated on the other side of the Zâb. III. The Soltân shall be prayed for in the mosques

(G) It appears from Abu'l Faraj, that the Atâbek 'Azzo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, sent his mother, together with Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenkî's daughter, several other ladies, and the principal lords of his court, to Salâb'addîn, when he first attacked that city, in the former Rabi, the present year. This he did, in order to prevail upon him to raise the siege; but without effect. The Soltân bade them sit down in his tent, and made an awkward disagreeable apology for not complying with their request. This so exasperated the people of Al Mawfel, who thought he could not have denied the ladies, especially the daughter of his friend and benefactor Nûro'ddîn, even the whole province of Syria, had they desired it, that they unanimously resolved to defend the place to the last drop of blood. Al Kâdî Al Fadl also wrote to him, upbraiding him with the ingratitude he had been guilty of on this occasion. Parties of the garison likewise frequently passed the Tigris, and harassed by their sallies that part of his army incamped on the eastern bank to such a degree, that he attempted to cut off all communication betwixt the river and the town, on the side of Nineveh; thinking by this means to oblige 'Azzo'ddîn's troops to surrender for want of water. But, finding the execution of his design impracticable, and receiving advice of Shâb Armen's death, he at last decamped, and turned off to Mayyâfârahîn; having been informed, that this prince died without issue, and was succeeded by Boztemar, one of his slaves. Whereupon the Soltân detached Nâfêro'ddîn Mahmud Ebn Shairacûb and Mot-haffero'ddîn Ebn Zîno'ddîn with a body of troops towards Akblât; who advanced to Tatwâna, and incamped there. Al Pehelawân Mohammed Ebn Ildig-biz, or Ayldigbîz, the Sâheb of Adverbijân, also posted himself with a detachment of his forces near Akblât; upon which, a negotiation commenced, and many couriers passed and repassed between him and the Soltân. The result of which was, that Salâb'addîn should take Mohammed into the number of his allies, and be prayed for in the territories of that prince, as well as those of the Sâheb of Akblât. In the last point, however, this writer does not intirely agree with another of the Arab historians referred to here (1).

throughout the territories of Al Mawfel. IV. Money shall be coined there, with Salâb'addin's name imprest upon it. Which treaty being signed, according to Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, the 10th of Dbu'lbajja, when the victims are slain at the pilgrimage of Mecca; the Soltân annexed to the dependencies of Al Mawfel, if the last mentioned author may be credited, the country of Al Nabrein (H), which had lately been put into his hands by Sanjar Shâb. Being visited by his brother, who came with the utmost expedition from Aleppo to Harrân; and attended by his physicians; Salâb'addin soon recovered his health, and made the necessary dispositions for undertaking a journey into Syria. Whilst the Soltân was ill, Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb Ebn Shûdi, his nephew, the Sâheb of Hems, taking for granted that he would die, had engaged the leading men at Damascus to declare for him, and admit him into the town, as soon as they should receive advice of that prince's death. These intrigues being discovered to Salâb'addin, he probably resented them. For, Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb was found dead, the morning of the 11th of Dbu'lbajja, in his palace at Hems; having been poisoned, at an entertainment he had provided for some of his friends, with the Soltân's privity, as was generally believed, the preceding night. Be that as it will, Salâb'addin appointed his son Shairacûb, then only twelve years old, to succeed him at Hems. He also seized upon his most valuable effects, and departed from Harrân, as Bobâo'ddin and Abu'lfeda seem to intimate, towards the close of the year that we are now upon".

At this time, according to some of the oriental historians, there was one of those great conjunctions of the seven planets, which rarely happen. It appeared in the third degree of Libra; which, if the rules of judicial astrology may be depended upon, is a very airy sign. All the astrologers in the Moslem territories, and amongst the rest Anwâri, surnamed Al Hâkem, or the philosopher, foretold, from this phænomenon, that such violent winds would blow, and such dreadful hurricanes arise, this year, that most of the houses in the country would be blown down, and the mountains themselves shaken. These predictions had such an effect on many people, that they provided places under-ground for their retreat, in order to screen themselves from the fury of such horrible tempests. Nevertheless there did not blow, during the whole time assigned by the astrologers, any wind to hinder the farmers from threshing and winnowing their corn. Notwithstanding which, the author of the Lebtârîk would persuade us, in opposition to the sentiments of other historians, that Anwâri and his brethren prognosticated, from the aforesaid conjunction, the frightful devastations attending the irruption of the Moguls into the countries of the Turân and Irâk, under the command of Jenghîz Khân. Some of the eastern writers affirm, that Mohammed Ebn Ildighîz, surnamed Al Pebelawân, the second Atâbek of Adherbijân, died the present year; and that, upon this event, a breach commenced between Kezel, Kizil, or Kozul, Arslân, his brother, who succeeded him, and Togrol II. the Soltân of the Selîjûks of Irân, who resided at Hamadân, in the Persian Irâk. For Kozul Arslân, taking upon him to dispose of all things without Togrol's orders, gave great umbrage, both to that prince and his whole court. Kozul Arslân perceiving the Soltân to be displeased with him, to prevent the consequence, marched suddenly with a powerful army towards Hamadân; from whence Togrol, having no forces to oppose him, retired. Whereupon Kozul Arslân entered the city without resistance; and, after he had continued there for some time, content with having offered this insult to the Soltân, withdrew home to Adherbijân. After his departure, Togrol re-entered his capital. But the Atâbek, resolving soon to disturb his repose, drew several of the discontented lords of Irâk to his party, and persuaded them afterwards to send proper persons to the Soltân, to inform him that they were ready to come and ask his pardon, if he would have the goodness to grant it them. Togrol, well pleased with their submission, appointed a day to receive it, when he was to play at mall in the great square of the city. The lords did not fail to appear before him; but, instead of asking pardon, secured his person, and imprisoned him in the strong castle named Kalât Al Najû, or the castle of refuge. This scheme being executed, Kozul Arslân left Adherbijân, and came to Hamadân, with a design to set Sanjar, son of the late Solimân Shâh, upon the throne; but having learned from a friend at Baghdâd, that the Khalîf, as soon as he was apprized of what had happened in the Persian Irâk, had said, "The Atâbek had a good pretence to be Soltân himself," he re-

(H) The words Al Nabrein properly denote the two rivers, or the country of the two rivers. The tract pointed out to us by them here is likewise called by Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, a little above, Al Fajîra; and therefore the learned Albert Schultens has rendered Al

Nabrein, in the passage before us, Mesopotamian. The limits of the particular region or district Bobâo'ddin had in view have perhaps not been precisely determined, at least by any of the modern European geographers (1).

- a solved to assume that title, and ordered money to be coined in his own name. This proceeding changed the face of affairs. For Fekbro'ddîn Kûtlûk, his nephew, and several others of the noblesse, who thought themselves his equals, entering into a conspiracy, slew him, and divided Togrol's dominions amongst them. At this juncture, the Soltân escaped from his confinement, by the intrigues of Hosâmo'ddîn, the general of his troops; amongst whom there were many attached to his interest. As soon as he was at liberty, he raised an army; with which he defeated the rebels, and punished them for their revolt in the manner they deserved. This victory entirely re-established Togrol's affairs, and rendered them as flourishing as they ever before had been. So far we have followed the writers consulted by M. D'Herbelot; with whom Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, in relation to the time of Atâbek Mohammed Ebn Ildigbîz's death, most perfectly agrees. But Al Pebelawân Mohammed Ebn Ildigbîz, whose subjects prayed constantly in their mosques for Soltân Togrol II. though that prince had no kind of authority over them, died, and was succeeded by his brother Kozul Arslân Othmân, the following year, according to both Abu'lfeda and *Abu'l Faraj*¹.

- BEFORE we conclude our account of the most remarkable occurrences of the year 581, we must beg leave to observe, that a bloody battle was fought between the Turkmâns and the Cûrds, towards the close of it; in which a great number of men, if Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd may be credited, on both sides were slain. The author, however, has not informed us in what part of the Moslem territories this action happened. It nevertheless seems probable, from a hint in his relation of the most interesting events of the following year, that the Turkmâns and the Cûrds engaged at no considerable distance from the city of Nasîbîn in Mesopotamia; though this, as it is not immediately deducible from any writer of note, we must not take upon us positively to affirm².

- THE next year, being the 582d of the Hejra, which began March 24th, 1186, Salâb'addin Yusef Ebn Ayûb recalled his son Al Mâlec Al Afdal from Egypt, and assigned him the government of Damascus; where he arrived, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the 17th of the former Jomâda. Al Mâlec Al Modhaffer Takio'ddîn Omar, Salâb'addin's nephew, then the viceroy of Egypt, having informed the Soltân, that Al Mâlec Al Afdal had released all those whom he had caused to be imprisoned for being deficient in the payment of their tribute, and that it would be impossible for him to collect the revenues of Egypt, if that prince was suffered to remain at Al Kûbirab; Salâb'addin, seemingly disgusted at his conduct, immediately sent for him. However, the Soltân conceived a dislike from hence to Takio'ddîn, and entertained a suspicion that, in case any accident should happen to him, he would set up for himself in Egypt. He therefore ordered him to return, without delay, to Damascus. But Takio'ddîn, not being disposed to obey his master, at first proposed to retire to Karâkûsh, one of his Mamlûks, who had subjugated Barka, and some of the neighbouring African provinces; which, as Karâkûsh was very powerful in the west, gave no small uneasiness to the Soltân. However, he at last fixed Takio'ddîn in his interest, by conferring upon him the government of Hamab, Manbij, Casar Tâb, Al Ma'ra, or Al Maarra, Mayyâfârakîn, and the mountainous tract of Jawr. He also appointed his brother Al Mâlec Al 'Adel to preside over the cities of Harrân and Al Robâ, with their dependencies; having before removed him from Aleppo, where he had been honoured with the supreme command. After which, Salâb'addin constituted him viceroy of Egypt, and joined to him his son Al 'Azîz Othmân in the administration there. Al Mâlec Al Dbâher, the Soltân's best beloved son, succeeded Al Mâlec Al 'Adel at Aleppo, a city considered at this time, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, as the strongest and most important fortress of Syria, and married one of that prince's daughters, if the same author in this point may be depended upon, the 26th of Ramâdân. Al Mâlec Al Afdal's nuptials with a daughter of Nâsero'ddîn Ebn Afado'ddîn were likewise celebrated, in the month of Shawâl, this most auspicious year. With regard to the Soltân himself, we must beg leave to observe, that, after his recovery, he left Harrân, and arrived at Aleppo, in his way to Damascus, the 14th of Al Moharram; from whence, after he had been received there with all possible demonstrations of joy, he departed, the 18th of the same month. He was met at Tel Al Soltân by Afado'ddîn Shairacûb Ebn Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb, with his sister, attended by a numerous retinue; who accompanied him to Hems, where he spent some days in taking a view of Nâsero'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb's treasures, arms, and most valuable effects. After which, he gave that city, with its district, to Afado'ddîn Shairacûb, Nâsero'ddîn's son, and then continued his route to Damascus. He made his public entry into that capital, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the 2d of the former Rabî, and was welcomed by the inhabitants, who distinguished themselves on this occasion, with the loudest acclamations. Having thus received advice, that Ma'ino'ddin had rebelled against him, and set up for himself, at Al Râwand, or, as it is called by Abu'lfeda, Al Râwanddân a fortress in the province of Kinnisrîn, he commanded his forces in the territory of Aleppo, under the conduct of 'Alamo'ddin, to reduce him. Ma'ino'ddin, finding himself not in a condition to make head against the Soltân's troops, delivered up Al Râwand to Alamo'ddin; and arrived at Damascus, in order to pay his duty to Salâb'addîn, the 2d of the former Jomâda. We are told, that Asado'ddin Shairacûb, on whom the Soltân had just now conferred the government of Hems, after he had stripped him of all the riches, arms, horses, and precious furniture, that had belonged to his father Nâsero'ddin Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb, was at this time a child, and filled the post assigned him, which had been occupied by his father, many years. That Salâb'addîn caused Nâsero'ddin to be poisoned, as has been intimated above, though he had married his own sister, is acknowledged by Ebn Khalecân Abu'lfeda, and Takio'ddin Ahmed Al Makrizi, his great admirers themselves. The first of those writers relates, that Asado'ddin Shairacûb being brought before Salâb'addîn, the Soltân asked him, "Whether he had made any progress in reading the Korân?" To which he replied in the following terms: "I am come to that place, Sir, where it is written, Surely they who devour the possessions of orphans unjustly, shall swallow down nothing but fire into their bellies, and shall broil in raging flames." The war still continued between the Turkmâns and the Cûrds, who fought several battles, in the neighbourhood of Nasîbîn, and other parts, in the former Rabî; wherein a vast number of men, if we may believe Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, were lost on both sides. But to which of those nations victory inclined, that author has not informed us. This year, Al Bornas, or Arnold the Sâheb of Al Carac, intercepted a large caravan of Moslem pilgrims going to Mecca, killed many of them, and carried off more with him into captivity. As a truce had been before concluded between Salâb'addîn and that prince, the Soltân looked upon this act of hostility as an open infraction of that treaty, and therefore sent an ambassador to Arnold, to demand the release of the prisoners he had taken; but without effect. This so incensed the Soltân, that he vowed he would himself cut off the perfidious Sâheb's head, if he ever fell into his hands. Our curious and sagacious readers will naturally here remark, that Salâb'addîn's treatment of Nâsero'ddin Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb, and Shairacûb, or Asado'ddin Shairacûb, his son, to whom, by the bands of consanguinity, he was so closely allied, indicates him to have been, notwithstanding the nauseous flattery of his sycophantic panegyrists, a very cruel and rapacious prince¹.

THE 583d year of the Hejra, which commenced March 13th, 1187, proved extremely unfortunate, and even almost fatal, to the Franks. Salâb'addîn advanced at the head of a body of his troops to Al Carac, in order to block up that place, and protect the caravan of pilgrims going to Mecca. He also sent a large detachment of his forces, under the command of his son Al Mâlec Al Afdal, to ravage the district of 'Accâ, and all the adjacent tract. Al Mâlec Al Afdal committed dreadful depredations in that part of Palestine, and then returned into the Moslem territories with an immense quantity of spoil, without having sustained any considerable loss. As for the Soltân himself, he remained before Al Carac till the return of the caravan, and then marched to 'Ashtarâ, probably the Ashtaroth Karnaim of Scripture, belonging to the tribe of Manasseh, not far from Damascus. Here he was met by his son Al Mâlec Al Afdal, and Modbaffero'ddin Ebn Zino'ddin, with the army under their command. In the mean time, Al Mâlec Al Modbaffer, the Sâheb of Hamab, having concluded a treaty of neutrality with the Franks from the principality of Aleppo, decamped from Hîrem, where he had posted himself, to observe their motions, and returned to Hamab. The Soltân being afterwards joined by the forces of Al Mawfel, commanded by Mas'ûd Al Za'farâni, Mîredîn, and Hamab; he reviewed his army first on the hill called Tel Taisal, and afterwards at Ashtarâ; the latter of which, according to Bobâo'ddin, was the place of rendezvous. The Franks, having received advice of the dispositions made by the Soltân for attacking them, and of his having already taken the field, assembled likewise a numerous army, and encamped in the plains of Sepphoris. Of which Salâb'addîn, being informed, he pitched his camp on the lake of Tiberias, near the village of Al Sobeira, on Friday, the 17th of the latter Rabî; from whence he removed it to a spot to the west of that lake, and drew up his troops there in order of battle. This he imagined would induce the Franks to do the like; but he was deceived in his expectation, they keeping themselves close within their camp. The Soltân, not being able to draw them to an engagement, which he earnestly desired, left one part of his army to guard his camp, and with the other moved to Tabariya, or Tiberias, then subject to the Sâheb of Tripoli; which he took by storm, on Wednesday, the 21st of the latter Rabî, putting many of the people he found therein to the sword. The castle, however, held out against him, and could not be

- a obliged to surrender. He was no sooner master of the town, than he committed the most horrible barbarities upon the inhabitants, and carried many of them off with him into a state of captivity. After which, to complete the tragical scene, he set fire to the place. The Franks receiving intelligence of what had happened to Tabariya, and being determined to give Salâb'addin battle; they immediately quitted their camp, and moved towards the Soltân: who, having left a body of troops to keep the citadel of Tabariya blocked up, led his men, with the same ardour, against them. Both armies, therefore, at last, facing each other, on Thursday, the 22d of the latter Rabî, in the afternoon, a most fierce and bloody conflict thereupon ensued. But the night preventing victory from declaring on either side, the fight was renewed the next morning, by break of day, with greater fury than before. Nor could the most vigorous efforts
- b of both armies decide the dispute before Saturday, the 24th of the aforesaid month; when the Moslems, animated by despair, as being hemmed in on every side by the enemy and the Jordan, intirely defeated the Franks, and gained a most glorious victory. The Sâheb of Tripoli, who, according to Abu'lfeda, had been prevailed upon to join the Franks, by a Christian patriarch and several priests sent to him as ambassadors from the king of Jerusalem for that purpose, in open violation of a solemn treaty of alliance he had before concluded with the Soltân, charged the Moslems in front; but was so warmly received by Al Mâlec Al Modhaffer Takio'ddin, the Sâheb of Hamab, who commanded there, that he soon betook himself to a precipitate flight. But being hotly pursued by a detachment of the Moslem forces, all the people that attended him were cut off to a man, and he alone escaped to Tripoli; where, as
- c Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd writes, he was some time after seized with a pleurisy, and died. A prodigious number of the Franks were killed in the action and the pursuit. A body of them, however, found means to retire to the top of a neighbouring hill, denominated from a village at a small distance from it the hill of Hittin; but being surrounded by the Soltân's troops, who set fire to a wood into which they had fled for shelter, and almost dead with thirst, they were obliged to surrender at discretion. Some of them were barbarously butchered by the Moslems, as soon as they delivered themselves up into their hands, and others thrown into irons. Amongst the prisoners were the king of Jerusalem himself, Al Bornas, or Arnold, the Sâheb of Al Shawbec and Al Carac, the Sâheb of Hobeil, or rather Jobeil, his son Humfrey, the masters of the Templars and Hospitalers, together with almost the whole order of the latter.
- d With such terror were the Franks struck on this occasion, that one of Salâb'addin's men, if the last-mentioned author merits any attention in this particular, took thirty of them prisoners, and dragged them after him; having tied them together, to prevent their escape, with the cord of his tent. The masters of the Templars and Hospitalers, with the knights above-mentioned acting under the latter, being brought into the Soltân's presence, he commanded them all to be cut (1) to pieces before his face. After the end of the action, Salâb'addin seated himself in a magnificent tent, erected for that purpose; and placed the king of Jerusalem, or, as the Arab writers style him, the king of the Franks (K), on his right hand, and Al Bornas, or Arnold, the Sâheb of Al Shawbec and Al Carac, on his left. Then he drank to the former of these princes, at that time ready to expire for want of liquids, and offered him a cup of snow-water (L);
- e which he thankfully received, and immediately drank to the latter. But here the Soltân interrupted him, with some warmth; saying, "I will not suffer this cursed rogue to drink, as that, according to the laudable and generous custom of the Arabs, would secure to him his life." Then turning towards the Sâheb of Al Shawbec and Al Carac, he gave him very opprobrious language, and reproached him with the expedition he had undertaken against the two sacred cities, that is Mecca and Medina, as well as with his violation of the treaty last concluded with him, in contempt of public faith, by intercepting an Egyptian caravan of pilgrims going to Mecca, in time of profound peace, near Al Shawbec, and massacring all the holy people of which it was composed. He likewise accused him of uttering the most virulent language against Mohammed, and of being guilty of a vast effusion of Moslem blood. Not-
- f withstanding which, he told the Sâheb he would spare him, if he would become a convert to Islamism; but refusing this, the Soltân drew his scymitar, and immediately struck off his head, in conformity to the vow he had formerly made. This not a little terrified the king of the Franks, who expected to meet with the same fate. But Salâb'addin raised his drooping spirits,

(1) Some authors relate, that above 200 knights Templars and Hospitalers were now killed before the Soltân's tent; that he called them Assassins or Bâtanists, and put every one of their orders to the sword that fell into his hands; and that he usually paid his soldiers 50 dinârs for every head of a Templar or Hospitaler that they brought him (1).

(K) This was Guy of Lusignan, Sibylla's husband, who held the kingdom of Jerusalem in right of his wife. The misunderstanding between him and the Sâheb of Tripoli occasioned the latter to enter into an alliance with Salâb'addin, though he fought for the king of Jerusalem at the battle of Hittin against that prince (2).

(L) M. Renaudot informs us, that this was the liquor called by the orientals forba, and by us sherbet; though he has not produced the author, from whom he received that notion. However, this seems to be confirmed by Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd; who intimates, that it was a sweetish sort of liquor diluted with snow-water (3).

by assuring him that he had nothing to fear, that it did not become kings to kill their brethren, a and that Al Bornas had brought upon himself a violent death by shewing so little regard to the dictates of common honesty. The Franks being thus overthrown, and totally dispersed; the Soltân resumed the military operations against the citadel of Tabariya, or Tiberias, and took it by capitulation. From thence he moved towards 'Accâ, or Ptolemais; which, after a short (M) siege, he possessed himself of, the 1st of the former Jomâda. Here he found 4000 Moslem prisoners in chains, whom he instantly released. As the inhabitants of 'Accâ enjoyed a very flourishing and extensive trade, the place being at this time full of merchants, he found there not only immense sums of money, but likewise variety of wares of exceeding great value; all which he seized, and applied to his own use. His brother Al Mâlec Al' Adel attacked Majdelyâbâ, a small town or village with a very strong castle, near Al Ramla, which he carried b sword in hand. The Soltân then divided his army into several bodies, in order to over-run the territories of the Franks with the greater celerity; which reduced Nâblos, Nâbolos, Naplosa, or Neapolis, with its citadel, Haifâ, Kayfâriya, or Cesarea, Sefforiya, or Sepphoris, Al Nâfaret, or Nâzareth, Ma'lthâ, or Maaltba, Al Fawla, Al Shâkif, and several other places not far from 'Acca; where they met with only women and children, all the men having been before either killed or taken prisoners. After the reduction of Majdelyâbâ, Al Mâlec Al' Adel advanced to Jassa, Yâfâ, or Joppa; which, after a pretty vigorous resistance, he carried by storm. Every thing being settled at 'Accâ, and both the spoils and the captives distributed amongst the victors, the Soltân himself marched to Tebnîn, a fortress of considerable strength above 'Accâ, on the road to Saidâ, Seidâ, or Sidon; which was taken by assault, c after it had sustained a siege of six days, the 18th of the former Jomâda. He was no sooner master of Tebnîn, than he ordered the fortress itself to be razed, and the garrison to be put to the sword. From Tebnîn Salâb'addîn moved to Sidon; which, being deserted by its prince, surrendered almost as soon as he presented himself before the town. Bayrût, or Berytus, he invested the 22d of the same month; and obliged it to submit the 29th, the inhabitants then taking the oath of allegiance to him. Amongst the prisoners here the Soltân found the Sâbeb of Hobeil; who, by way of ransom, if Abu'lfeda in this point may be depended upon, delivered up his capital to him. Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, however, one of Salâb'addîn's contemporaries, relates, that Hobeil was taken by one of the Soltân's detachments whilst he himself pushed on the siege of Bayrût. Abu'lfeda scruples not to censure the Sâbeb of Hobeil, for his mean d and illiberal conduct at this juncture; as he was so much distinguished amongst the Franks, both by his dignity and his hatred of the Mohammedons. Upon his cession of Hobeil, in consequence of his promise, the Soltân released him. About this time, a certain marquis (N) arrived in a Christian vessel at 'Accâ; not knowing that the Moslems were in possession of that place. Al Mâlec, Al Afdal, the commandant of 'Accâ, might easily, as Abu'lfeda seems to intimate, have secured the person of this nobleman; as he was detained several days in the port, either by a calm or a contrary wind. But letting the opportunity slip, the marquis escaped to Tyre, and put himself at the head of the Christian forces assembled in that city. Which misfortune, together with the vast number of prisoners released by the Soltân, and sent by his command to Tyre, chiefly contributed, in Abu'lfeda's opinion, to the success that four years after e attended the arms of the Franks. The next place of note attacked by Salâb'addîn, was 'Askalân (O); which, after a siege of fourteen days, he made himself master of, towards the close of the latter Jomâda. About the same time his troops possessed themselves of Al Ramla, Yasna, or Yabnâ, the Jabneh or Yabneh of scripture, Al Dârûm, Gaza, Betlehem, Al Netrîn, Beit Jebrîn and several other towns. The Franks since the battle of Hittîn not daring to look the Soltân in the face, he recalled all his detachments, that had been ravaging the adjacent country, and wresting many of the lesser fortresses of Palestine out of the enemy's hands, led his army against Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, and invested that capital, then full of people (P), on the f

(M) The people of 'Accâ did not put him to the trouble of a siege, according to Abu'l Faraj. Upon his first appearance before the town, they submitted to him; and were permitted by him, at their request, to retire to what place they should think proper, with as much of their money and effects as they could carry off with them. The rest was seized upon by the Moslems. After which, continues he, the Soltân appointed his son Al Afdal to command there (1).

(N) This was the marquis of Montferrat; who, by a stratagem, over-reached Al Afdal, called by M. Renaudot corruptly Adel, and made his escape to Tyre (2).

(O) One of the articles of the capitulation was, that Guy, king of Jerusalem, should be released; which being complied with by the Soltân, the city was surrendered to him. About the same time Beth Gabriel, who commanded in the castle, was also released, and sent with 500 men to Europe; from whence he returned with a reinforcement of Venetians, Genoese, and Pisans, and a fleet of 100 sail, about six months after to Tyre (3).

(P) We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that the garrison and inhabitants of Jerusalem were struck with terror, when they saw from the walls the numerous army commanded by the Soltân; who, after he had spent five days in viewing the ground round the place, erected his engines on a spot near Bâb 'Amûdâ, or the gate of Amûdâ,

- a the west side, the 15th of Rajeb, the present year. Some of the Moslem historians relate, that the garrison alone consisted of at least 60,000 men; but that this much exceeded the truth, Bobão'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd himself has not scrupled to affirm. Be that as it will, the Soltân found himself obliged to remove his camp more to the north, that his engines might play upon the city, and batter the walls with greater success. The siege he carried on, notwithstanding the obstinate resistance of the garrison, with the utmost vigour, and at last by sapping made a breach in that part of the walls contiguous to Gebinnom, or the valley of Hinnom; which, being practicable, so intimidated the besieged, that they immediately desired to capitulate. But the Soltân at first refused to grant them any terms, saying, he would take Al Kuds from the Franks, as they had formerly taken it from the Moslems, that is, sword in hand. But upon the garrison's insinuating, that the troops which composed it were extremely numerous, and would defend themselves to the last drop of blood, if they were not permitted to retire in safety to some other place, he thought fit to desist from his design. It was, therefore, agreed that every man should pay the Soltân ten Tyrian dinârs, every woman five, and every infant two; upon which condition, they were allowed to leave the holy city in peace. Those that paid the stipulated sums were escorted by a detachment of the Soltân's troops to Tyre, but the others were thrown into irons. The Moslems, according to Bobão'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, took possession of (Q) Al Kuds, on Friday, the 27th of Rajeb; the night following, which day, says that writer, was the anniversary of Mohammed's night's journey to heaven. This he would have believed a clear and incontestable proof of this event's being brought about by the particular designation of Providence; though we are informed by Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shobnah, that it happened not on the 27th, but the 17th of the aforesaid month. The Moslems then, as they relate, erected their standards on the walls, and the Soltân posted persons at the gates to collect the money exacted of the Franks, when they evacuated the place; which, continue these authors,

Amûdâ, and the church of Sion, as the most commodious for that purpose, the night of the 20th of Rajeb. The Franks, having planted their machines on the walls, made on their part the necessary dispositions for a vigorous defence. In short the troops on both sides, animated by the most fervent zeal for their religion, exerted themselves with so much ardor, that their leaders could not oblige them to confine their intrepidity within proper bounds. But the Franks, perceiving the dreadful execution done by the enemy's military engines, and the surprizing progress of their miners, found they could not hold out long; and therefore sent Bâliân, the son of Nirvân, or Birvân, the Sâheb of Al Ramla, to treat with the Soltân about the surrender of the city. That prince, however, at first refused to grant them any terms; saying he would take it by storm, as the Franks had formerly done. "If that be the case, replied Bâliân, know, O Soltân, that we, who are extremely numerous, and have been restrained from fighting like men in despair only by the hopes of an honourable capitulation, will kill all our wives and children, commit all our wealth and valuable effects to the flames, massacre 5000 Moslem prisoners now in our hands, leave not a single beast of burden or animal of any kind belonging to us alive, and level with the ground the rock you esteem sacred, together with the temple Al Akfa. After which, we will fall out upon you in a body, and doubt not but we shall either cut to pieces a much greater number of you than we are, or force you to abandon the siege. In fine, we are determined, if you will not permit us to retire, either to meet with victory or a glorious death." This resolute speech had such an effect upon the Soltân, that he immediately called a council of war, at which all the general officers of his army assisted; who unanimously agreed, that it would be adviseable for him to suffer the Franks quietly to evacuate the place, since the issue of such a vigorous sally as Bâliân had threatened him with must be altogether uncertain. The Soltân, therefore, allowed them to march out freely and securely, with their wives, children, and effects; upon which, in consequence of the capitulation that had been signed, Salâb'addîn was to receive ten dinârs from every man capable of paying that sum, five from every woman, and two from every young person under age. For the poor, who are not able to lay down any money for themselves, Bâliân paid the Soltân 30,000 dinârs. The city was put into the hands of the Moslems, the 27th of Rajeb; after which, when the Soltân had settled every thing to his satisfaction at Al Kuds, the Egyptian army advanced to Tyre, in order to lay siege to that place. As it was blocked up on the sea side by a squadron of five men of war, stationed before the port, to hinder any persons either from going into the town or coming out of it, Salâb'addîn imagined that he should easily make himself master of that fortress. But in this he found himself mistaken. For a fleet of the Franks fell upon the Moslem squadron one morning by break of day, and intirely defeated it; putting to the sword many of the people they met with on board, and carrying most of the rest away prisoners, with all their ships, into the port of Tyre. This was no small mortification to the Soltân, who saw the action from the shore; but was not able to send his men any assistance. A considerable number of the Moslems, in the naval engagement, threw themselves into the sea; a few of whom escaped, and the others were drowned. As Salâb'addîn had before been repulsed in his attacks by the bravery of the garrison, this last misfortune so disheartened him, that he immediately raised the siege. In this succinct relation of Abu'l Faraj, our curious reader will discover several entertaining particulars omitted by the other eastern writers (1).

(Q) M. Renaudot assures us, that the loss of Jerusalem was owing to the discords and dissensions that reigned amongst the citizens, and to the perfidy of the Melchites. One Yusef Al Batith, of that sect, a merchant, excited those of his communion, who were the most considerable part of the inhabitants, to shake off the yoke of the Franks. The patriarch carried away with him the gold and silver plates, together with all the rich utensils and furniture, of the church of the Holy Sepulchre, by the Soltân's permission; though this was, for a short time, opposed by the Mohammedans. Some authors relate, that 14,000 Franks were left prisoners in the place; that the celebrated cross above-mentioned, thrown down by the Moslems, was erected on the top of the Hospitalers church; and that the rejoicings, made on this occasion throughout the Mohammedan territories, were such as had never before been known (2).

through the knavery of the collectors, fell much short of the expected sum. The Soltân had a no sooner occupied Al Kuds, than some of his men took down a cross overlaid with gold from the top of the temple Affakbra, or the sacred rock, perhaps mount Calvary; upon which, the skies were rent by such a cry, add the above-mentioned historians, as had never before been heard. Salâb'addin, being absolute master of the city, commanded the temple Al Akfa, which had been converted into a jakes by the Franks, to be cleansed, and restored to its pristine state. He also ordered the pulpit, destined by Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, for Jerusalem, to be brought from Aleppo, and fixed in this temple. After he had released 3000 Moslem captives, formed a plan for the erection of several schools and colleges, for the education of the youth trained up in the principles of Al Shafei, and settled every thing to his satisfaction at Al Kuds, he departed to 'Accâ, and from thence marched with his army to Tyre; which he formally besieged, the 9th of Ramadân. But the Franks having surprized and defeated (R) his fleet, consisting of ten sail, which was appointed to forward the operations of the land-forces, taken five of his ships of war, killed a vast number of his seamen, and obliged Al Fares Bedrân and Abd'almohsen, his two admirals, to sheer off; the Soltân judged it expedient, especially as the winter approached, to raise the siege. Accordingly, having burnt that part of his machines which he could not carry off, he decamped the 2d of Dhu'l-kaada, and returned to 'Accâ. Shams'o'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Al Mokaddem, the Emîr of the Hadji's, or pilgrims, of Al Shâm, endeavouring to perform the religious decursion from mount Arafat to the valley of Mina, before Tâstakîn, the Emîr of the Hadji's of Irak, was killed in a skirmish that happened on this occasion, between the pilgrims of Al Shâm, or Syria, and those of Irak, the 10th of Dhu'lhajja, the present year. He was interred in the burying-place denominated Al Moalla, and died a martyr, according to the sentiments of the Mohammedans. Tâstakîn is said to have insisted upon the honour of conducting his Hadji's first from mount Arafat to the valley of Mina, on account of the superior dignity of the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledinî'llah, who resided in Irak; and Ebn Al Mokaddem to have claimed the same privilege, by reason of the mighty power of Salâb'addin, now become in a manner the sole monarch of Syria, or Al Shâm, as well as Egypt. Many perished on both sides in this bloody fray. The Khalîf sent to Salâb'addin to excuse what had happened, but this by no means satisfied the Soltân. About this time, Togrol Ebn Arslan, or Togrol II. the last Soltân of the Seljuk dynasty of Irân, dispossessed of part of his dominions Kozul Arslân Othmân, the Sâheb of Al Jebel, Arrân, and Adberbijân; and annexed to his territories several provinces, as Abu'lfeda reports, of considerable extent. This induced Kozul Arslân to send an embassy to Baghdâd, to solicit the Khalîf's assistance; and to demonstrate to him, that his own safety required Togrol's power to be confined within narrower bounds. We must not forget to remark, that Hittîn, which has been rendered memorable to all succeeding ages by the signal overthrow Salâb'addin gave on a spot near it to the Franks, was a village between Tabariya and 'Accâ, about two parasangs from the former of those cities; at a small distance from which, in Bohâo'ddîn's days, if that author in this point merits any regard, the sepulchre of Shoaib, or Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was to be seen. The battle of Hittîn, which proved the total ruin of the kingdom of Jerusalem, was the greatest blow the Franks, since their first invasion of Syria, says Abu'lfeda, had ever received^a.

Soltân's arms.

In the 584th year of the Hejra, beginning March 2d, 1188. Salâb'addin Yusef Ebn Ayûb extended his conquests, and still proved superior to the Franks. Moving out of his winter-quarters at 'Accâ, he advanced to Caucab, a strong castle seated on a hill, at a small distance from Tiberias, near the Jordan; and laid siege to it, in the beginning of Al Moharram. But receiving advice, that the Franks had penetrated as far as 'Aferbala, defeated a body of the

(R) This action happened, according to Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the 27th of Shawâl. The Moslem fleet, destined to assist the land-forces in the reduction of Tyre, consisted of ten large ships, brought from Egypt; five of which were sunk, and five, with their respective captains and crews, taken. This defeat, which was so entire that very few of the Moslems on board the ships escaped, gave great uneasiness to the Soltân; who thereupon immediately called a council of war, wherein the officers unanimously declared, that, as the winter approached, and the continual rains rendered the operations impracticable, it would be highly proper to raise the siege (1).

- a Moslem troops posted there, under the command of Saifo'ddîn, the brother of Al Jiwali, who was killed in the action, and carried off several standards, together with a large quantity of arms; he marched at the head of part of his forces thither, and left the Emîr Kâymâz Al Nojmi with the remainder to continue the siege. Finding afterwards, however, that the fortress was rendered both by nature and art in a manner impregnable, and defended by a brave as well as numerous garrison; he concluded it could only be reduced by all his troops, drawn out of the different provinces of his empire, assembled in a body, and therefore ordered Al Emîr Kâymâz to retire from before it. As for the Soltân himself, he entered Damascus, the 6th of the former Rabî, and staid there only five days; though, according to Bobâo'ddîn, he had been absent from that capital sixteen months. His speedy departure was
- b occasioned by the news brought him of a design formed by the Franks, after they had by favour of the night met with the aforesaid success at 'Aferbala, to make themselves masters of Hobeila. This induced him to put some of his forces immediately in motion; of which the Franks being apprized, they thought fit to keep quiet within their own frontiers, and attempt nothing against that town. About the middle of the former Rabî, the Soltân incamped on the lake of Al Kuds, a little to the west of Hems; where he was joined by 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki, the Sâheb of Sinjâr, or Senjâr, and Nasîbîn, with a very considerable reinforcement, as well as by several Emîrs, who acknowledged him for their chief. He had not been long here, before his army was ready to enter upon action; wherefore removing his camp to Hisn Al Acrâd, the 1st of the latter Rabî, he detached parties from thence to
- c make incursions into the territories of the Franks. Some of these detachments, who had orders to reconnoitre the enemy, ravaged the district of Tripoli twice, if Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd may be credited, the same month; and then returned, with the immense quantity of spoil they had acquired, to the Soltân's camp. From Hisn Al Acrâd Salâb'addîn marched to Antarsûs, Anatarsûs, or Antaradus, one of the dependencies of Tripoli; which the Franks had abandoned at his approach. This we learn from Abu'lfeda; but Bobâo'ddîn relates, that the Soltân marched from Al 'Arîma or Antarsûs, presented himself before the town, took it after a faint resistance by storm, and gave it up to be plundered by his troops. He also, continues this last author, intirely dismantled, and then set fire to the place. The Soltân having reduced Antaradus, the 10th of the former Jomâda, and completed the demolition of
- d its fortifications, the 14th of the same month, directed his march to Marakiya, a fortress situated in the maritime coast of Hems; which, says Abu'lfeda, was likewise deserted by the Franks. From Marakiya Salâb'addîn marched to Merkab; but finding that fortress in a condition to baffle his most vigorous efforts, he advanced to Jibla, Jebela, or Jebela, the Gabala, or Gabala, of the antients, a town of the same tract. This, on his first appearance before it, the 18th of the former Jomâda, if Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd may be depended upon, immediately surrendered to him; as did also, the next day, the citadel, the garrison of which was permitted in safety to retire. Having appointed Al Emîr Sâbiko'ddîn Othmân Ebn Al Dâya, the Sâheb of Shaizar, or Shaizer, to command there; he began his march for Al Lâdikiya, or Laodicea, the 23d of the same month, where he arrived the following day.
- e Animated by the reduction of so many castles and towns, the Soltân attacked Al Lâdikiya with so much bravery, that towards the evening of the 25th, being Friday, the garrison offered to capitulate, and desired that the Kâdi of Jibla might be sent as an interpreter to them. The Soltân complying with their request, the Kâdi of Jibla was admitted, the 26th, into the town, and the capitulation afterwards signed; by virtue of which, both the people and the garrison were allowed to march out of the place with all their treasures and most valuable effects. They were obliged, however, to leave their cattle, beasts of burden, provisions, arms, and military stores, to the Moslems; who instantly, after their departure, took possession of them. Al Mâlec Al Modbaffer Takîo'ddîn having been constituted governor of Al Lâdikiya, Salâb'addîn decamped, the 27th, and reached Sebyûn, the 29th. That fortress, notwithstanding
- f its prodigious strength, was constrained to submit to the Soltân, either the 2d or the 3d of the latter Jomâda, upon the same terms as those granted the city of Jerusalem, or Al Kuds. The government of the castle of Sebyûn, being assigned Al Emîr Nâsero'ddîn, the Sâheb of the castle of Abi Kobais, one of Salâb'addîn's favourites, the Soltân made the proper dispositions for attacking Bacâs, an important fortress upon the Orontes; which he carried by assault, the 9th of the latter Jomâda, cut to pieces many of the inhabitants and garrison, brought the rest away with him bound, and stript the place of every thing valuable belonging to it. In the mean time, the Soltân's detachments, that had spread themselves over the country, seized upon Al 'Aid, a castle dependent on Antioch, Faiba, a fortress in the same district, Blâtanûs, or Plâtanûs, a regular fortification opposite to Laodicea, Al Jahinâbûnîn, a strong
- g castle near Jibla, and other places of considerable note. After the surrender of Bacâs, Salâb'addîn summoned the castle of Al Shokr, joined to it by a bridge; the garrison of which, having no prospect of relief, demanded to capitulate, the 13th of the latter Jomâda, and, three days after, delivered up the fortress, though inexpugnable, as being rendered inaccessible by every every advantage of situation, into the Soltân's hands. Salâb'addin then returned to the camp, a and detached his son Al Mâlec Al Dbâber, the Sâheb of Aleppo, with a body of troops, to possess himself of the castle of Sarmâniya, about a day's journey N. E. of Aleppo; which beat the chamade, and received a Moslem garrison, the 23d of the same month. It has been remarked by Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, that the reduction of Jibla, and of every one of the other maritime fortresses and towns, happened on Friday; which he looks upon as a full proof, that the prayers of the Moslem preachers were heard, and that the Soltân was particularly favoured by the great Arbiter of events, who showers down his blessings on believers for their good works on that very day. Salâb'addin having intirely demolished the castle of Sarmâniya, and left no traces of it remaining, led his army against Borziya, a fortress in the territory of Antioch, so strong by its situation as to become thereby a proverb amongst the b Franks. This place he assaulted with so much bravery, that he took it sword in hand, the 27th of the latter Jomâda, killed many of the Christians settled there, and made all the rest prisoners. However, the Soltân sent the governor of the castle, together with all his family, amounting to seventeen persons in number, to the Sâheb of Antioch, to whom he was nearly related; though, by his permission, the poor inhabitants were deprived of all their money and effects by the Moslem troops. From Borziya the Soltân marched to the Iron Bridge, upon the Orontes, about six or seven miles from Antioch; where he halted till the rear of his army came up, and then continued his march to Derbasûc. Having formed the siege of the castle here, the 18th, or, as some MS. copies of Abu'lfeda have it, the 8th of Rajeb; the garrison surrendered the place, according to the last-mentioned author, c the 19th of that month, and were suffered to evacuate it with only the cloaths they had on. Bagrûs, or Pagræ, a city seated at the foot of mount Al Locâm, about four parasangs from Antioch, with a citadel, met with the same fate, the 2d of Shaabân. Boamund, or Boamund, the Sâheb of Antioch, disheartened to the last degree by the uninterrupted success that had attended the Moslem arms this campaign, sent a minister to the Soltân, to desire a truce for seven or eight months. To this the present situation of his affairs, notwithstanding the advantages he had gained, obliged him to agree; the incredible fatigues his men had sustained, and the insolent demand of the auxiliaries, under the orders of 'Amâdo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Sinjâr, to be immediately dismissed, rendering absolutely necessary such a concession. The truce was nevertheless granted Boamund only upon the following conditions; viz. d that he should set at liberty all the Moslem prisoners in his hands; and that he should put the Soltân in possession of his capital, if he was not succoured before the expiration of that truce. This convention being signed, Salâb'addin went with his son Al Mâlec Al Dbâber to Aleppo, and staid there three days. He was met on the road to Damascus by Al Mâlec Al Modhaffer Takîo'ddîn, whom he splendidly entertained at Hamab. Having spent one night there, and conferred upon Takîo'ddîn (S) the government of Jibla, Jebela, or Jabala, and Laodicea, he continued his route to Baalbec, and from thence to Damascus; where he arrived in good health, about the beginning of Ramadân. In this last journey, after he had given 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd leave to return home, he visited the tomb of the Khalîf e Omar Ebn Abd'alaziz of pious memory, as well as the holy doctor Abu Zacariâ Al Garbi (T), famous for his sanctity, and the miracles he wrought, who resided there. He was also, according to Abu'lfeda, attended by Al Emîr Kâsem Ebn Mohanâ Al Hoseini, the Sâheb of Medina, for whom he had the highest regard, in all these expeditions. Upon his arrival at Damascus, he was advised by some of the grandees of his court to disband the troops; but this advice he would by no means listen to, saying, "Life is short, and the term of it uncertain." About this time, news was brought to Soltân, that his brother Al Mâlec Al 'Adel had made himself master of Al Carac and Al Shawbec, with their dependencies, and the whole adjacent territory extending as far as Safad. Having surmounted all obstacles, Salâb'addin also reduced to his obedience the town of Safad, an important post of the Franks, f not far from the lake of Tiberias and the Jordan, the 14th of Shawâl, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the present year; though the capitulation was not signed before the middle of Dhu'lkaada, if Abu'lfeda in this point may be depended upon. The garrison and inhabitants, as it was stipulated by one of the articles of the capitulation, were conducted to Tyre. The Soltân, after every thing was settled to his satisfaction at Safad, set out for Jerusalem the 1st of Dhu'lhajja, in company with his brother; and reached the holy city on Friday, the 8th of the same month. From thence he passed to 'Askalân, or Ashkelon,

(S) It appears from Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnab, that Al Mâlec Al Modhaffer Takîo'ddîn was extremely fond of building, repairing, and fortifying castles; of which the citadels of Laodicea, and Hamab, which he either built or repaired, and fortified, are incontestable proofs (1).

(T) He is called in Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab the pious Sheikh Abu Zacariâ Al Mâgrebi, or Mcgrebi; but this author does not assert, that Salâb'addin performed a pilgrimage to the sepulchre of this Sheikh, as M. D'Herbelot is pleased to affirm (2).

- a and put every thing upon a proper foot there. From 'Askalân he directed his course to 'Accâ, visiting all the towns of any moment in his way. Soon after he had entered 'Accâ, he nominated Bobâo'ddîn Karâkûsh to preside over that ancient city, and the district appertaining to it; ordering him to repair the walls, then in a ruinous condition, without delay. That this might be done with the utmost expedition, he joined Hofimo'ddîn Bashâra to Bobâo'ddîn Karâkûsh in the aforesaid post. We must not forget to observe, that the Soltân subjugated the strong castle of Caucab, which he had besieged ineffectually the beginning of the year, before he celebrated the feast of the oblation at Jerusalem, or Al Kuds; with the mention of which conquest we shall conclude our account of his military operations against the Franks, during the course of this prosperous campaign¹.
- b THE same year, Kozul Arslân, or Kezel Arslân, the son of Ildigbîz, sent the Imâm Al Nâsir, The Khalîf is as his ambassador, to the Khalîf, in order to solicit his assistance against Togrol Ebn Arslân, the last Soltân of the Seljûks of Irân. The Imâm represented to the Moslem pontiff, that Togrol's exorbitant power ought to give him as much umbrage as it did his master, since they were both equally threatened with utter subversion by the success that had lately attended his arms. Hereupon the Khalîf sent an army, under the command of Helâl Ebn Obeid'allah, his Wazîr, against him; which penetrated almost as far as Hamadân, in the Persian Irâk. Togrol having received advice, that the Khalîf's forces had made an irruption into his territories, and were posted in the neighbourhood of Hamadân; he marched at the head of a powerful army against them, gave them battle, the 8th of the former Rabî, and overthrew them with very great slaughter. Helâl Ebn Obeid'allah himself was taken prisoner in the action, and thrown into irons. In fine, the victory was complete; the Seljûkian troops obliging the routed enemy to abandon their camp, and seizing upon every thing valuable they found therein².
- c

BEFORE the close of the present year, Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah, a writer of note, known Al Ta'âwîrî by the name, or surname, of Al Ta'âwîrî, departed this life. He was the author of many poems, as we learn from Ebn Shobnah, held amongst the Moslems in good esteem. For a specimen of those productions, we must beg leave to refer to that historian such of our readers as are capable of being entertained by this kind of oriental compositions³.

- d THE following year, being the 585th of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 20th, 1189, the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledîni'llah sent an ambassador to Salâh'addîn, requiring him to command his subjects to put up prayers for his son in all their mosques, as his successor in the Khalîfat; who arrived at Damascus, in the beginning of the former Rabî. With this request, the Soltân, who had spent the greatest part of Al Moharram at 'Acca, and entered Damascus either the 1st or 2d of Safar, readily complied. He soon after formed a design to make himself master of Shakîf Arnûn, a strong fortress in the neighbourhood of Bâniâs, or Paneas; and for that purpose put himself at the head of a large body of troops, with which he began his march from Damascus, the 3d of the former Rabî. That day he advanced to Marj Borgûth, where he halted till the 11th. From Marj Borgûth, after some of the reinforcements he expected were come up, he moved first to Bâniâs, and afterwards to Marj 'Aîlîn, where he took post the 17th. As Marj 'Aîlîn was in a manner contiguous to Shakîf Arnûn, and the Soltân soon formed a very powerful army out of the forces flocking to him from all parts hither; the Sâheb of Shakîf Arnûn was struck with terror at his approach, and therefore thought fit to have recourse to a finesse, in order to avert the impending storm. He came in a submissive manner to the Soltân's tent, called himself his Mamlûk, or slave, and promised to deliver up Shakîf Arnûn into his hands at the end of three months, by the expiration of which term he proposed to draw his family out of Tyre. The Soltân, satisfied with his conduct, granted him a truce for the time he desired, and soon after received the news of the dispositions made by the Franks for besieging 'Accâ. One of their detachments having entered the Moslem territories, bordering upon the district of Tyre; a party of the Soltân's men, occupying a neighbouring post, fell upon them with so much bravery that they forced them to retire, killed many of them upon the spot, and took a large number of them prisoners. As for the Moslems, they lost only a single man in the action; whose name, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, was Aybec Al Akbraish. He was one of Salâh'addîn's most valiant slaves, and extremely well versed in the military art; so that his death, if that author may be credited, was vastly regretted by the Soltân. This was followed by another brisk skirmish, in which the Moslems were worsted by the Franks; losing 180 men upon the field of battle, besides a very considerable number that fell into the enemy's hands.

Amongst the slain on the side of the Franks was a German, or Alamannic general; and on that of the Moslems Ebn Al Basār wā, a youth of uncommon merit. A third action happened not far from Tebnīn, a strong castle a little above 'Accā, the 8th of the latter Jomāda; wherein the Moslems killed ten of the Franks, with the loss (U) of only six men. The term for the evacuation of Shakīf Arnān being nearly elapsed, the Soltān advanced again to Marj 'Alīn, in order to take possession of that place. But Arnold, the Sāheb of the fortresses, being sent for by him, and commanded to admit a Moslem garrison, pretended, that his own troops would not permit him to abandon a post they thought themselves obliged in honour to defend. Whereupon the Soltān put him immediately under an arrest, had him conducted to Damascus under an escorte, and caused him there to be closely confined^a.

THE Franks, who had defended Jerusalem, and the other towns and fortresses taken by Salāb'addīn, against the Moslems, having retired to Tyre, formed a very numerous body of troops in that city. This proved not only the preservation of Tyre, but likewise greatly contributed to the re-establishment, at least for the present, of the affairs of the Franks. For, having received powerful succours from Europe, they took the field with an army of 30,000 foot, and 2000 horse. This was no sooner done, than the commander in chief of the Franks sent a detachment of his forces to Alexandretta; which drove a strong party of the Moslem infantry from thence, and posted themselves there, with inconsiderable loss. The Soltān having been informed, that the Franks were in motion, and directed their march towards 'Accā; he decamped from Al Shakīf, the 12th of Rajeb, though he did not even then perfectly penetrate their design. But receiving advice, that the Franks incamped the same day at 'Ain Bassa, and that the van of their army had reached Al Zīb; he wrote to all his governors of provinces, to join him without delay. The 13th, by break of day, he began to move, with the main body of the Moslem army, towards 'Accā, by the way of Tiberias; though a considerable part of the forces had orders to take the route of Tebnīn, which was nearer the enemy, that they might get early intelligence of their motions. Salāb'addīn having halted an hour at Al Hawla, to refresh his men, advanced afterwards to Al Munaiia, where he pitched his tents that night. Here news the next morning was brought him, that the Franks had invested 'Accā, where the Moslems had a garrison of 10,000 men, the day before. Upon the arrival of this news, he sent Arnold, the Sāheb of Al Shakīf, then his prisoner, under an escorte to Damascus; and the 14th he met the body of troops, that had taken the route of Tebnīn, in the plains of Sefforiya, or Sepphoris, where he found his baggage likewise arrived. The 15th he marched to Al Kherūba, at a small distance from the enemy's camp; from whence he moved immediately in order of battle to Tel Caifan, where the plains of 'Accā begin. Here he incamped, with his left wing extended to Al Nabr Al Halū, or the sweet river, and his right to Tel Al 'Ayādhiya, in such manner that the Franks, besieging 'Accā, were closely besieged by him, in their turn. After several slight skirmishes between the advanced parties of the two armies, now in sight of each other, a vigorous action happened, on the 1st of Shaabān. The Soltān having been joined by Modbaffero'ddīn Ebn Zīno'ddīn, Al Mālec Al Modbaffer, the Sāheb of Hamah, and many other commanders, and thereby become much superior in number to the Franks; the fight was renewed, and continued with the utmost fury, the two following days. Though the engagement, according to the Moslem writers, seems to have been pretty obstinate, nothing decisive happened on either side. However, the Soltān defeated a body of the enemy, on the 2d of Shaabān, penetrated to the gate of Karākūsh, which he entered, and threw a strong reinforcement of troops into the town. This, according to Abu'lfeda, was chiefly owing to the bravery of Al Mālec Al Modbaffer Takīo'ddīn, the Sāheb of Hamah; who broke through the Franks, posted towards the northern part of the city, and opened a passage into it for Abu'l Hījā, with the detachment destined for that purpose under his command. But, notwithstanding this advantage, Salāb'addīn found himself obliged, partly by the continual rains, and partly by the efforts of the enemy, though they were generally worsted, if any credit is due to the Moslem writers, to retire to Tel Al 'Ayādhiya, opposite to the besiegers camp, the 11th of the same month. Soon after he had taken post there, he lost Hosāmo'ddīn Dbimān, an officer of distinguished merit. The 16th, a party of the enemy's foragers were drawn into an ambuscade of Arab horse; who put them to the rout, cut many of them to pieces, and carried off with them most of the rest prisoners. The heads of the slain they brought to the Soltān; who rewarded every one of them with a magnificent vest, and also conferred other marks of his favour upon them. The same day, the besieged made a sally upon the

(U) One of the Moslems killed in this action was Al Emīr Rāmel, a youth of uncommon merit, and the leader of his tribe. His death, therefore, must have rendered the loss of the Moslems on this occasion more considerable than that of the Franks (1).

- a Franks, in which both sides sustained a considerable loss. Scarce a day passed without some skirmishes till either the 20th or 21st of Shabân, on which a bloody battle was fought. The Franks then attacked the Moslems with unparalleled bravery, made a great carnage of them, and pierced their main body, even to the Soltân's tent. However, if the Moslem historians merit any regard, the Franks not supporting their men, they were repulsed, and no less than 10,000 of them killed upon the spot. But this seems pretty remote from truth, as Salâb'addîn was constrained to retire to Al Kherûba; to which place the baggage had been sent on the 3d, or, as Abu'lfeda intimates, the 14th of Ramadân. The colouring given by the Moslem writers to this retreat, as though it was rendered necessary by a cholical disorder of the Soltân, in conjunction with another distemper, occasioned by the stench arising from the
- b dead bodies remaining on the field of battle, appears to be a mere pretext, framed purely to palliate a defeat (W). Be that as it will, in consequence of the unanimous opinion of the general officers of his army assembled in a council of war, the Soltân thought fit to remove his camp to Kherûba; where he staid seven days, for the recovery of his health, as well as to collect the shattered remains of the main body and right wing, which suffered most in the action, and to wait the arrival of his brother Al Mâlec Al 'Adel. It may not be improper to remark here, that according to Abu'lfeda, the Franks that broke the Soltân's main body, and penetrated to his tent, were all at last put to the sword; though both this writer and Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd agree, that some of the Moslem fugitives fled as far as Tiberias and Damascus. However, if Bobâo'ddîn merits any regard, the Soltân's left wing, with that
- c part of his right which could be rallied, beat the enemy back to their camp; though endeavouring to force this they were so roughly handled, that they could not be prevailed upon afterwards to return to the charge. It can by no means be doubted, but that the two last mentioned authors have handed down to us a very partial account of this engagement. For one of them affirms, that the number of the slain on the side of the Franks, amounted to 7,000 men, and the other, as has been just observed, swells it up to 10,000; whereas, if Bobâo'ddîn may be depended upon, only Ismael Al Mocabbis, Ebn Rawâba, Dhabro'ddîn, the brother of the Pakîb Isa, who commanded the corps de reserve that sustained the main body, and Al Emîr Mojalli, together with 150 common soldiers, were killed on the part of the Moslems. As the retreat, or rather flight, of the Soltân, and the dispersion of the largest part
- d of his forces, left the Franks at full liberty to pursue the operations of the siege with greater vigour than before; the relation of this conflict as penned by the Arab historians now before us, must be allowed to exceed the utmost limits of probability, and therefore we shall not expatiate any farther upon it. Whilst matters were in this situation, Al Mâlec Al 'Adel joined his brother Salâb'addîn with the Egyptian troops, and Hosâmo'ddîn Lûlû, the Moslem admiral, gained an advantage over the Christian fleet, took one of the ships of war of which it was composed, and brought it with him into the port of 'Accâ. The towers likewise erected before that place, of a vast height, by the Franks, in order to facilitate their approaches, and enable them to batter the walls of the town, were destroyed with naphtha, prepared by one Ebn Nejas of Baghdâd, together with all the soldiers upon them, several
- e times. All which accidents served more and more to animate the besieged; who so exerted themselves in the defence of the fortress, that it held out against the whole combined force of the Franks till the 17th of the latter Jomâda, 587^w.

- In the beginning of Safar, 585, the Soltân received a letter from his son Al Mâlec Al Other events of the year 585.
Dbâber at Aleppo, with an account that the emperor Frederic I. surnamed Barbarossa, and called Mâlec Al Alâman by the Arab writers, was upon his march to Constantinople, with an army of 200,000, or, according to other advices, 260,000 men, in order to invade the Moslem territories. Hereupon Salâb'addîn, who was not a little alarmed at this news, sent Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, as his ambassador, to the Sâbebs of Senjâr, Al Jazîra, Al Mawfel, and Arbel, ordering them to attend him with their troops; he being determined to assemble
- f all the forces of his empire, and act with them against the Franks, for the defence of Islâmîsm. He also dispatched the same person, as his minister, to the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledîni'l-lah, at Baghdâd; desiring the Moslem pontiff to concur with him, and the other princes here mentioned, in expediting all the measures that should be judged requisite for the support of their common religion. Bobâo'ddîn was well received at all the courts he visited on this occasion, and particularly by the most august Dirwân of Baghdâd. He returned to the Soltân the 5th of the former Rabî, the following year; and found that the aforesaid Sâbebs

(W) According to some of the authors followed by M. Renaudot, the Soltân was at this time intirely defeated by the Franks, and lost above 10,000 men. Nay this writer affirms, that the Moslem army was absolutely dispersed. But this must be allowed to run counter to what has been handed down to us, by the principal Arab historians, on that head (1).

had joined him with their respective contingents, as they had promised to do, before his arrival. Soon after Bobao'ddîn's departure, the Franks before 'Accâ, having been apprized, that the Soltân was gone a hunting, endeavoured to surprise the Moslem camp, then at a very considerable distance from them; but were so briskly received by Al Mâlec Al 'Adel, that they were repulsed with great loss, and obliged to retire, without having executed their design. However, many of Salâb'addîn's men were killed in the action, and no small number of them wounded. Argasb, one of the Soltân's Mamlûks, is ranked by Bobao'ddîn amongst the former; but we meet with no person of distinction, mentioned either by that author or any other, amongst the latter. Karâ Sonkar, a most valiant person, and likewise one of the Soltân's Mamlûks, was surrounded, indeed, by the Franks; but he cut his way through them, slew a multitude of them, and at last made his escape without being hurt. The Fakîb Isa, one of the Soltân's best ministers and generals, who shone with equal lustre in the cabinet and the field, died of a quincy and diarrhoea, at Al Kberûba, on Tuesday, the 9th of Dbu'lkaada, the present year. He was one of the companions of Al Sheikh Abu'l Kâsem Al Barezi, and justly esteemed in every part of the Moslem world, for his valour, prudence, and liberality. Ebn Shohnab relates, that the soldiers of which the army of the Franks was composed bore Sûrat Al Mafsîb, the figure, or Effigies, of the Messiah, if M. D'Herbelot in this point may be depended upon; and, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of that author, the remains of the Franks, that had been conducted to Tyre, sent the figure, or effigies, of the Messiah to their princes, that is, as it should seem, the Christian princes in Europe, when they solicited succours of them. And this is undoubtedly countenanced by Abu'lfeda himself, when he observes, that the Franks, who had formed a powerful army at Tyre, sent to their transmarine brethren for assistance; and expressed, or exhibited, the Sûrat of an Arab beating the Messiah, and making him bloody, intimating thereby that Mohammed treated the Messiah in such an ignominious manner. The Sûrat Al Mafsîb, therefore, if we chuse to follow Abu'lfeda in this point, seems not to have been merely the sign, or representation, of the cross, as M. D'Herbelot pretends. The women also of the Franks, some of whom Ebn Shohnab insinuates to have been transported to Europe, greatly animated their countrymen against the enemies of the Christian name, notwithstanding Egypt was in a manner drained of its forces, and the people of that country not extremely well affected to the Soltân, yet no commotions at this time happened there; though several unknown persons endeavoured to excite the citizens of Al Kâbirab to a revolt, in favour of the Fâtemites, but without effect, the preceding year*.

the Soltân.

THE next year, being the 586th of the Hejra, which began Feb. 9th, 1190, the Sâheb of Sidon, who commanded in Al Shakîf, or Shakîf Arnân, having no prospect of relief, and expecting, with his whole garrison, to be put to the sword, if the place was taken by storm, on the 15th of the former Rabî, demanded to capitulate. He offered to leave all the baggage, and the military chest, to the Moslems, if the Soltân would permit him and the garrison to march out in safety to Tyre. Which being granted, he immediately evacuated the fortress, and was conducted by a detachment of the Soltân's troops to the above-mentioned city. About the same time, an ambassador arrived at the Soltân's camp from the Khalîf, with two load of naphtha, to be conveyed to 'Accâ, together with some engineers, to play the flames formed of those combustible materials upon the besiegers towers and machines. He also brought with him an order from the Khalîf, authorizing the Soltân to borrow of certain merchants the sum of 20,000 dinârs, in the name of the most august Dîwân of Baghdâd, that he might be thereby enabled to carry on the war with greater vigour against the Franks†.

siege of 'Accâ.

THE Soltân receiving advice, that the Franks pushed on the siege of 'Accâ, with the utmost vivacity; he made the proper dispositions for obliging them to abandon that enterprize, without delay. For this purpose, he moved from Al Kberûba, and advanced to Tel Al 'Ajûl, where he pitched his camp. He was soon joined by his son Al Mâlec Al Dbâber Gayâtho'ddîn Gâzi, the Sâheb of Aleppo, with a select body of cavalry; and by Modbaffero'ddîn Ebn Zîno'ddîn, a general of transcendent merit, with his light horse. In the mean time, the Franks had almost filled up the ditch of the town, and brought three wooden towers, strengthened with iron, resembling mountains in their height, nearer the walls. Each of these towers, which were much higher than the walls, was sixty cubits long, and had between 5 and 600 men posted in it, together with a proper number of arms and military machines. They were carried on wheels, and covered with the hides of oxen, soaked in mud and vinegar, that they might be rendered thereby incombustible, and proof against fire. However, a young man of Damascus, a brazier, found means, by discharging upon him a sufficient quantity of naphtha, prepared by him in a proper manner, out of some brass pots, to reduce them to ashes, together with all the soldiers, arms, and machines, that they contained.

Soon

- a Soon after this happy event, 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd, the Sâheb of Sinjâr, 'Sinjâr Shâh Ebn Saifo'ddîn Gazi Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Ja'ira, 'Alâo'ddîn Ebn Mas'ûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, and Zîna'ddîn Yusef Ebn Ali Ebn Bohtakin, the Sâheb of Arbel, arrived with their respective contingents at the Soltân's camp. But notwithstanding these favourable circumstances, which not a little elated the Moslems, 'Accâ was in imminent danger of falling into the hands of the Franks; the garrison being reduced almost to the last extremity, for want of provisions. At this critical juncture, the Egyptian fleet arrived on the coast of Syria, engaged that of the Franks, defeated it, and took one of their largest ships; putting all the men they found therein, both sailors and soldiers, to the sword. They also seized upon a smaller vessel, coming from Constantinople, and made prisoners all they found on board.
- b After which, the Moslem admiral triumphantly entered the port of 'Accâ, and supplied the garrison with every thing they stood in need of; who, animated by so many instances of success, made a furious sally upon the besiegers, to facilitate the introduction of their fleet into the haven of 'Accâ, killed and wounded abundance of their men, and then retired into the town, without having sustained any very considerable loss. A body of the Soltân's troops also attacked part of the army of the Franks, gained an advantage over it, and had entirely defeated it, had not the night interposed. About this time, Salâb'addîn received a letter from Bar Cricor Ebn Bâsîl, or the son of Gregory, the son of Basil, the Armenian general, and governor of the fortrefs of Al Rûm, upon the western bank of the Euphrates, relative to the march of the emperor Frederic I. against him, to the following effect.
- c "Malec Al Alamân, or the emperor of Germany, said this officer, having penetrated through Hungary and Greece, and obliged both the sovereigns of those countries to furnish him with what men and money he was pleased to demand, passed the Hellespont in some ships; which he forced Malec Al Rûm, or the Greek emperor, after he had extorted from that prince fifty talents of silver, and as many of gold, and taken with him his brother, his son, and forty of his most intimate friends, as hostages, to supply him with. Those hostages, continued he, Malec Al Alamân carried with him till he had passed Al Malec Kilij Arslân's frontiers; but then he dismissed them, and, after three days march, was met by a body of the Turkmâns of Al Awj. There, coming to a rupture with him, they harrassed his troops for thirty-three days together. He at last, however, approached Koniya, or Iconium, not far from which place Kolbbo'ddîn, the son of Kilij Arslân, gave him battle: after an obstinate engagement, that prince was overthrown with incredible slaughter. But Malec Al Alamân afterwards routed and dispersed another numerous Moslem army, that was sent against him; and took the city of Koniya, or Iconium, sword in hand. Here he staid five days, treated with uncommon cruelty the Persian Moslems settled in this place, and concluded a treaty of peace, or rather entered into an alliance with Kilij Arslân; who persuaded him to advance to Tarsus. In the mean time, Ebn Lâûn thought it expedient to dispatch the Mamlûc Hâtem, with many of his friends, to wait upon Malec Al Alamân, confer with him on his march, and endeavour to prevail upon him, if possible, to return into the territories of Kilij Arslân. But this, added Bar Cricor, being found impracticable; Ebn Lâûn made the proper dispositions for meeting Malec Al Alamân himself, and having a conference with him. He was diverted, however, from carrying into execution this design, by the news, which soon after reached him, of that prince's death; who, by bathing in a river (the Cydnus, that runs to Tarsus), the water of which was extremely cold, contracted a distemper, that carried him off in a few days. Ebn Lâûn, being informed of this, retired to one of his castles, and there prepared for his defence. But Malec Al Alamân's son, who succeeded his father, both in the empire and the command of the army, assuring him, that his father proposed nothing more by this expedition, than the performance of the pilgrimage to Al Kuds, and that he would treat in an hostile manner only those who should refuse their submission to him; the Armenian, or Cilician, prince was hereby induced to declare himself one of his dependents and allies. He could not well, indeed, then have taken any other step; not being in a condition to face the young Malec Al Alamân, whose army consisted of 42,000 cuirassiers, and a most formidable body of infantry, disciplined in a very perfect manner." He concluded his letter with a more particular account of the troops of which the imperial army was composed, and the severity of the discipline they observed; promising the Soltân, whose Mamlûk and slave he professed himself to be, that he would transmit him a true and faithful narrative of their future motions. Upon the arrival of this news, a privy-council was immediately called; wherein, without the least opposition or debate, it was determined, that part of the Soltân's forces should be employed against the Greeks, and the other part endeavour to impede the operations of the Franks before 'Accâ, and straiten them in their camp. In consequence of this decision, the Soltân detached Nâsero'ddîn Ebn Takîo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Manbij, with a body of troops, towards the frontiers of Armenia and Cilicia, who was followed successively by Azzo'ddîn Ebn Al Mokaddem, the Sâheb of Cafer-Tâb, Bârin, and other cities, Mojo'ddîn, the Sâbeb of Baalbec, and Sâbiko'ddin, the Sâbeb of Sbaizar, with large detachments, who took the same route. The forces of Aleppo and Hamah marched after these, with all possible celerity; as did also Al Malec Al Afdal, and Bedro'ddin, the governor of Damascus. Al Malec Al Dbâber was likewise dispatched to Aleppo, in order to watch the enemy's motions, and cover the adjacent territory from their depredations. Al Malec Al Modbaffer was appointed to guard the frontiers, that seemed to be the most exposed, and to repel on that side all the enemy's incursions. The Soltân then commanded Al Malec Al 'Adel to join him with his troops, in order to replace those that had been sent against the Greeks. That general was put at the head of the right wing, in the room of Takio'ddin; by the departure of whose detachment, that wing had been greatly weakened. The command of the left wing was, at the same time, assigned 'Amâdo'ddin Zenki Ebn Mawdûd, the Sâbeb of Sinjâr. Modbaffero'ddin, the Sâbeb of Harrân, Al Malec Dbâber, before he set out for Aleppo, and many others of the Soltân's principal officers, were visited by a grievous malady, that spread itself over the Moslem camp; but was not attended with any bad consequences, no person of note dying of it. The case was different with the Franks, of whom a pestilential distemper, that raged in their camp, swept away very considerable numbers. Notwithstanding which, they continued their attacks against 'Acca; the Soltân not being able, though his arms had been attended with so much success since the opening of the campaign, to force them to abandon the siege^a.
- g

The Franks

Malec Al
'Adel, but are repulsed.

THE young Malec Al Alamân having ordered the Christian army, under his command, to advance to Antioch, took post himself in the territories of Ebn Lâûn, with only forty Templars, and twenty-five other knights. That his forces might march with the greater celerity and expedition, they were divided into three bodies. One of these taking the route of Bagrâs or Pagræ; the Moslem garrison of that place, though small, sallied out upon them, and made 200 of them prisoners. This was, however, occasioned by their either being sick, or in want of horses and mules, to enable them to keep up with the others; most of the animals of that kind belonging to the Christians having died, since their arrival in Asia. The Soltân's governors of towns and districts in Syria, having received advice of the approach of the Christian army, detached a body of troops to reconnoitre them, and observe their motions. This detachment surprized a strong party of the enemy's foragers, killed and took prisoners about 500 of them, and acquired a very large quantity of spoil. At this time, Bar Crîkor, the Armenian commandant of Al Rûm, wrote again to Salâh'ddin; giving him a particular account of the bad plight the Christians, moving towards the frontiers of Syria, then were in. He informed him, that they were indeed numerous; but that, being oppressed with famine, they had been obliged to feed upon their horses, so that a few of them only were left. To which he added, that they had been forced to burn most of their arms; having been in a manner destitute of fuel, and reduced to the necessity of remaining, for some days, incamped upon a very insalubrious spot of ground. To crown all these misfortunes, the general who had been detached towards Antioch died on his march. Nay we are told by Abu'lfeda, that, after the demise of the old Malec Al Alamân (M), a very considerable part of the Christian forces returned home; that a famine and the plague, together with the fatigues they found themselves obliged to sustain, made a dreadful havock amongst them; and that, by reason of these dismal calamities, of the whole Greek army, which at first amounted to 100,000 men, not above 1000, under the orders of the young Malec Al Alamân, reached the camp before 'Accâ. These misfortunes, however, did not hinder frequent skirmishes between the Soltân's troops and those of the Franks; which continued, with little intermission, till Wednesday, the 20th of the latter Jomâda, when a very brisk and vigorous action happened. The Franks then attacked the Egyptian forces, under the command of Al Malec Al 'Adel, that formed the right wing of the Soltân's army, with so much bravery, that they penetrated to Al Malec Al 'Adel's tent, and even obliged him to give ground. But, amusing themselves with plundering that part of the camp they had entered, they gave him

(M) According to Bar Crîkor, the Armenian commandant of Al Rûm, the emperor, or old Malec Al Alamân, died of a distemper he contracted, by bathing himself in the Cydus, a river issuing out of Mount Taurus, and passing by Tarsus; the water of which was so extremely cold, that Alexander the Great, in his war against Darius, going to cool himself therein, found his body so benumbed with cold, that he must have perished, had not that faithful, though suspected, physician, Philip, relieved him. If Vitruvius in this point may be credited, notwithstanding what has been observed, the water of it formerly cured the gout, by being applied to the legs of the person afflicted with that terrible distemper. In conformity to what has been handed down to us on this head by the antients, Bar Crîkor clearly intimated to the Soltân, that the intense coldness of the water brought upon the emperor the disorder that occasioned his death; though, if we prefer Abu'lfeda's authority to that of Bohâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, we must allow him to have been drowned (1).

- a time to rally, and by that means enabled him to wrest the victory out of their hands. For putting himself, with Al Tawāshi Kāymāz Al Nojmi, again at the head of the Egyptian troops, and being reinforced by those of Al Mawfel, of which the main body was for the most part composed; he returned to the charge, fell upon the enemy with such fury, that he intirely defeated them, and even pursued them to their camp. Nay, says Abu'lfeda, if the Soltān had not been detained by a violent fit of the cholic in his tent, the victory would have been in all respects decisive, and the enemy completely ruined. It nevertheless proved a terrible blow to the Franks, who are said by Bobāo'ddīn Ebn Sheddād to have had above 8000 men killed on the spot; the Soltān, in order to strike a terror into the enemy, having forbidden any quarter to be given. This, however, seems to be no small amplification of the affair; it being, perhaps, not much more credible that the Franks should lose 8000 men, in this action, than that only ten of the Moslems should have been therein slain, as this author scruples not to affirm. The following day, towards evening, a letter arrived from Aleppo; importing, that the troops of that state had cut off the retreat of a large body of the enemy, which had advanced towards the confines of the Moslem territories on that side, in order to ravage them; insomuch that scarce a single man of them had escaped. The same day, came Kāymāz Al Harrāni to the Soltān, with overtures of peace from the Franks; who were so weakened, that they found themselves incapable of carrying on the war against the Soltān, and therefore begged he would send a minister to settle with them the terms of an accommodation. This was the situation of their affairs, when count Henry arrived, with a powerful reinforcement of troops, and an ample supply of money, arms, corn, and other provisions, on board a numerous fleet, from Europe, to their relief. His arrival revived their drooping spirits, and animated them to such a degree, that they resolved to attack the Soltān with their whole combined force; to avoid which he was constrained to retire to Al Kherūba, the 27th of the latter Jomāda, and incamp there. However, he kept open a communication with the Moslem garrison of 'Accā; letters passing and repassing between his camp and the town, carried partly by pigeons, partly by swimmers, and partly by men in small skiffs, who came out privately, by favour of the night, and stole into the place. About this time, an ambassador arrived from Constantinople, to supply the place of one that reached the Soltān's camp at Marj 'Aīn, in the month of Rajeb, and soon after died, the preceding year. This minister brought with him an answer to the letter wrote by the Soltān to the Greek emperor, wherein he acquainted him with his former ambassador's death. The purport of the new minister's commission chiefly was to desire Salāb'addīn, in the name of the emperor, to transmit to Constantinople all his predecessor's effects, that they might be divided amongst the members of his family; to inform him, that though the Alamāns, or Germans, had forced a passage through his country; they had suffered much more than his subjects, and were then in so miserable a condition, that they could neither greatly hurt his people, nor assist the Franks; and to assure him, that he had hitherto reaped no other advantage from the friendship contracted with him, than to render himself thereby the principal object of the hatred and aversion of the Franks. Salāb'addīn received likewise a letter from the emperor himself (N), delivered to him by this minister, setting forth the same things; with the contents of which, perfectly agreeing with what had been related to him, he was vastly pleased. The Greek ambassador, therefore, who understood Arabic and the language of the

(N) This was Isaac II. surnamed Angelus; whose letter to the Soltān, according to Bobāo'ddīn Ebn Sheddād, was conceived in the following terms. " Isaac, the king, believing in the MESSIAH, who is God, crowned by God, always august, the most powerful and invincible emperor, the autocrator of the Greeks, Angelus, to Salāb'addīn, the Soltān of Egypt, friendship and dilection. Your eminence's letter sent to our majesty reached us in due time: we have read it, and understand from thence, that our ambassador is dead. We are sorry that he died in a foreign country, without having executed the commission to your eminence that our majesty intrusted him with. It is necessary now that your eminence should dispatch a minister to our majesty, who may bring the body and all the effects of our late ambassador with him, that the latter may be distributed amongst his children and relations. We doubt not, but the bad rumours concerning the irruption of the Germans into our dominions have reached your eminence's ears. These false reports have been propagated by the enemy themselves, in order to serve a particular purpose. If you will believe us, they have suffered much more " than our subjects. They have been in a manner " drained of their money, beasts of burden, and men;

 " most of the latter of which have either been carried " off by malignant distempers, or killed. They have " been so weakened, that they will scarce escape being " cut to pieces by our garrisons, and will therefore
 " probably not be able to advance to your frontiers;
 " but if they should pass them, you will find them so " exhausted, that they will not be capable either of " much hurting your subjects, or procuring any considerable " advantages to themselves. Why are you
 " so forgetful of the alliance subsisting betwixt us, that " your eminence has communicated nothing to our majesty " concerning your intentions and designs. It is " very apparent to our majesty, that hitherto we have " reaped no other advantage from the friendship cultivated
 " with you, than thereby to have drawn upon
 " ourselves the hatred and indignation of the Franks." This curious anecdote having not been preserved by any of the western writers, our learned and inquisitive readers will undoubtedly be pleased with finding an insertion of it here (1).

Franks, as well as his own mother-tongue, met with a most gracious reception from the Soltân; who treated him with uncommon marks of distinction, and assured him of his particular esteem. In the mean time, the Franks, who had been joined by count Henry with 10,000 men, and strengthened after that junction by another reinforcement from Europe, redoubled their efforts to possess themselves of 'Accâ; playing incessantly with their military machines, out of which they discharged stones of an enormous size, upon the town, with such activity and success, that it seemed to be in the most imminent danger of falling into their hands^b.

The garrison of 'Accâ continues to make a vigorous defence.

NOTWITHSTANDING the reiterated furious attacks of the Franks, who exerted themselves now more than ever in pushing on the siege of 'Accâ; Al Emir Bobâo'ddîn Karâkûsh and Al Emîr Hosâmo'ddîn Abu'l Hijâ, who commanded the Moslem garrison there, continued to make a vigorous defence. In the month of Rajeb, a strong party of their men sallied out upon the enemy, killed seventy of them upon the spot, burnt their machines, and then returned triumphantly into the town. They likewise took a very considerable number of prisoners in the action; amongst whom there was a person of distinction, for whose ransom the Franks offered an exceeding large sum. But the Moslem who had seized him cut off his head, and exposed his body to the view of the enemy's camp. After which, the Franks were harassed without intermission by the Arab horse, until the middle of Shaabân; when one night a detachment of the garrison rushed out upon the besiegers, set fire to a vast engine, erected by count Henry, which, according to the report of spies and deserters, cost him 1500 dinârs, and reduced it, together with a smaller one near it, to ashes. The Franks, not in the least apprehensive of such a visit, were prodigiously affected by this unexpected disaster; looking upon these machines as secure, by reason of their distance from the city. The besieged likewise, towards the end of Rajeb, received a seasonable supply of 400 sacks of meal, cheese, onions, sheep, and other provisions; when they were reduced to great straits for want of food. The seamen that navigated the ships of Bayrût, or Berytus, which carried this supply to 'Accâ, entered the port by a stratagem; being disguised in the Frank habit, and having crosses on their pendants, and hogs on board. The Soltân also sent the garrison 1000 dinârs by one Isa, a diver, a person frequently employed on such occasions, who was unhappily drowned in his passage; though the money reached the troops, being deposited in three bladders tied to his body, which was a few days after thrown ashore near the town. This event, which happened towards the close of Rajeb, was followed by another not less prosperous to the besieged. The Franks, having fixed two of their largest engines near the city, battered the walls with so much fury, that they must soon have been levelled with the ground, had not the garrison discharged two spears, or fire-darts, with red hot points upon one of them; which set it on fire, and, notwithstanding all attempts to hinder this, reduced it to ashes. The flames being likewise communicated to the other, it met with the same fate. In the mean time, the young Malec Al Alamân, having possessed himself of Antioch, and left his treasures there, made the proper dispositions for advancing to 'Accâ, without delay. Accordingly, the 25th of Rajeb, he began his march for that place; taking the route of Laodicea, and being met by the marquis of Montferrat, the Sâheb of Tyre, the most warlike and politic of all the princes of the Franks, before he reached Tripoli. The marquis had before sent into Europe a draught, or delineation, of Al Kuds, and in it a true representation of the Temple of the Resurrection, with a Moslem on horseback treading, says the author now before us, on the sepulchre of the Messiah; the visitation of which was the principal object of the pilgrimage, performed by the Christians, to Al Kuds. To animate the western Christians the more against the Moslems, the horse was represented as conspurcating with urine the spot where the Messiah was buried. This, continues he, produced in Europe the desired effect; an infinite number of people, incensed to the last degree against the Moslems by this picture, lifting themselves under the banner of Malec Al Alamân. The son of that prince was at this time conducted along the sea-coast, by the Sâheb of Tyre; who was afraid lest his troops should have been harassed by the enemy, if he had marched through the districts of Haleb, or Aleppo, and Hamab. However, neither did they so escape intirely the evil they were apprehensive of. For Al Malec Al Modhaffer with his forces kept close at their heels, frequently attacked them, and insulted their rear. Nay that general is reported by a certain Moslem writer so to have harassed them, that they must all have been infallibly cut to pieces, had he been joined by Al Malec Al Dbâber. This will not appear improbable, if the European reinforcement did not, as he asserts, exceed 5000 men, and had not above sixty horses, that were almost starved with hunger, at their departure from Laodicea for Jibla, Jebela, or Jabala, to which place they proposed to direct their march. Several of them were killed and taken prisoners by the Moslem parties, before their arrival at Tripoli; of which the Soltân received advice, the 5th of Shaabân. About the middle of that month,

- a three ships from Egypt entered the port of 'Accâ, with a copious supply of provisions, munitions of war, and every thing requisite to enable the garrison to sustain a siege till the following spring; when Bobâo'ddîn Karâkûsh was upon the point of surrendering, for want of such a supply. This so irritated the Franks, that they attempted, with three ships, and some forces on board, to make themselves masters of the Tower of Flies, built upon a rock in the midst of the sea, at the mouth of the harbour, which commanded the port; but without effect, they having lost all their vessels and men in the attempt, the 22d of Sbaabîn. The young Malec Al Alamân staid some time at Tripoli, to refresh his troops; and then sent them to the camp before 'Accâ; intending to follow them himself, with all convenient speed. Pursuant, therefore, to the directions of the marquis of Montferrat, who absolutely governed his coun-
- b cils, he went by sea to Tyre, where he remained with the marquis till the 6th of Ramadân; when, with a few companions only, he set sail for 'Accâ, and soon arrived there in good health. Not long after his arrival, he advanced at the head of a strong detachment to the hill Al 'Ayâdiya, opposite to that on which the Franks were incamped, and attacked a considerable body of the enemy posted there. The Soltân, finding the action to grow very warm, moved himself to Tel Caifin, to support his men that were engaged; which being observed by the young Malec Al Alamân, he thought fit to retire to the Christian camp. The Moslems, in this skirmish, had only two men killed; though, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, many more of them were wounded. But the Franks, as the same biographer informs us, sustained a much more considerable loss. However, they resumed the operations of the siege with the utmost vigour. They prepared two machines of a new invention, and most enormous size, to batter the walls of the city; and erected a moveable tower, pointed with iron, on some ships of a stupendous magnitude, with which, attended by a proper number of other engines, scaling-ladders, &c. they intended, if possible, to storm the Tower of Flies. But, on Monday, the 3d of Ramadân, the garrison sallied out of all the gates at once, drove the besiegers from the two huge machines, that had been brought close to the walls, and burnt them; as they did also the ships, engines, scaling-ladders, &c. that had been prepared to facilitate the reduction of the aforesaid tower, the 15th of the same month. The next day, the Soltân, who had been for some time sick of a bilious fever, received a letter, by a pigeon, from Aleppo; importing, that Al Malec Al Dbâher's generals had drawn the Sâheb of Antioch,
- d who had undertaken an expedition against the Moslem territories, into an ambuscade, put seventy-five of his men to the sword, and made a multitude of them prisoners. As for the Sâheb of Antioch himself, he escaped to Shîba; and, after the retreat of the Moslem troops, retired to his capital. Soon after, two of the enemy's vessels, with several women, and children, on board, besides a good number of sheep, and a large quantity of other provisions, were driven into the hands of the Moslems, by stress of weather. But the Franks soon made themselves ample amends for this loss, by intercepting a pinnace, laden with money and recruits for the garrison of 'Accâ. The Soltân being still in an exceeding bad state of health, and both spies and deserters unanimously agreeing, that the Franks were determined to attack him immediately with their whole combined force; he resolved to withdraw to mount Shaferam, and take post there. On the top of that mountain he, therefore, incamped, the 19th of Ramadân.
- e This nevertheless did not discourage the troops in 'Accâ; which still continued to repel the efforts of the besiegers with so much bravery, that there was little probability of their soon becoming masters of the place^c.

f THE Soltân having pitched his camp on the summit of mount Shaferam, about three miles from the city of 'Accâ; the Franks, notwithstanding their apparent superiority, laid aside the design they had formed of forcing him to a battle. He had no sooner occupied his new camp, than Zîno'ddîn Yusef Ebn Zîno'ddîn Ali Cawjec, the Sâheb of Arbel, fell sick of a double fever, which attacked him at different hours; with which he struggled till the 28th of Ramadân, and then expired at Nazareth, in the very flower of his age. The Soltân appointed his brother Modbaffero'ddîn Cawcabûri, who was with him at the time of his death, to succeed him at Arbel; but deprived him of the cities of Al Robâ, or Edeffa, and Harrân, which he was possessed of before. Salâb'addîn likewise gave him the town of Shabrezûr, with its district; and conferred upon Al Malec Al Modbaffer Takîo'ddîn Omar, his nephew, the government of those territories over which Modbaffero'ddîn had presided before Zîno'ddîn's demise. These were Al Robâ, or Edeffa, Harrân, Someisât, or Samosata, and the territory of Al Mawzer, in Al Jazira, or Mesopotamia, wherein the city of Nasîbîn is seated; all which were annexed to Mayyâfârakîn, Hamah, Maara, Salamiya, Manbij, the castle of Nojm, Jebela, Al Lâdikîa, or Laodicea, Blâtanus, or Platanus, and Bagrâs, or Pagræ, with their respective dependencies, which he possessed at that time. Al Malec Al Modbaffer arrived at the Soltân's camp, the 3d of Shawâl, and brought back with him by compulsion Moezzo'ddin Sinjâr Shâb Ebn Saifo'ddin Gâzi Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki, the Sâheb of Al Jazîra; who had separated from the Moslem army, and marched almost as far as Tiberias, in his way home, contrary to the express order of the Soltân. The spirit of mutiny and disaffection likewise disposed 'Amâdo'ddin Zenki to demand his dismissal of the Soltân, together with the money due to his troops, in an insolent and imperious manner; but he was prevailed upon at last, partly by fair means and partly by force, to desist from his demands. In the mean time, the Franks being not a little distressed for want of provisions in their camp, as well as in several parts of the country belonging to them, a sack of meal selling at Antioch for ninety-six Tyrian dinârs; count Henry and the marquis of Montferrat advanced to Ras Al Mâ, a place at no great distance from the source of the river of 'Accâ, with a large detachment of their forces, to bring the Soltân to a battle. But finding this impracticable, and having lost no inconsiderable number of men in several smart skirmishes, that happened between them and the Moslem troops, they returned to the camp; where they had left the young Malec Al Alamân, with the other part of the army, to carry on the siege. The Soltân likewise, who had not yet recovered his health, re-occupied his former camp; from whence he had withdrawn his men, in order to observe the motions of the Franks. About this time, a reinforcement from Europe joined the Franks; which, however, did not hinder a party of them from being drawn into an ambuscade, and defeated, by a detachment of Moslem-troops, the 22d of Shawâl. Amongst the prisoners taken in this action were one of the French king's generals and his treasurer, who probably arrived with the last succours at the camp before 'Accâ. The Soltân treated them with uncommon marks of distinction, and assigned them a magnificent tent next to his own. He also ordered them all kinds of refreshments, and even sometimes permitted the general to eat with him at his own table. After which, he commanded them to be conducted honourably to Damascus, gave them leave to write to their master, and allowed them to supply themselves with every thing they stood in need of from the Christian camp. The operations of the campaign being at an end, the Soltân's army began now to separate, that the troops of which it was composed might retire into winter-quarters. 'Amâdo'ddin, the Sâheb of Sinjâr, and his nephew Sinjâr Shâb, the Sâheb of Al Jazîra, set out on their return home, the 25th of Shawâl; the Soltân having given each of them a royal vest, besides other valuable presents, as tokens of his approbation of their former conduct. Alâo'ddin, the son of the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, departed, the beginning of Dhu'lkaada, for his father's court; having been honoured by the Soltân, in the same manner as the two above-mentioned princes. Al Malec Al Modbaffer staid till the beginning of the following year, as did also Al Malec Al Dhâber; the latter of them taking his leave of the Soltân, the 9th of Al Mobarram, and the former, the 3d of Safar, in that year. Towards the close of Dhu'lkaada, 586, Zulfetdâr paid his respects in person to Salâh'addîn; and begged he would, by a rescript, cause to be restored to him some territories in the provinces of Nasîbîn and Al Khâbûr, of which he had been unjustly deprived. This being readily granted, and a rich vest delivered to him, he went away, extremely well pleased with the justice, magnanimity, and munificence of the Soltân.

The Soltân changes the garrison of 'Accâ.

THE 587th year of the Hejra, which commenced Jan. 29th, 1191, produced several remarkable events, that have not escaped the notice of the eastern writers. The sea having been exceeding rough, by reason of the boisterous weather, at 'Accâ, during the month of Dhu'l-hajja, the preceding year; the Franks removed all their ships to Tyre, which was a safer and more commodious port. The sea being, therefore, open, the Soltân easily threw a body of fresh troops, under the command of Al Emîr Saifo'ddin Ali Ebn Ahmed Al Haccâri Al Mash-tûb, into the place. However, as Al Emîr Bobâo'ddin Karâkûsh and Al Emîr Hosâmo'ddin Abu'l Hijâ, with the former garrison, had sustained so many fatigues, in the defence of the town; they were withdrawn from thence, and carried to Haifâ, where Al Malec Al 'Adel had posted himself with his army, in order to protect the ships passing to, and repassing from, 'Accâ, with the forces on board, from any nocturnal insult of the enemy. As Haifâ was seated near the spot from whence the Soltân's ships set sail for 'Accâ, such a position of Al Malec Al 'Adel's body of troops was judged requisite to facilitate the introduction of a new garrison into that city; which was effected, according to Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, the 10th of Al Mobarram, the present year. The good success that attended this enterprize, made some amends for the loss of seven Moslem transports from Egypt, together with sixty sailors, that navigated them, and a vast quantity of corn and money on board for the garrison of 'Accâ a little before; those ships having been all dashed to pieces either against a rock or one another, by the violence of the winds, the 2d of Dhu'l-hajja, the preceding year. This disaster the besieged could not forbear considering as an ill omen, portending the speedy reduction of the city. The ships being lost within sight of the town, the garrison had taken post on the sea-

- a shore, in order to cover the debarkation of their cargoes, and convey the corn, which would have supported both the soldiers and the people in 'Accâ a whole year, into the place. This gave the Franks an opportunity of making a general assault with the utmost fury; but, one of their scaling-ladders by a fatal accident being broke, they were repulsed with great slaughter by the inhabitants, and driven back by them even to their very camp. However, a considerable part of the walls falling down suddenly in the night of the 7th of Dbu'lbajja; the besiegers, finding the breach made by this unexpected event practicable, and the remainder of the walls in a ruinous condition, attempted again to carry the fortrefs by storm. The Moslems looked upon this misfortune as another ill omen, and were at first not a little affected by it; but they soon recovered themselves out of the panic into which they had been thrown, and so exerted themselves, that they once more obliged the besiegers to retire. After which, they repaired the walls, and put the place into as good a posture of defence as it had been in before. The Franks being in vast want of provisions, a multitude of deserters from their camp came in to the Soltân; who employed them, at their own request, in cruising upon the enemy, and assigned them a ship for that purpose. They met with success in this employment, taking several merchant-men bound to the enemy's camp; some of which, that had a large quantity of money, plate, and other rich effects on board, were exceeding valuable prizes. The money and plate, which included a silver table, the captors brought to the Soltân, the 13th of Dbu'lbajja, together with all the prisoners that had fallen into their hands. But he returned every thing of value to them; it being a sufficient satisfaction to him and the Moslems, that the Franks with so much alacrity plundered and pillaged one another. In the mean time, the inclemency of the season produced a pestilence in the Christian camp; which raged with prodigious violence, and, together with the famine swept away 100, 200, and sometimes more, men in a day. Of this dreadful distemper died the young Malec Al Alamân, or, as he is called by Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, Ebn Malec Al Alamân, the 22d of Dbu'lbajja, 586, to the inconceivable regret of the Franks. The enemy likewise lost another of their principal commanders, and count Henry himself for some time lay at the point of death. The Moslems took two barks, with fifty men in them, the 24th of the same month; and another, the day following, wherein they found a garment covered with pearls, that had formerly been one of the ornaments of Malec Al Alamân. They also met in this small vessel with that prince's nephew, whom they immediately threw into irons. Asado'ddîn Shairacûb Ebn Nâfero'ddîn Mohammed, the Sâheb of Hems, penetrated into the enemy's country as far as Tripoli, and carried off with him 400 horses, and 100 oxen, grazing in a meadow contiguous to that city; all which, except forty horses, that died upon the road, he brought to Hems, the 4th of Safar, 587, without losing a man. Two skirmishes happened between detachments of the Christian and Moslem armies, the 3d and 9th of the former Rabî, of little or no consequence to either side. A party of the Moslems also picked up forty-five prisoners in the neighbourhood of Bayrût, or Beyrût; amongst whom was an old man, come from Europe to perform the pilgrimage to The Church of the Resurrection at Al Kuds. These being conducted to the Soltân's tent, he courteously dismissed the old man; though his sons, who were children, would have begged leave of their father to kill him. The instances of success mentioned here, especially the introduction of a new garrison into 'Accâ, with corn for a whole year, proved extremely agreeable to the Soltân. They seem, however, to have been too inconsiderable to merit the attention of that prince; since the relief so luckily afforded 'Accâ, the most important of them, as the body of troops thrown into that fortrefs scarce amounted to half the forces withdrawn from thence, if Abu'lfeda in this point may be depended upon, did principally contribute to the loss of the place ^a.

These two bodies were gradually followed by all the others expected to join the Soltân. With regard to the Franks, they also received powerful succours from Europe. *Philip II. (Y) This Philip is said to have been looked upon by the Franks as superior to Richard, king of England, with respect to the extent of his dominions, and his dignity; but as much inferior to him in point of wealth, and military virtue. Notwithstanding which, Philip's

lec Al Fransis, arrived with a supply of men money, horses, provisions, &c. on board six ships (Z), the 23d of the former Rabî, and immediately proceeded to the camp before 'Accâ. Soon after his arrival, says Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, a most beautiful white falcon, that he brought with him from home, flew off his hand to the top off the walls of 'Accâ, where it was taken by some soldiers of the garrison, and sent to the Soltân; who refused to restore it to the king, though he offered for it no less than 1000 dinârs. Count Forond, an excellent officer, who had distinguished himself on several occasions, also appeared at the head of some troops, destined to act in favour of the Franks. In the mean time, Richard I. king of England, for his great courage, surnamed Cœur de Lion, and going amongst the Arab historians under the appellation of Malec Al Anketâr (A), who had undertaken the Crusade, made a descent on the island of Cyprus, with an intention to possess himself of it. But meeting with a vigorous resistance, he found himself obliged to have recourse to king Guy of Lusignan, and his brother Geffrey, or Geoffrey, who then presided over the remains of the Franks, for assistance. Whereupon, according to Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, those princes sent him 160 horse, to enable him to carry his point. Towards the close of the latter Rabî, a letter from Bayrût, or Berytus, brought advice, that five English ships, and a small bark, with a considerable number of men and women, forty horses, a large quantity of provisions, implements of various kinds, wood, and other things, had fallen into the enemy's hands. This, however, did not hinder the Franks from pushing on the siege of 'Accâ. They erected seven new machines, and began to play with them, the 14th of the former Jomâda, most furiously upon the town. Of this the Soltân being informed, he posted himself, with a few of his Mamlûks, on the top of Tel Al Fodûl, a mountain close to the spot where the army of the Franks was incamped, in order to take a near view of their machines. He then moved with all his forces to Al Kherûba, and occupied the hill Al 'Ayâdiya, opposite to the enemy's camp, in the night between the 10th and 11th of the same month. From this post he proposed to harass the Franks with perpetual alarms, and by that means to retard the operations of the siege. But, notwithstanding his efforts, the city of 'Accâ was reduced to such extremities, that the garrison and inhabitants sent letters every day to the Soltân, to apprise him of the distress they were in, and press him to attempt with all possible expedition to relieve the place. Their situation was rendered still more melancholy by the arrival of the king of England, after his subjugation of the island of Cyprus, at the besiegers camp. That prince, who was esteemed (B) by the Moslems as the most valiant and intrepid of all the generals of the Franks, brought with him a very considerable force, attended with arms and proper accoutrements, in twenty-five ships of war; with which he joined the Christian army, then in high spirits, on account of their being soon to act under the order of so brave, skilful, and experienced a commander, the 13th of the former Jomâda. The 16th of the same month, the English sunk, after an obstinate engagement, a Moslem ship of an enormous size, with 650 soldiers, a vast number of arms and utensils of all kinds, and a prodigious quantity of provisions, on board, going from Bayrût to 'Accâ, for the besieged. Of the soldiers, and sailors navigating the vessel, only one escaped; who was taken prisoner by the English, and dispatched immediately to the Soltân, to acquaint him with the disaster that had befallen him by sea. This blow so terrified the garrison and people of 'Accâ, that they began to despair of defending that fortress much longer against the Franks; looking upon it, says Bobâo'ddin, as the third ill omen that had happened to them since the commencement of the siege.

'Accâ is reduced to the last extremity by the Franks.

THE vicinity of the Soltân's camp, pitched on the hill of Al 'Ayâdiya, not a little favouring the sallies of the besieged; the Franks found themselves incapable of effecting the reduction of 'Accâ, without a farther effusion of human blood. They raised a stupendous machine, to play upon

- a the town, and level the walls with the ground; which the garrison set on fire with naphtha, and reduced to ashes. On Friday, the 19th of the former Jomâda, the Franks made a general assault; but the garrison, supported by the Soltân, repulsed them with great bravery, forced their trenches, penetrated into their camp, and plundered part of it. However, they were at last obliged to retire. The 23d, the besiegers made a fiercer attack than before; but were again repulsed, and pursued to their camp, where a most bloody engagement ensued. Nothing, however, decisive happened on either side. Hereupon the king of England sent an herald to the Soltân, to desire he might have an interview with that prince. This minister was introduced by Al Malec Al 'Adel to Salâb'addin, and communicated the purport of his commission to him; but without effect. The Soltân refused to comply with king Richard's request,
- b before a convention, settling the principal articles of a future treaty of peace between them, was signed. He also insisted that the interview should be conducted by an interpreter, in whom both of them could confide. The 28th, a smart action happened; which was terminated by the intervention of the night. The Moslems lost in it only a Scenite Arab, or Bedoween, and a Curd; though more of the Franks are said to have been killed, besides one of them taken prisoner, who was immediately carried to the Soltân. The 29th, there was a skirmish near Al Nabr Al Halû, or The Sweet River; in which a Moslem fell into the enemy's hands, whom they butchered, and afterwards burnt. To retaliate this barbarity, a Christian captive was treated in the very same manner. In the mean time, couriers were dispatched without intermission from the garrison and inhabitants of 'Accâ to the Soltân, to acquaint him with their deplorable situation; they being reduced to the extremes of misery and despair. They assured him, that since the arrival of the king of England, who was by much the best and most active officer in the Christian camp, they had not been permitted to enjoy the least interval of repose. They added, that this martial prince had been sick, and even at the point of death; as also, that the king of France had been wounded, but whether dangerously or no they did not say. The king of England's sister, who had been the king of Sicily's wife, was with him, during his illness in the camp. She had with her two Sicilian servants, who had always been Moslems in their hearts. These took an opportunity, that offered itself, of deserting to the Soltân, and professing the Mohammedan faith. At this time the marquis of Montferrat having been told, that the sovereignty of Tyre was to be conferred upon the former Sâheb of that city, who had been detained in captivity by the Soltân, as a reward for what he had suffered on account of his religion; he abandoned the army, and hastened with the utmost celerity to Tyre. Nor could some Christian priests, sent after him for that purpose, by all the motives they could offer, prevail upon him to return. As he seemed fully persuaded, that the kings of England and France were resolved not only to deprive him of the principality of Tyre, but even to seize him; he was determined to leave them, and confine himself to the defence of his capital. The forces of Sinjâr, under the orders of Mojâbedo'ddin Ycrankush, those of Egypt, commanded by 'Alamo'ddin Corkhi, Saifo'ddin Sonkar, and others, and those of Al Mawfel, under the conduct of 'Alâo'ddin, the Sâheb of that place, having joined the Soltân; he made a motion with his army, the 2d of the latter Jomâda, and drew nearer the enemy's camp. The king of England's illness, which
- e now grew more violent, for the present not a little retarded the siege of 'Accâ; that prince, even according to the Moslem writers themselves, being as it were the life and soul of the Franks. After his recovery, he dispatched an ambassador to the Soltân; who brought with him a Moslem prisoner, a native of Al Maarra, as a present to that prince. The English monarch's view herein was, according to Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, to feel the Soltân's pulse, and discover whether he was more inclined to peace or war. But as Salâb'addin himself had a similar view, in relation to the disposition of the Franks, by his admission of this minister, and consequently both parties were rather disposed to impose upon each other than enter seriously into a negotiation; the conferences broke off without success, and this legation produced no remarkable effect. The Franks, therefore, animated by king Richard, redoubled their efforts to carry the
- f town; attacking it with so much ardour, that the troops forming the garrison were every moment in danger of being put to the sword. This induced them to send a letter to the Soltân, the 7th of the latter Jomâda, to inform him of the most melancholy circumstances they were in; and likewise farther to acquaint him, that, if they were not succoured the next day, they should be obliged to surrender. As most of the arms of Phœnicia, Jerusalem, Damascus, Aleppo, Egypt, and, in fine, all the Moslem provinces, were in 'Accâ, the Soltân's principal magazine being settled there; and as Saifo'ddin Al Mashtûb, Bobâo'ddin Karâkûsh, and other famous generals, were now in that fortress; the contents of this letter, as well as the verbal account of things given by the bearer, extremely affected the Soltân. The 8th of the same month, the Franks penetrated through, and destroyed, the exterior wall; which was abandoned by the besieged, after a vigorous defence. The Franks, however, lost in the action above 150 men. Six of these were persons of distinction, the principal of whom was killed by a Curd. The exterior

THINGS being in this melancholy situation at 'Accâ, the garrison and inhabitants of that city demanded to capitulate; and deputed Saifo'ddin Al Mashtûb to the besiegers camp, to settle with the king of France the articles of the capitulation. That prince at first refused to grant them any terms, as they had so barbarously butchered six of the Christian officers, the preceding day, even after one of them had engaged to procure them mercy from the Franks, if they would spare him; upon which, Al Mashtûb, in a menacing tone, assured him, that they would defend the city to the last drop of blood, and each of them kill fifty of the principal of their enemies, if he persisted in his refusal to comply with their request. Al Mashtûb then returned into the town, and informed both the people and troops of the king of France's disposition; which struck them with such terror, that Arsal, Ebn Al Jâwali, Sonkar, Al Washâki, and several others, got on board a bark, that night, and escaped to the Moslem army. Arsal and Sonkar, dreading the Soltân's indignation, kept themselves in such manner concealed, that they could never be discovered; but Al Jâwali was afterwards taken, and closely confined. However, a reinforcement of fresh troops being thrown into the place, and the besieged having begun to build another wall, in the room of that which had been demolished by the Franks; the kings of England and France at length, after the fortrefs had been reduced to a heap of ruins, granted them a capitulation, on Friday, the 17th of the latter Jomâda, upon the following terms. 1. The garrison and inhabitants of 'Accâ shall be permitted to march out in safety, with their money and effects. 2. They shall release 1500 Christian prisoners of lower rank, and 100 others of superior note, to be named by the commanders of the Franks. 3. In consideration of their being allowed to retire, with their wives and children, money and effects, they shall pay the besiegers 200,000 dinârs, at two monthly payments; the first on the 18th of Rajeb, and the second on the 18th of Sbaâban. 4. They shall deliver up to the Franks, The Cross of the Crucifixion, or the true original cross on which the Messiah suffered. 5. They shall leave them all their ships, arms, and military machines; and, in fine, the remaining part of the magazine erected in their city. 6. They shall pay the marquis of Montferrat, or Sâheb of Tyre, 10,000 dinârs, and his troops 4000, because by his intervention these articles were agreed upon. The capitulation being signed, and a copy of it sent to the Soltân; he disapproved of the garrison's conduct on this occasion. But receiving advice that the Franks had, the same day, taken possession of the town, he found himself obliged, notwithstanding his chagrin, to acquiesce in what had been done. Though 'Accâ had not been evacuated by the Moslem troops, the Hâjeb Kûs departed from thence, with three attendants, to the Soltân's camp, the 20th of the same month; and set out the next day for Damascus. Towards the close of the latter Jomâda, a Moslem post having been attacked by the Franks; they were repulsed, with considerable loss. In the mean time, they detained in a state of confinement the Moslems found in the town, and secured both their money and effects, till the conditions stipulated on their part by the late convention were performed. Whereupon the Soltân, says Bohâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, insisted, that before the payment of 100,000 dinârs on the 18th of Rajeb, and the dismissal of the Christian captives in his hands, those prisoners should either be released, on his producing a proper security for the payment in due time of the remaining sum, or hostages given him for the speedy release of them. If either of these reasonable terms, continues he, had been complied with, the Soltân would have punctually performed what the Franks thought they had a right to demand of him. But both of them being peremptorily refused, he believed himself under no manner of obligation to send them either the cross, the prisoners, or the money they required; imagining, as our author insinuates, that by a contrary conduct he should have become the dupe of his own credulity, and the perfidy of the Franks. This affair is, however, something differently related by Abu'l Faraj. According to that writer, Salâb'addin, by the advice of his Emîrs, refused to remit 100,000 dinârs to the Franks, though the money had been collected by his subjects for him, unless their kings would again bind themselves by oath to discharge all the Moslems they had confined. This, says he, they did not scruple to reject; but, at the same time, declared, that they would immediately dismiss part of them, upon payment of that sum, and the arrival of the cross, and the rest, when 100,000 dinârs more, the remainder of the stipulated sum, were paid. But with this proposal, however equitable it may appear, the Soltân would by no means close. Abu'lfeda seems to intimate that Salâb'addin could not raise the money due to the Franks, and yet required the dismissal of all the Moslem captives in their hands; with which, as they could not but deem it a most exorbitant and iniquitous demand, they refused to comply. Neither the cross, therefore, was sent, nor the money, at the time appointed, paid. The

a consequence of which was, that the king of England, having drawn up a body of the Franks in order of battle, on a plain between the mounts Al Ayâdiya and Caisân, and commanded the Moslem prisoners to be conducted thither, put 3000 of them to the sword, that were not able to ransom themselves, the 27th of Rajeb. This was done in the sight of some Moslem troops, that were both too weak and too far distant to rescue them. The other captives, according to Abu'lfeda, were still kept in chains. Upon the whole, from the Arab historians themselves, for these we only follow here, it may be fairly inferred, that the Soltân was guilty of perfidy, and the English monarch, or rather all the princes of the Franks, of cruelty, on this tragical occasion ^e.

AFTER the reduction of 'Accâ, the king of England marched with his army to besiege Askelon, or Askelon, in conformity to the plan he had laid down, as generalissimo of the Franks. A certain Moslem author insinuates, that this enterprize obliged king Richard to treat the Moslem prisoners in the manner above-mentioned; as he judged it would be altogether impolitic to leave behind him so considerable a body of men in 'Accâ. Which if we admit, that prince will be thereby in some measure cleared of the aforesaid imputation; though policy, however in this point of conduct he might have been influenced by it, will not entirely exculpate him. Richard having settled every thing at 'Accâ, and ordered both the town and walls to be repaired, began his march for 'Askalân, towards the close of Rajeb. The 1st of Sbaabân, he advanced to Haifâ; his rear being harrassed most of the way by a body of the Soltân's troops, under the command of Al Malec Al Afdal. From thence he moved to Al Mallûba, and afterwards to Kaisâriya, or Cæsarea; the Soltân attending him with his army, in order to observe his motions. Richard arrived at Kaisâriya, on Friday, the 6th of Sbaabân, and pitched his tents there, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the same day. He then continued his march, in order of battle, till the 10th of Sbaabân, when a brisk skirmish happened; in which a pretty large number of men on both sides were killed, and about 1000 of the Franks, if Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd may be depended upon, wounded. The king of England, according to the information given the Soltân by three prisoners he had taken, having been imposed upon, with regard to the strength of the Moslem forces, by two Scenite Arabs, or Bedowens; he caused both their heads, after the end of the action of the 10th, to be struck off. The van of the Christian army was commanded by the king of the Franks, and formed of his own proper troops; the main body by the king of England, assisted by the king of France; and the rear was brought up by the sons of Alisot, the Sâbebs of Tabariya, or Tiberias, and others. The banner was displayed from the top of a high tower, in the center, carried on wheels. In this manner, according to the report of prisoners and deserters, and of Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd himself, who saw them, did the Franks move, first to Kaisâriya, and afterwards to Al Birca, which they reached on Friday, the 13th of Sbaabân. Some few prisoners, amongst whom was a person of distinction, the Soltân picked up; all of whom, in resentment of Richard's treatment of the Moslem captives, he caused to be put to the sword. However, he also himself lost several of his men, on this occasion; amongst whom was Ayâz, one of his most valiant Mamlûks, or purchased slaves. Many of the Moslems were likewise wounded, as well as their horses, by the enemy's arrows. At this time, the king of England and Al Malec Al Adel had an interview and conference, in order to treat of a peace; but the Soltân making use of this affair only as an artifice to gain time, till he was joined by a body of Turkmâns, then upon their march, nothing of any consequence resulted from thence. Salâb'addîn having received advice, that the enemy had taken post in the plains of Arsof, or Arsûf, a town about twelve miles from Al Ramla, and six from Yâfâ, or Joppa; he made the proper dispositions for an engagement, being determined, if possible, to bring them to a battle. Accordingly, the two armies being come in sight of each other, on Saturday, the 14th of Sbaabân, a general action (C) immediately ensued; in which the Moslems being overthrown, with great slaughter, the Soltân retired, or rather fled, with the utmost precipitation, to Al Ramla. Here he cut off the heads of two or three Christian prisoners, that had fallen into his hands. After the defeat of the Moslems,

of the term Yom was not unknown to the sacred penmen of the Old Testament; in whose writings, particularly those of the prophets, it now and then occurs (1)

the king of England occupied Yáfá; which the enemy, now every where retiring before him, a had abandoned at his approach. His design, however, upon 'Asfalán transpiring, it was resolved in a council of war, at which all the Soltán's generals assisted, that this city should not only be dismantled, but destroyed; which was accordingly in a good measure effected by the Moslem troops, before the expiration of the last mentioned month. This was done, to prevent the Franks from possessing themselves of that fortress, as they had before done of 'Acca, and then penetrating to Al Kuds; which the Moslems, at this time, scarce thought themselves capable of defending. After the demolition, or rather devastation, of 'Asfalán, the temple of Lud, or Lydda, and the castle of Al Ramla, met with the same fate. This happened, in the beginning of Ramadán. The 5th of that month, the Soltán arrived at Jerusalem, whither he went to visit the walls and fortifications of that place. Soon after his arrival, certain b Christians were seized by some of Al Tawásh Káymáz's people; on whom a copy of a letter, written by the governor to the Soltán, giving an account of the miserable and distressed condition of the garrison of Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, was found. As this was to be sent to the Franks, to communicate to them the situation of affairs there, and consequently a full proof of an illicit correspondence with the enemy; their heads were struck off, to deter others from the like offence. The Soltán having viewed every part of the walls and fortifications of Al Kuds, and satisfied himself of the state of the garrison, left that city, the 8th of Ramadán. Before his departure, he ordered the town to be put in the best posture of defence, as he was apprehensive of a visit on that side, from the Franks. The following night he lay at Beit Núbá, and the next day returned to the camp at Nitron, or Netrún; where Moezzo'ddin c Kaisar, (Cæsar) Sháh, the son of Kilij Arslán, and Sáheb of Malatía, or Malatiya, had an audience of him. That prince came to implore his assistance against his father and brothers; who had deprived him of Malatía, and the district belonging to it. Moezzo'ddin had been met upon the road by Al Malec Al' Adel, and Al Malec Al Afdal, who erected and fitted up for him a magnificent tent, in the neighbourhood of Lud or Lydda. He was received with the highest marks of distinction by the Soltán. The same day the Sáheb of Malatía arrived near Lydda, being the 8th of Ramadán, a detachment of the Soltán's troops routed a party of the enemy's foragers; of which news being brought to their camp, a body of horse was detached from thence to chastise the Moslems for the affront. This brought on a sharp engagement, wherein both sides sustained a pretty considerable loss. It was rumoured afterwards in e the Soltán's camp, that the king of England himself had been wounded in the action, and even in great danger of his life; one of his soldiers having been killed by a blow, he voluntarily received, which had been levelled at that prince. It does not, however, certainly appear, that there was any real foundation for such a report. Be that as it will, skirmishes passed almost every day between the Moslems and the Franks; the latter of whom, though apparently superior to the former, were not a little harrassed by the Arab horse. The king of England having ravaged the country about Yáfá, Yáfá, or Joppa, and taken possession of Al Ramla, towards the close of the campaign; a body of Mamlúks and Greek volunteers, who had joined the Moslems, headed by the Soltán himself, the 8th of Shawál, fell upon one of the quarters of the Christian camp, pitched near the former of those cities. But they were soon put to f flight, and left a multitude of their men prisoners in the hands of the Franks. However, the Soltán found means to draw one of the enemy's detachments into an ambuscade, formed of his guards and some Arab horse, the 16th of the same month, put them into disorder, and at last obliged them, though supported by a fresh body of troops, to retire in confusion to their camp. They had about sixty men killed in this conflict, and two taken prisoners; the Moslems losing, as it should seem to appear from Bohá'o'ddin Ebn Sheddád, at least an equal number. Nay, as Ayáz Al Mebráni and Jáwali, two officers of distinguished bravery, were among their slain, they must have suffered in the action more than the Franks; who, notwithstanding this little disgrace, reduced to their obedience a considerable part of Palestine, and spread terror over all the adjacent tract, this prosperous campaign h.

A negotiation is set on foot for a peace, which ends without success.

THE Soltán finding himself not in a condition to make head against the king of England, who had taken some of his strong towns, obliged him to dismantle others, and at last driven him in a manner out of the field; he began now to entertain favourable sentiments of a peace with that prince, and therefore permitted his brother Al Malec Al' Adel to set on foot with him a negotiation. The marquis of Montferrat, Sáheb of Tyre, who had before suspected that the other princes of the Franks had formed a design to deprive him of the territories he possessed, sent an ambassador to the Soltán, offering to enter into an alliance with him against the Franks, if he would cede to him Sída, or Sidán, and Bayrút. The Soltán hereupon im-

- a mediately dispatched Al Adl Najib, as his minister to the marquis's court, with orders to declare, that he was willing to accept of his proposal, if he would recover 'Acca, and release all the Moslem prisoners detained there and at Tyre, before the new treaty was signed. In the mean time, couriers frequently passed and repassed between king Richard and Al Malec Al' Adel, with dispatches relative to a future peace. For Richard being not unacquainted with the marquis's intention of concluding a separate treaty, and the article of recovering 'Acca having transpired; he was desirous of being beforehand with the Sáheb of Tyre, and therefore of having the last hand put to the treaty, that had been long in agitation, between him and the Soltán, as soon as possible. He also, at the same time, for the farther security of 'Acca, and to prevent the above-mentioned treaty from taking effect, or rather to traverse the
- b negotiation commenced between the Sáheb of Tyre and the Soltán, made use of all the expedients he could think of to dispose the former of those princes to an accommodation. We shall not here enter into a minute detail of all the circumstances attending the conferences held between the ministers of king Richard and the Soltán on this occasion; but only observe, that, after Al Malec Al' Adel had been at Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, to inquire into the state of the garrison, and to inspect the walls and fortifications there, the negotiation between him and the king of England was resumed, and towards the close of Ramadán, or the beginning of Shawál, the following articles drawn up, as the basis of a future treaty. 1. Al Malec Al' Adel, Soltán Saláb'addín's brother, shall marry the king of England's sister, relict of the late king of Sicily. 2. He shall have assigned him, as his wife's dower, the city of Jerusalem, capital of the kingdom of the same name. 3. The Soltán shall moreover relinquish to him every other city, town, castle, district, &c. of Palestine in his hands. 4. The king of England shall cede to Al Malec Al' Adel the fortress of 'Acca, together with the whole extent of territory between that place and 'Askalán, and all the other towns, castles, &c. that he has conquered this campaign. 5. Al Malec Al' Adel and his wife shall be crowned king and queen of Jerusalem, and acknowledged as such by all the contracting powers. 6. The Soltán shall deliver into the hands of the king of England, without delay, The Cross of the Crucifixion, or the true original Cross on which the Messiah suffered. 7. The knights Templars and Hospitallers shall have all their towns, castles, villages, &c. restored them, immediately after the ratification of this treaty. 8. The prisoners on both sides shall be released. 9. There shall henceforth be a perpetual peace, amity, and friendship, between the Moslems and the Franks; and the king of England, crossing the seas, shall return home. These were the articles drawn up, as the most likely to be relished by all the parties at war, and consequently the best calculated to effect an accommodation. But the queen dowager of Sicily herself, as well as the clergy, objecting to the first of them, unless Al Malec Al' Adel would renounce Mohammedism, and be baptized; and this condition being absolutely rejected both by him and the Soltán, as by no means fit to be complied with; the conferences broke off without success, and all hopes of an accommodation vanished into smoke ¹.

- UPON Al Malec Al' Adel's return from Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, the 20th of Ramadán, he received a letter from the most illustrious Diwán of Baghdád, wherein great intercession was made for Bašamar, or Boštemar, the Sáheb of Khalát, in Armenia; who had been dispossessed by Al Malek Al Modhaffer Takío'ddín, the Soltán's nephew, of a considerable part of his territories. That prince, having annexed Al Sawaidá and Haní to the provinces granted him by the Soltán, was then marching, with his son Al Malek Al Mansúr Mohammed, to besiege Malázkerd. The Diwán likewise interceded for Al Hasan Ebn Kafjak, whom Modhaffero'ddín Ebn Zino'ddín detained in confinement at Arbel; and begged that Al Kádi Al Fadl might be sent to Baghdád, to adjust with them every thing relative to both these points. Al Malec Al' Adel transmitted the letter to Al Kádi Al Fadl, that he might dispose Takío'ddín to a compliance with the Diwán's request, in relation to his future conduct. The Soltán also himself received another copy of the same letter from Damascus, which he answered in terms to the following effect: "With regard to the Armenian expedition," said he, "we must beg leave to assure the Diwán, that this was not undertaken by our order; though some particular incidents, as we have been informed, rendered it not altogether unnecessary. However," continued the Soltán, "we have commanded Al Malek Al Modhaffer to quit the territories of the prince of Khalát, and join us, who are now engaged in a war against the Franks. As to Ebn Kafjak, who occupied Irmia, or Ormia, (a large antient city in the province of Adherbiján, about three or four parasangs from the lake of Tela), put all the men to the sword, and carried the women and children into captivity, when Soltán Togrol fled thither out of Al' Ajem, or Persia, for refuge, he ought to be looked upon as a public nuisance. Soltán Togrol, having married his sister, solicited his assistance; but being ill used by him, he at last made

bāni, and from those places infested the neighbouring country with his robberies and depredations. Considering him, therefore, as an highway-man, or public robber, we have ordered Modbaffero'ddīn to bring him with him into Syria; where we shall assign him certain districts, that he may exert himself in the holy war. With respect to the last request;
we must acquaint the Dīwān, that Al Kādi Al Fadl is so weak and infirm, that he cannot, without manifest danger of his life, undertake a journey to Baghdād." Al Mālec Al Mod- baffer Takīo'ddīn dying on his march from Khalāt to Mayyāfārakīn, the 19th of Ramadān; his body was carried to the latter of those places, and from thence to Hamah, where it was interred. A tomb was erected for him without the city, close to which a college was afterwards built. Whilst he was pushing on the siege of Malūzkerd (D), according to Abu'lfeda, he expired; which seems not perfectly to agree with what has been related by Bobāo'ddīn Ebn Sheddād, on this head. His son Al Malec Al Mansūr, if the former of these authors may be credited, for some time kept his death concealed; but with what view this was done, we have not been told. Al Malec Al Modbaffer was a prince of uncommon bravery, and one of the chief supports of the house of Ayūb. He excelled in virtue and erudition, and wrote very elegant Arabic verse. His death was extremely regretted by the Soltān, who, when he shewed to his courtiers the letter that brought him the melancholy news, was so overcome with grief, that he burst out into tears. This so affected them, that they all of them likewise wept. The same night in which Al Malec Al Modbaffer died, Hosāmo'ddīn Ebn Mohammed Ebn Kājīn, whose mother Settalshām Bint Ayūb was the Soltān's sister, also departed this life. Al Ma- lec Al Modbaffer was no sooner dead, than his son Al Malec Al Mansūr sent an embassy to the Soltān; desiring he might succeed his father, in the government of all the cities and districts over which he had been appointed to preside. But this he requested of the Soltān in a manner so strongly favouring of rebellion, that had not Al Malec Al Adel (E), who influenced his brother as he pleased, been his friend, he must have been thereby intirely ruined. But, by the intercession of that prince, the Soltān was reconciled to him, and confirmed him in the government of Hamah, Al Maarra, Manbij, and the castle of Nojm; on condition, however, that the eastern tract, with its dependencies, which Al Malec Al Modbaffer had governed, should be ceded to Al Malec Al 'Adel. The latter of these was nevertheless to relinquish every thing he possessed in Syria, except Al Carac, Al Shawbec, Al Celkāa, and Al Selt. He likewise promised the Soltān half of the property he possessed in Egypt (F), and to send to Jeru- salem annually from Al Belkāa and Al Selt 1000 sacks of corn. This disposition being made, Al Malec Al 'Adel set out for the provinces assigned him; from whence he returned, with Al Malec Al Mansūr, the Sāheb of Hamah, towards the close of the latter Jomāda, the following year. At his return, he was received by the Soltān with extraordinary marks of affection and esteem, placed at the head of the army, and loaded with honours. Kozul Arslān Otkmān Ebn Ildighīz, the Sāheb of Hamadān, Esfahān, Al Ray, and Adherbijān, was assasinated, in the month of Shaabān, 587. Soltān Togrol Al Seljūki overthrew him and the Kha- lif Al Nāser Ledīnī'llab, who commanded the forces of Baghdād, in a great battle near Ha- madān, as has been already observed. Kozul Arslān afterwards defeated Soltān Togrol in his turn, shut him up in one of his fortresses, and treated with uncommon cruelty those of the sect of Al Shāfe'i at Esfahān; affixing many illustrious men, professing the tenets of that sect, to gibbets, erected for that purpose there. Marching then to Hamadān, he assumed the title of Soltān; soon after which, his guards being slipt away from him, he was murdered in bed by a person who could not be discovered. It has been remarked above, that Moez- zo'ddīn Kaisar Shāb, the son of Kilij Arslān, the Sāheb of Belād Al Rūm, appeared in Salāb'- addīn's camp, and was admitted to a conference with the Soltān, the 9th of Ramadān. Kilij having divided his kingdom amongst his sons, Malatīa fell to the share of Moezzo'ddīn Kaisar Shāb; but one of his brothers having got the old Sāheb into his power, forced him to deprive this prince of that part of his dominions which had been allotted him. Hereupon, being afraid of farther ill treatment, he fled to the Soltān; from whom he met with a most gracious reception, and a promise of assistance against his brother. In testimony of his particular esteem,

(D) Dr. Hunt's MSS. copy of Ebn Shohab exhibits here Belād Cord, the country of the Curds; but that Malūzkerd must be the true reading, is, both from the tenor of the passage and other manuscripts of that author, indisputably clear (1).

(E) According to Bobāo'ddīn Ebn Sheddād, the reconciliation brought about between Al Malec Al Mansūr and the Soltān, was effected by the interposition of Al Malec Al 'Adel, Al Emīr Hosāmo'ddīn Abu'l Hijā, and the other Moslem generals, who refused to march against Al Malec Al Mansūr; declaring openly to the Soltān, that they would not fight against infidels and believers at the same time (2).

(F) Bobāo'ddīn Ebn Sheddād reports, that Al Malec Al 'Adel was permitted to keep all his possessions in Egypt, except Jīza; which, by this agreement, returned to the Soltān. He adds, that Al Malec Al 'Adel was obliged to send annually 6000 sacks of corn from Al Belkāa and Al Selt to Al Kuds (3).

- a Salâb'addin also gave him his brother Al Malec Al 'Adel's daughter in marriage. Ebn Al Athîr relates, that Moezzo'ddin Kaisar Shâb returned to Malatîa, in the month of Dhu'lkaa-da, this year; and that the Soltân, to do him the greater honour, alighted from his horse (G), and took a formal leave of him. He adds, that when this prince remounted; Kaisar Shâb held the stirrup, and placed him upon his horse; and that 'Alâo'ddin, the son of 'Azzo'ddin Mas'ûd, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, who then was present, put in order his cloaths. Upon which, a by-stander said to himself, "O son of Ayûb, you need not now care what death you die. A prince of the house of Seljûk has helped you up on horse-back, and one of the " Atâbek Zenki's descendants has adjusted your garments (H)." This year, Al Malec Al Dhâ-ber caused Abu'l Fatab Yahya Ebn Hobeis, surnamed Shahâbo'ddin Al Saharwardi, a physi-
- b cian and philosopher, to be strangled in prison at Aleppo, by the Soltân's express command. Shahâbo'ddin Al Saharwardi was instructed in the fundamentals of Mohammedism and philosophy by Majdo'ddin Al Halebi and Sheikh Al Imâm Fakbro'ddin Al Râzi at Marâga; from whence, after he had finished his studies, he went to Aleppo, and settled himself there. He was a man of extensive knowledge, but very deficient in point of judgment. As he maintained some heterodox opinions, that struck at the foundations of Islamism; the lawyers adjudged him worthy of death, and accordingly passed sentence upon him. Al Sheikh Saifo'ddin Al Amedi relates, that, being once at Aleppo in company with him, he said, "I make no doubt but I shall be king of the earth, as I imagined myself in a dream to have drank up the whole sea." "Perhaps that," replied Al Amedi, "might be the sea of knowledge;" endeavouring, in a polite and gentle manner, to undeceive him. But this the Sheikh found impracticable, notwithstanding the absurdity and impiety of his notion; he never receding, if Abu'lfeda and Ebn Shohnab may be credited, from any pre-conceived opinion. His most bitter enemies were Zino'ddin and Majdo'ddin, the sons of Jebbal. He was thirty-eight lunar years old (I), at the time of his death. He wrote many books upon philosophical subjects, and is said to have been well skilled in Al Simâ, an art that we shall hereafter describe (I). His poetical performances, of which a specimen has been preserved by Ebn Shohnab, were held in good esteem. The king of England, having put his troops into winter-quarters at Tâfâ, or Tâffâ, returned to 'Accâ, to inspect the state of that place. On the other hand, the Soltân posted himself for some time at Tel Al Jazr, and went from thence to Al Kuds, in order to strengthen and augment the fortifications of that city, the 23d of Dhu'lkaada, the present year. Here, having permitted his forces to separate, and retire into quarters of refreshment, he remained till the opening of the next campaign.

In the 588th year of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 18th, 1192, several remarkable events happened; the principal of which, that have been taken notice of by the eastern writers, we shall beg leave to touch upon. The Franks began to repair, or rather rebuild, the city of 'Askalân, in the month of Al Moharram, whilst the Soltân remained at Al Kuds. Soon after, they made an incursion into the Moslem territories; advanced to a village near Al Dârûn, in the district of Gaza, carried most of the Arabs inhabiting it away with them prisoners, and seized 1000 head of cattle. This vastly incensed the Soltân, who immediately detached some troops in quest of the plunderers; but they could not come up with them. A negotiation

(G) Ebn Shohnab relates, that, according to Ebn Al Athîr, the Soltân, when he came to take his leave of Moezzo'ddin Kaisar Shâb, alighted from his horse, and walked on foot with that prince. He adds, that afterwards, when the Soltân remounted his horse, Moezzo'ddin helped him into the saddle; and that 'Alâo'ddin Ebn 'Azzo'ddin, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, then present, set right his garments. After which, one of the by-standers spoke the words mentioned here (1).

(H) It may not be improper to remark here, that M. D'Herbelot has given this passage a different turn. He looks upon it as a kind of prophecy or prediction, couched in the following terms. "You shall not live long, O son of Ayûb, but soon end your days, as a prince of the house of Seljûk (Jorkibka) has placed you on horse-back, and another of Zenki's family (Yoslib thiâbaca) has accommodated your garments." Which prediction, says he, was exactly fulfilled, both in Salâb'addin's person and posterity. For the Soltân himself died soon after, and his family was extremely ill used by the Seljûks of Al Rûm, and re-established by the Atâbeks of the house of Zenki: All which, continues he, is pointed out to us by the words Racab, the radix of Yorkimbka, and Salab, that of Yoslib; though there seems not to be the least foundation, in the original Arabic either of Abu'lfeda or Ebn Shohnab, for so fantastical an opinion (2).

(1) If Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab may be deemed authentic, he was only thirty-three lunar years old, at the time of his decease (3).

(K) According to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab, Shahâbo'ddin Al Saharwardi was of the sect of the physiognomists, or rather those who professed Al Simâ; and, if Abu'lfeda may be depended upon, the tenets of the sect to which he belonged were destructive of all religion (4).

was about this time begun, or rather continued, and almost brought to a conclusion, between the Soltân and the Sâheb of Tyre. But a period was put to this by the death of the latter of those princes; who was assassinated by two Bâtanists, disguised in the habit of monks, after he had dined with the bishop, at Tyre, the 13th of the latter Rabî. Bohao'ddîn says, that the king of England, who hated the marquis of Montferrat, or Sâheb of Tyre, hired those ruffians to perpetrate this horrid fact; but as that author had the utmost aversion to Richard, who was the scourge and terror of the Moslems, we must not entirely depend upon his testimony in this particular. Be that as it will, this unexpected event seems to have had a considerable influence upon the state of affairs in that part of the world, and to have accelerated the truce which not long after was agreed upon between the Moslems and the *Franks*¹.

An ambassador from the Greek emperor arrives at the Soltân's court. AN ambassador from Constantinople arrived at the Soltân's court, the 1st of the former Jomâda, 588. He was treated with uncommon marks of distinction; and, on the 3d, had his first audience of the Soltân. Amongst other things he had orders to demand, in his master's name, that the true original cross, on which our Saviour suffered, should be delivered up to him; that The Temple of the Resurrection, and all the other principal churches of Al Kuds, should be assigned the Greek priests; that the Soltân should enter into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the Greek emperor; and that they should jointly invade the island of Cyprus. But the Soltân would not consent to any one of these demands. However, he sent Ebn Al Bazzâz, an Egyptian, in the quality of ambassador, to Constantinople. The cross in particular he absolutely refused to part with; adding, that the king of Al Corj, or Georgia, could not obtain that valuable relic of him, though he had offered for it 200,000 dîners^m.

The military operations of this campaign. THE king of England, having assembled his forces, took the field, towards the beginning of the former Jomâda. The 9th of that month, he advanced to Al Dârûn, and immediately laid siege to that place. As he had some very skilful engineers of Aleppo in his army, who the last year, at the reduction of 'Accâ, took on in his service, he soon demolished the walls of the town. This reduced the garrison, commanded by one of 'Alamo'ddîn Kaisar's officers, to the last extremity; whereupon the commandant desired leave to send a courier to the Soltân, to let him know the condition they were in. This the king of England absolutely refused to grant, carried the fortress by assault, took some of the garrison prisoners, and put the rest to the sword. Having left a garrison, composed of select troops, in Al Dârûn; he marched to Al Hesi, incamped there, the 13th of the former Jomâda, and staid there the following day. From Al Hesi he moved to the castle of Majdelyâbâ, or Majdel Yâfâ, that is, The Tower of Joppa, with an intention to attack it. Majdel Yâfâ was a small town, or village, near Al Ramla, with a citadel that was almost impregnable. The Franks no sooner approached it, than the garrison sallied out upon them, killed several of them, amongst whom was an officer of distinction, and obliged them to retire. About the same time, a party of the Franks made an incursion into the Moslem territories bordering upon the district of Tyre; but were met by a detachment of the Soltân's troops, and after a very brisk action put to flight. The Moslems killed fifteen of the enemy, and lost only a single man. In the mean time, the Soltân, having been joined by Bedro'ddîn Duldurm, with a body of Turkmâns, and 'Azzo'ddîn Ebn Al Mokaddem, with an exceeding fine corps, began to be in motion. He detached Abu'l Hijâ, Bedro'ddîn Duldurm, and Ebn Al Mokaddem, with the forces under their orders, to reconnoitre the Franks; and the other part of the army soon after followed. But the Soltân himself, being indisposed, thought fit for the present to stay at Al Kuds. The Franks moved to Tel Al Sâfiya, and from thence directed their march towards Al Netrûn. Here they judged it requisite to remain, till their provisions, baggage, and military apparatus came up; after which, according to the report of the Soltân's spies, they proposed to form the siege of Al Kuds. A party of the Arabs, having not received intelligence of the enemy's motions, fell in with one of their detachments on the side of Yâfâ; and were all, except six, either killed or taken prisoners. The Franks, who incamped at Beit Nûba, the 27th of the former Jomâda, were also in their turn harrassed by the Moslem parties. Bedro'ddîn Duldurm drew a detachment of their horse into an ambuscade on the road to Yâfâ, or Jâffâ, cut thirty of them to pieces, and made a large number of them prisoners; all which were conducted under an escorte to Al Kuds, the 29th of the same month. Other skirmishes likewise happened; in one of which, if Bohao'ddîn may be credited, a convoy was put to flight by a detachment of Arab horse, sustained by some Turkish foot, the 3d of the latter Jomâda. Of the Franks several were either slain, or fell into the enemy's hands; but of the Moslems, after the end of the action, not one was missing. However, the Franks were made ample amends for this little disgrace by one of king Richard's parties; which, on the 11th of the same month, came up with a rich Egyptian caravan, defeated the escorte, and acquired a very considerable quantity of spoil. Besides other things, Richard's men carried off 3000 camels, 500 pri-

a ners, and 500 horses. The number killed and wounded in the action, we have not been told. After this, the Franks made a motion as though they intended to invest Al Kuds; but, to the inconceivable joy of the Soltân, who was not in a condition to oppose them, they turned back to Al Ramla, not without some warm debates amongst themselves, the 21st of the aforesaid month, and posted themselves there. About this time, the conferences between the plenipotentiaries of the king of England and the Soltân were renewed; but soon broke off, without success. The latter of those princes insisted upon the absolute demolition of 'Askalân', lately repaired at a great expence by the Franks; to which the latter of them, who had been principally concerned in that reparation, would by no means give his consent. Both sides then preparing to decide the present dispute by the sword, the 10th of Rajeb, the Soltân incamped at Al Jib. The 13th, he pitched his camp on the hills between Al Ramla and Lud, or Lydda, and remained there all that day. The 14th, he advanced to Bâzûr, or Yâ-zûr, and from thence to Beit Jibrîn, in the neighbourhood of Yâfâ. The 15th, he sat down before that city. The garrison defended itself, and repulsed the besiegers in all their attacks, with unparalleled bravery, till the 18th; when the Soltân's troops entered the town, and plundered it. The garrison, however, retired into the castle; which the Soltân immediately blocked up, and made the necessary dispositions for besieging it in form. The king of England, having received advice of what had happened at Yâfâ, laid aside his intended expedition against Bayrût, and hastened to the relief of the citadel of that place. He arrived accordingly in the port of Yâfâ with a fleet of fifty sail, fifteen of which were large men of war, and a body of land-forces on board. The king's ship was red, and its pendants of the same colour. He instantly landed his troops, without opposition; and attacked the Moslem army, under the conduct of the Soltân himself, with so much bravery, that he gave it an intire defeat, reinforced the garrison of the castle of Yâfâ, and incamped on the very spot which had been occupied by the Soltân before. This happened the 20th of Rajeb, the present year. The 22d, the Soltân retired with the utmost precipitation to Al'Awjâ, between Al Ramla and Arsof; where he was informed, that the enemy had seized upon Cæsarea, and were still incamped without the city of Yâfâ. The 23d, he took post at Bâzûr; the 24th, at Al Netrûn; and the 25th, he set out early in the morning to pay a visit to Al Malec Al'Adel at Al Kuds. Here, it being Friday, he performed his devotions, inspected the fortifications, settled every thing to his satisfaction relative to the defence of the place; and towards evening returned to the camp at Al Netrûn. The 26th, he was joined by 'Alâo'ddîn', the Sâheb of Al Mawfel; and, the next day, by the forces of Egypt, under the command of Majdo'ddîn Huldari, Saifo'ddîn Yâzcuj, and Al Malec Al Mowayyad Mas'ûd. But, notwithstanding this accession of strength, and the arrival of Al Malec Al Mans'ûr Ebn Takîo'ddîn, another of his generals, the 11th of Shaabân, who met with a most gracious reception from him, the Soltân never afterwards undertook any thing of moment against the Franks. He marched, indeed, towards Al Ramla, with part of his army, and pitched his tents at a small distance from that city, as though he had some enterprize in view. But this seems to have been done with no other design than to amuse the Franks; as he remained in a state of perfect inaction, during his continuance there.

THE Soltân's troops being extremely harrassed by the fatigues they had sustained, and he himself not a little dejected by the ill success he had met with, this campaign; Salâb'addîn began to think seriously of putting an end to so ruinous and destructive a war, and of giving his subjects, after such an effusion of their blood, some repose. To this he was farther excited by the state of his finances, which at this time were reduced to the lowest ebb. As the king of England, who had lately laboured under a very malignant indisposition, had got a relapse, and desired nothing more than to return home; he also entertained the same sentiments, and therefore now readily agreed to the demolition of 'Askalân', which before he had stiffly opposed. The talk of peace, therefore, revived; and the conferences between the king of England's and the Soltân's plenipotentiaries being renewed, a temporary pacification was concluded between those princes, the 20th of Shaabân, upon the following terms. 1. There shall be a truce between the Soltân and the chiefs of the Franks for three years and three months. 2. This truce shall be both by sea and by land, and shall begin on Wednesday, the 22d of Shaabân, 588. 3. Yâfâ, or Yâffâ, Yabnâ, the Jamîa of the antients, Majdel Yâfâ, Kay-sariyâ, or Cæsarea, Arsof, Haifâ, and 'Accâ', with their respective districts; shall be ceded to the Franks. 4. 'Askalân' shall be completely demolished, insomuch that it shall not be of the least service to either of the contracting powers. 5. Lud, or Lydda, and Al Ramla, with their dependencies, shall be equally divided between the Soltân and the Franks. 6. The city of Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, and its territory, together with the other towns and villages of Palestine now in his hands, not mentioned in any of the preceding articles of this convention, shall remain to the Soltân. 7. The Franks and all other Christians shall be permitted to perform the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, and to visit all the sacred places there. 8. They shall be exempted from all kinds of tribute, or toll, on this occasion, provided they go unarmed. 9. The Sâbebs of Tripoli and Antioch shall be included in this treaty, if they will swear religiously to observe the articles of it. The 22d of Sbaabân, the day appointed for signing the treaty, being come, the king of England gave his hand, as a mark of his firm intention never to infringe it, but, as he was a king, refused to swear; which point of conduct was approved of by the Soltân, who acted himself in the same manner. However, count Henry, king Richard's nephew, whom he had appointed governor of the sea-coast, Bâliyân Ebn Bâre'zân, the Sâheb of Tarbariya, or Tiberias, the son of Humfrey, the knights Hospitallers and Templars, and in fine all the other leaders of the Franks, took a solemn oath inviolably to adhere to the contents of this treaty; as did likewise, on the part of the Moslems, Al Malec Al 'Adel, Al Malec Al Afdal, Al Malec Al Dbâber, Al Mashtûb, Bedro'ddîn Duldurm, Al Malec Al Mansûr, Ebn Al Mokaddem, the Sâheb of Shaizar, Al Malec Al Mojâhed Shairacûb, the Sâheb of Hems, Al Malec Al Amjed Babrâm, or Baharâm, Shâh Ebn Farkh Shâh, the Sâheb of Baalbec, and other commanders of the first rank. According to Abu'lfeda, the Soltân insisted upon the admission of the Ismaelians, or Assassins, into the treaty, now concluded between him and the Franks; though this has been passed over in silence by Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, a writer whose authority amongst the Moslems is much revered. The war was no sooner terminated by this truce, than the Soltân ordered the public criers to give notice to all his subjects, "That a communication was now opened between them and the Franks; that they might traffick with them, as heretofore; and that they might go on pilgrimage from every part of Syria to Mecca, without the least danger." The king of England having withdrawn the garrison he had in 'Askalân, the demolition of that fortress was begun, the 27th of Sbaabân, and finished in a very short time. The 29th the Soltân moved to Al Netrân, and a friendly intercourse commenced between his troops and those of the Franks. Many of the Moslems also went to Yâfâ, for the sake of trade; and the Franks repaired afterward in vast numbers to Al Kuds, to visit that holy city. To these the Soltân did not only set open the gates, but likewise treated them with the utmost liberality, affability, and condescension; and even sent a guard to escorte them to Yâfâ, and probably the other places from whence they came. This excited such multitudes of them to repair to Al Kuds, that king Richard, according to Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, took no small umbrage thereat, and begged the Soltân would admit only such persons as he should recommend. But that prince, says this biographer, excused himself from complying with his request, by alledging that he could not in conscience drive from Al Kuds so many pilgrims, who had left their friends and relations in very remote countries to perform their devotions there. The Soltân having inspected the fortifications of Al Kuds, and given orders for the reparation and augmentation of them; he made a large addition to the possessions settled upon the college, or school, he had before founded in that city. The spot on which this stood had, before the conquest of Palestine by the Moslems, been occupied by the temple and sepulchre of St. Ann, the mother of the virgin Mary. After that conquest, and before the Franks reduced Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, this church was converted into a school, or college, for the education of the Moslem youth. The Franks, having possessed themselves of the holy city, restored the temple of St. Ann to its pristine honour. But Soltân Salâh'addîn, having expelled the Christians once more from thence, re-converted this edifice into a college, for the aforesaid purpose, and richly endowed it; placing at the head of it Al Kâdi Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, one of his favourites, and an author not seldom referred to here.

He, therefore, thought fit to return to Jerusalem, or Al Kuds; which he entered, the 4th of Ramadân. Hither he repaired, partly with a design to hasten the workmen employed on the fortifications, and partly with an intention to make the necessary preparations for performing the pilgrimage to Mecca. He was, however, diverted from carrying into execution the latter of these designs, though he had written to his brother Saif Al Islâm, the Sâheb of Al Yaman, and imparted it to him, by his Emîrs; who represented to him, that the duration of the truce was very uncertain and precarious, on account of the perfidy of the Franks. Al Malec Al 'Adel being arrived at Al 'âzariya, in his way to Al Carac, from whence, after he had viewed the state of affairs there, he proposed to proceed to the eastern provinces assigned him by his brother; news was brought him, that an ambassador, with dis-

- a patches addressed to him, was arrived from Baghdād. This happened on Friday, the 23d of Ramadān; and, the next day, Al Malec Al 'Adel went back to Al Kuds, to communicate the contents of those dispatches to the Soltān. Having presented himself before that prince, he informed him, that this minister had been dispatched from Baghdād by Ebn Al Nāfid, whom the Khalif had advanced to the dignity of Wazir; and that the purport of the letter, brought him by the ambassador, was to the following effect. “Ebn Al Nāfid presses Al Malec Al 'Adel to effect a reconciliation between his brother Salāb'addin and the Khalif, to prevail upon the Soltān to entertain the same regard as formerly for the illustrious Dīwān and court of Baghdād, and to persuade him to send thither as his minister Al Kādī Al Fadl, that all disputes between their respective sovereigns may be terminated in an amicable manner. If what is here desired can, by Al Malec Al 'Adel's interposition, be obtained, the Dīwān will be under an eternal obligation to him, &c.” In consequence of Al Malec Al 'Adel's application to him, the Soltān pitched upon Aldiyā Al Sharezūri for his ambassador to the Khalif; who set out on Tuesday, the 27th of Ramadān, for Baghdād. As for Al Malec Al 'Adel, he returned to Al 'āzariya, and from thence continued his route to Al Carac. Al Malec Al Dbāher departed from Al Kuds, to resume the government of the territories over which he had been appointed to preside, after he had received from his father some salutary directions for the regulation of his future conduct, either the 29th or 30th of the same month; as did also Al Malec Al Afdal, after the Soltān had pretty severely reproved him, the 5th of Shawāl, the present year^p.
- c THE Soltān having now no farther occasion for his troops, and having amply rewarded them with lands and possessions for the fatigues they had sustained in his service; he disbanded those that had been sent into quarters of cantonment, and permitted them to occupy without delay the lands that had been assigned them. After this, receiving advice that the English fleet, with king Richard (L) on board, had set sail for Europe, the 1st of Shawāl; he proposed to visit all the maritime fortresses, and then go from Bāniās, or Paneas, to Damascus. Accordingly he left Al Kuds, whither he intended to return after a short stay at Damascus, the 6th of Shawāl, in the forenoon. He was attended as far as Al Bīrā by Bobāo'ddin Ebn Sheddād, whom he ordered to reside at Al Kuds; that Kādī being appointed by him to superintend the workmen employed in building an hospital, and finishing the additions to the college he had founded, there. The people of Nāblos, Nābolos, Neapolis, or Naplosā, complained bitterly to him of Al Mashtūb, their governor, whose wicked and oppressive administration had reduced them to great misery, upon his arrival in that city. From Nābolos the Soltān went to Baisān, and from thence to Sebastia, or Sebaste, and inspected the state of that place. He then directed his course to Cawcab; which he reached on Monday, the 10th of the aforesaid month. Proceeding to Tabariya, or Tiberias, where he arrived the 11th; Al Emīr Bobāo'ddin Karākūsh Al Asadi, or Al Asdi, who had fallen into the hands of the Franks, when they took 'Accā, but was now released from his captivity, appeared before him, and met with a most gracious reception. Al Emīr Bobāo'ddin Karākūsh, it is said, paid for his liberty 80,000 dinārs. Raymond, or Boamond, called by Bobāo'ddin Ebn Sheddād Al Bornas, the Sāheb of Antioch, made his compliments, or rather paid his devoirs, to the Soltān, the 21st, at Bayrūt; where he was treated with uncommon marks of distinction, and experienced the usual munificence and liberality of that prince. Nay, if Bobāo'ddin may be credited, the Soltān bestowed on Raymond lands and possessions that brought annually into his coffers 15,000 dinārs. The next day, he took his leave of the Soltān; who, after his visitation of all the places of strength on the sea-coast, entered Damascus on Wednesday, the 26th of Shawāl, where he found his sons Al Malec Al Dbāher and Al Malec Al 'Afdal arrived before him. The former of those princes soon made the best of his way to Aleppo, over the inhabitants of which city he presided; and the latter, with Al Kādī Al Fādī, remained with the Soltān at Damascus. The troops then cantoned in those parts were permitted to return home.
- f As Salāb'addin had been four years from Damascus, which was his favourite city; the people

(L) The Soltān entertained such dreadful apprehensions of king Richard, that he did not think himself safe in his own territories till that prince had set sail for Europe. Bobāo'ddin represents him as the bravest and most politic, and consequently as the most formidable, enemy the Moslems had. However, he looked upon him as crafty and perfidious; but this is not to be wondered at, as fraud and perfidy generally form one part of the character assigned by this author to the chiefs of the Franks. The Moslems had suffered so much from them, and been so harassed by them, for near an hundred years, and the religious principles these nations professed were so widely different, that less than this could scarce have been expected from him. Both the conduct and bravery of king Richard at the relief of the castle of Yāfā confirm the shining part of his character, as handed down to us by the Arab historians; they appearing, on that occasion, in the strongest and most glaring light possible (1).

there received him with the loudest acclamations, and the day he entered that metropolis was concluded with all possible demonstrations of joy. About six days after his arrival, he appeared in public; and every one of his subjects, that desired it, was introduced to him. Al Malec Al 'Adel, who had been at Al Carac, to view the fortifications there, likewise arrived at Damascus on Sunday, the 21st of Dbu'lkaada; and had an interview with the Soltân, then hunting in the neighbourhood of Al Keswa and Gabâ, or Gabâgeb, who attended him to his capital, with the highest marks of affection and esteem. We must not forget to remark, that Al Malec Al Afdal prepared a splendid entertainment for his brother Al Malec Al Dbâher, the 1st of Dbu'lkaada, the present year; nor that Al Malec Al Dbâher repaired several times to the Soltân's apartment that night, after he had more than once taken his final leave of him. The latter of which circumstances, according to Bohâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, seemed not obscurely to indicate, that Al Malec Al Dbâher had some misgiving, or foreboding apprehension, of his father's approaching fate^r.

What happened in the Persian Irâk, and Khowârazm, this year.

THE same year, Firnab, widow of the Atâbek Mohammed Ebn Ildighîz, at the instigation of her son Kûtlûk Enbanej, undertook to poison Togrol II. the last of the Seljûkan Soltâns of Irân. For the execution of which execrable design she was in a most commodious situation, as she lived in the Harâm, amongst the Soltân's women. But that prince, having notice thereof, prevented the blow, by making her take the dose which she had prepared for him. After this, he ordered Kûtlûk to be seized; and would have secured his own life, if he had not restored him to his liberty. For that imprudent step was the cause of all the evils that afterwards befel him. In short, this ungrateful wretch was no sooner released out of prison, than he began to meditate the destruction of the Soltân. He kept a private correspondence with Tacash, the fifth Shâh of Khowârazm, and excited him to attempt the conquest of the Persian Irâk. Tacash therefore and Kûtlûk joining their forces, after that junction, took the castle of Tabrak, or Tabarak, in the neighbourhood of Al Ray. But, after remaining for some time about Al Ray, Tacash thought fit to retire at the Soltân's approach, leaving Tafaj to govern and defend his new conquests. We are told, however, by one of M. D'Herbelot's oriental writers, notwithstanding what has been related here, that Tacash marched now at the head of his army towards the Persian Irâk, in favour of the Atâbek Kozul Arslân Ebn Ildighîz, who had been imbroiled with Togrol II. but that, upon his arrival there, he found a peace had been concluded between those two princes. This not a little surprized him, as he proposed to draw some advantage to himself from the quarrel that had happened between them. That this expedition, therefore, might not be intirely fruitless, he possessed himself of the city of Al Ray, and the castle of Tabrak, or Tabarak; leaving a body of troops, under the command of Tamcaj, one of the principal officers of his army, in the Persian Irâk, before he returned to Khowârazm. The latter of these relations, however, merits not the attention of our readers so much as the former, if Abu'lfeda's authority may be depended upon. For Kozul Arslân was assassinated in bed, according to him, in the month of Shaabân, the preceding year^s.

Shhâbo'ddîn Al Gauri invades India.

AT this time, Shahâbo'ddîn Al Gauri advanced with a numerous army to the frontiers of Al Hind, Belâd Al Hind, or India, penetrated into that vast region, and put an incredible number of Indians to the sword. He also brought off with him an immense quantity of spoil, which he acquired in this successful expedition. From Abu'lfeda it very clearly appears, that Soltân Togrol II. did not escape from his confinement, whatever may have been intimated to the contrary by M. D'Herbelot, to whom we have referred above on this head, before the beginning of the present year^t.

^r Azzo'ddîn Kelij Arslân Ebn Mas'ûd Ebn Kelij Arslân Ebn Solimân Ebn Kotolmish, or Kotlûmish, the Seljûkian Soltân of Al Rûm, departed this life at Koniya, or Iconium, about the middle of Shaabân, 588. He was an excellent governor, much revered, prudent and grave, of strict probity and justice. He undertook several expeditions against the territories of the Greeks. He had ten sons, every one of whom presided over some particular district of the Belâd Al Rûm. To his eldest son Kotbo'ddîn Malec Shâh he gave Saywâs, or Sirwâs, a noble city of the Belâd Al Rûm, the Sebastia of Pliny, and placed in Cappadocia Pontica by that author. But this young prince aspired at the sovereignty of all his father's dominions; and was assisted by Sâheb Arzencân, who favoured his ambitious views. Having surprized his father, in the city of Koniya; he obliged the old Soltân to nominate him his successor, in writing, before proper witnesses, who were assembled for that purpose. He also gave out, that he acted only as his father's prime minister, and issued all his edicts in Kelij, or Kilij,

- a Arslin's name. He led an army, as he pretended, for his father, whom he carried about as a prisoner with him, and by his command, against his brother Nûro'ddin Soltân Shâb, the Sâheb of Kaysariya, or Cæsarea, and brought him to a battle. In the heat of the action, the old prince found means to escape to his son Nûro'ddin Soltân Shâb; who received him with great honour, and behaved very dutifully to him. As for Kotbo'ddin Malec Shâb, he returned to Koniya, and assumed the title of Soltân there. Henceforth Kilij Arslân lived with his sons; going from one of them, when he was tired with him, to another. At last he came to his son Gayâtho'ddin Kaykbofrû, the Sâheb of Bargilû, a town and prefecture of the Belâd Al Rûm; who brought him back to Koniya, and expelled from thence Kotbo'ddin Malec Shâb.
- b From Koniya Kaykbofrû went to Aksarâ, a noble city of the Belâd Al Rûm. In the mean time, Soltân Azzo'ddin Kilij Arslân fell sick at Koniya, died, and was by his son Kaykbofrû there interred. Soon after his death, Kotbo'ddin Malec Shâb likewise expired; by which event, Kaykbofrû became possessed of the supreme authority at Koniya, though he was at last driven from that capital by Rocno'ddin Solimân his brother. This constrained him to fly into Syria, in order to implore the assistance of Al Malec Al Dbâber, the Sâheb of Aleppo. Rocno'ddin Solimân died, at Koniya, in the 600th year of the Hejra; and was succeeded by Kelij Arslân, his son. However, Kaykbofrû ejected him from Koniya, and reigned there over all the Rûmean provinces, till he was cut off, and then his son Kaycâwas ascended the throne. He was succeeded by Soltân 'Alâo'ddin Kaykobâd, his brother; who had for his successor Gayâtho'ddin Kaykbofrû, his son, in 634. This prince was greatly weakened, or rather, as Abu'l-feda and Ebn Shohnah express it, broke to pieces, by the Tartars, in the 641st year of the Moslem æra, when they over-ran all that part of the world. Gayâtho'ddin Kaykbofrû's demise happened, according to the best oriental writers, the following year, and with him expired the power of the Seljukian Soltâns of Al Rûm; nothing being left his two little sons Rocno'ddin and 'Azzo'ddin, who survived him, but the bare name of Soltân. For some time, they jointly swayed the sceptre of Al Rûm; but afterwards Rocno'ddin reigned alone, his brother 'Azzo'ddin flying to Constantinople. Rocno'ddin being put to death by Ma'ino'ddin, or Ma'ino'ddin Al Berwânâb, the Tartar, to whom he had rendered himself obnoxious; that prince's son was substituted in his room, though the supreme authority was really vested in Ma'ino'ddin himself. But of these transactions our readers will meet with a more full and ample account in a proper place. The same year, Al Emîr Saifo'ddin Al Mashtûb and Râshdo'ddin Senân Ebn Solimân Ebn Mohammed, surnamed Abu'l Hasber, likewise departed this life. Al Mashtûb, the governor of Nâbolos, or Neapolis, of whose tyrannical and oppressive administration the people of that city had complained to the Soltân, was left by Salâb'addîn at Al Kuds, to command the troops forming the garrison there; though 'Azzo'ddin Jordîc, a person of transcendent merit, strictly attached to justice, and a most conspicuous protector of good men, then ruled both that capital and the prefecture appertaining to it. Al Emîr Saifo'ddin Al Mashtûb arrived at the final term of his days, according to Abu'lfeda, in Nîbolos, on Thursday, the 26th of Shawâl; but, if Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd's account of this matter be true, he met his fate at Al Kuds, on Monday, the 23d of that month. He was buried in his own house, if the latter of these authors may be depended upon, after his obsequies had been performed in the temple, or rather mosque, of Al Akfa. The third part of the public revenues of Nâbolos the Soltân applied, after his death, in repairing and augmenting the fortifications of Al Kuds; the remainder he assigned Al Emîr 'Amado'ddin Ahmed, Al Mashtûb's son, and two other Emîrs. With regard to Râshdo'ddin Senân Ebn Solimân Ebn Mohammed, it may not be improper to observe, that he was the prince of the Ismaelians of Asia, or the Assessins; that, during the space of thirty years, he reduced many fortresses in Syria; and that, if Abu'lfeda may be credited, he came originally from Basra ^u.
- f THE following year, being the 589th of the Hejra, commencing Jan, 7th, 1193, proved Salâb'addîn's fatal to Al Malec Al Nâser Salâb'addîn Abu Modhaffer Yusef Ebn Ayûb Ebn Shâdi, or, according to Bobâo'ddin Ebn Sheddâd, Shâdî; who died of a bilious fever, the 27th of Safar, in the castle of Damascus. He spent some of the first days of Al Moharram, in hunting, accompanied by his brother, and those of his sons then with him, in the neighbourhood of that city. The 13th of Safar, certain embassadors from the princes of the Franks were introduced into his apartment, in order to have an audience of him; but an infant son of his, nicknamed Al Emîr, with whom he was then at play, being frightened at their unusual garb, and the strange figure they made, he told them he was then engaged, and desired the audience might be deferred to another day. As this was contrary to the affability and condescension he had always been famous for, and to the whole tenor of his former conduct, it was taken particular notice of. Some of his courtiers observed, that the same day his appetite failed him.

This was attended by a drowsiness and languor, that plainly indicated the commencement of an indisposition. The 15th, being Friday, he took a view on horseback of the pilgrims returned from Mecca, three of whom were Sâbeko'ddîn, Karâlâ Al Târûki, and the son of his brother Saif Al Islâm, the Sâheb of Al Yaman; and treated the doctors amongst them with uncommon marks of veneration and esteem. The 16th, he was worse than he had been on either of the two preceding days; and was visited by Al Malec Al Afdal, Al Kâdi Bobô'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, who wrote his life, and Al Kâdi Al Fadl. From that day the distemper grew more violent, and chiefly affected his head; which was looked upon, by those about him, as a sign of his approaching dissolution. The fourth day of the disease, he was let blood, by order of the physicians attending him; after which, the fever raged with greater violence than before. The ninth day, he was seized with a delirium; which, with little intermission, continued to the time of his death. The following day, two clysters were applied; which, with a good quantity of psisan that he took, somewhat relieved him. But an excessive sweat afterwards brought him so low, that he wanted strength to struggle with the distemper. Al Malec Al Afdal, finding his father in extreme danger, convoked the principal Kâdis, generals, and lords of the court, to secure to himself the succession, and preserve the public repose. Of these Sa'do'ddîn Mas'ûd, brother of Bedro'ddîn Mawdûd, governor of Damascus, Khoshtarîn Hosein Al Haccâri, 'Alcân, and Melcân, bound themselves by oath to acknowledge Al Malec Al Afdal for Salâb'addîn's successor, after that prince's death, simply and without reserve; but Nâfero'ddîn, the Sâheb of Sebiyûn, Sâbeko'ddîn, the Sâheb of Shaizar, Nûshirwân Al Zerkârî, Maimûn Al Katsfri, Shams'o'ddîn Al Cabbîr, Sankar Al Mashtûb, and others, took the same oath, under certain restrictions and limitations. From the beginning of his illness, the Soltân had been attended by some religious Sheikh or other, who was employed in reading proper portions of the Korân to him; but Al Sheikh Abu Jaasar, the Imâm of the temple Al Calâfa, famous for his sanctity, who was called in to assist him in his last moments, remained the whole night preceding that prince's death with him. Though the Soltân had been for the most part delirious, ever since the ninth night of the distemper, yet when the Sheikh came to a passage of the Korân, asserting the divine unity and omniscience, he suddenly started up, being then at the point of departure, and said, "This is most true." In fine, on Wednesday, the 27th of Safar, a little after morning prayer was ended, Al Kâdi Al Fadl then being with him, to the inconceivable regret of the whole Moslem world, he expired. Al Kâdi Bobô'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, who came from the mosque, where he had been performing his morning devotions, soon after the Soltân's departure, into the castle, and Al Kâdi Al Fadl conducted every thing relative to his funeral, after his body had been washed by Al Fakîh Al Dawlâ'i the Khattîb of Damascus. The meridian prayer was no sooner over, than the corpse was put upon a bier, habited in the usual manner, and prepared for interment. After which, prodigious numbers of people crowded into the castle, to pray for the repose of his soul; and, a little before evening prayer, the same day, he was inhumed, in the place where he died. This great conqueror was born, as has been already observed, in the castle, or palace, of Tecrît, where his father Ayûb was then governor, in the year of the Hejra 532; and consequently he must have been about fifty-seven lunar years old, at the time of his demise. Of these he reigned near seventeen, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab, or nineteen, if Abu'lfeda may be depended upon, over Al Shâm, or Syria; and about twenty-four over Diyâr Mesr, or Egypt. He left behind him seventeen sons, and one daughter. The eldest of his sons was Al Malec Al Afdal Nûro'ddîn Ali Ebn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, who was born in the year of the Hejra 565. Al'Azîz Otbmân was about two years younger; and Al Malec Al Dhâber, the Sâheb of Aleppo, younger than him. His daughter was married to her first cousin, or uncle's son, Al Malec Al Câmel, the Sâheb of Egypt. With regard to Salâb'addîn's character, he has passed, as well as Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Zenki, for one of the best and bravest princes whose actions have been transmitted down to posterity by the Moslem writers. He has been represented as mild, humble, patient, just, pious, beneficent, liberal, a conniver at faults, and in fine as a prince of a most sweet and amiable disposition (C). But, notwithstanding this fine picture drawn of him, that some instances of (D) cruelty, rapaciousness,

(C) Ebn Shohnab says, that he was always ready to forgive the faults of his friends, attendants, and domestics, perfectly good-natured, on all occasions; of open conversation, and sincere in all his professions (1).

(D) His shining qualities were at least in some measure clouded by his insatiable ambition, his ingratitude to his benefactor Nûro'ddîn and his family, as well as to the son of his uncle Shairacûb, and his election of unworthy favourites. With regard to his ambition, that sufficiently appears from the whole tenor of his conduct. His ingratitude to Nûro'ddîn and the son of Shairacûb, as well as to the family of the former of those princes, was certainly most odious and detestable; since his grandeur was wholly owing to the countenance given him first by Nûro'ddîn, and to the support he afterwards received from Shairacûb. His principal favourites were Shams'o'ddawla, a man of an exceeding bad character, and Al Malec Al 'Akl, his brothers, besides

What happened, in the empire he had formed, immediately after his demise.

SOLTAN Salûb'addîn was so regretted by his subjects of all ranks and denominations, that there was a general mourning for him in every part of his vast dominions; which, as Bobîo'd-dîn Ebn Sheddâd seems to intimate, had never happened before, since the deaths of the first and most pious Khalîfs. Al Malec Al Afdal, Salûb'addîn's eldest son, who succeeded him in Syria, for three days received the compliments of condolence in the palace; and then sent advice of his father's decease to his brothers Al 'Azîz Othmân, in Egypt, and Al Dhâber Gâzi, at Aleppo, as also to his uncle Al Malec Al 'Adel, at Al Carac. Al Malec Al Afdal Nûro'd-dîn Ali, to whom the principal officers and grandees of the court had taken the oath of allegiance, as his father's successor, a day or two before the Soltân expired, forbade the poets to repeat any verses, and the orators and preachers to exercise their eloquence, on this doleful occasion; his younger brothers, then with him, at the same time rending the air with their cries and lamentations. Some authors write, that the Soltân's obsequies were not publickly solemnized till the arrival of Al 'Azîz Othmân, Al Dhâber Gâzi, and Al Malec Al 'Adel, who assisted at the performance of them; and that, during this solemnity, Settalshâm Bint Ayûb, the deceased Soltân's sister, distributed large sums of money out of her own purse, amongst the poor. Mobîo'ddîn Ebn Al Kâdi Zekîo'ddîn read the prayers at Salûb'addîn's interment, and Al Malec Al Afdal remained in the temple, or Al Jama', near which he afterwards erected his father a stately tomb, three whole days. The Soltân being thus dead, the following division of the most considerable provinces and cities of his empire amongst the princes of his family, and the chief commanders of his troops, was made. Al Malec Al Afdal Nûro'ddîn Ali had for his share the kingdoms of Damascus and Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, and the Lower Syria (G), the Cælo-Syria of the antients. Al Malec Al 'Azîz Othmân reigned over Al Diyâr Al Mesriya, or all the regions, nomes, and districts of Egypt. To Al Malec Al Dhâber Gayâtbo'ddîn Gâzi was assigned Aleppo, and all the Upper Syria (H), which intirely depended upon that capital. Al Malec Al 'Adel Saifo'ddîn Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb, Salûb'addîn's brother, obtained Al Carac and Al Shawbec, or Al Shawbac, together with Al Belâd Al Sharkiya, or the eastern provinces. His nephew Al Malec Al Mansûr Nâsero'ddîn Mohammed enjoyed the sovereignty of Hamah, Salamiyah, Al Maarra, and Manbij, together with that of the castle of Nojm. Al Malec Al Amjed, or Amjad, Majo'ddîn Bahrâm, or Baharâm, Shâh Ebn Farkshâh Ebn Shâhinsâh Ebn Ayûb, had assigned him Baalbec, with its dependencies. Shairacûb Ebn Mohammed Ebn Shairacûb Ebn Shâdi (I) was possessed of Hems, Rakaba, and Tadmor. Al Malec Khidr, one of the Soltân Salûb'addîn's younger sons, held Basra, though dependently on his brother Al Malec Al Afdal. Sâbeko'ddîn, or Sâbiko'ddîn, Othmân Ebn Al Dâya presided over Shaizar and Abu Kobais. Nâsero'ddîn Ebn Cawris Ebn Khemârdekîn occupied Sebyân and the castle of Burziya. Bedro'ddîn Duldurm Ebn Bobâo'ddîn Yârûk had Tel Bâsbar, or Tel Bâsher. 'Azzo'ddîn Sâma ruled at Cawcab and 'Ajlûn. And lastly, the authority of 'Azzo'ddîn Ibrahim Ebn Shams'o'ddîn Al Mokaddem was recognized at Bagrâs, or Pagra, Cafartâb, or Cafertâb, and Afâmiya, or Apamia. The five last of these princes were generals, much esteemed by the Soltân; who, on many occasions, had greatly distinguished themselves in his service.

Al Malec Al Afdal is declared his father's successor.

AL Malec Al Afdal, being the Soltân's eldest son, was publicly declared his successor in the empire; after which, he chose for his Wazîr Dîao'ddîn Nâsrallah, the son of Mohammed Ebn Al Athîr, who published a collection of proverbs, and was an author of considerable note. This Mohammed was brother of the famous 'Azzo'ddîn Ebn Al Athîr, or rather Abu'l Hasan Ali 'Azzo'ddîn Ebn Al Athîr; who wrote the general or universal history intituled, Al Câmel, to which in this work we have so often referred. The new Soltân, at the insligation of the Wazîr, discarded his father's generals; who thereupon offered their service to Al Malec Al Dhâber, at Aleppo, and Al Malec Al 'Azîz, in Egypt. The principal officers of the Egyptian forces went in a body to Al Malec Al Azîz, in order to prevail upon him to assert his right to the a succession, and attack his brother Al Malec Al Afdal. To this he was of himself sufficiently well inclined, and therefore readily listened to their advice; though, according to the eastern writers, he did not lead an army into Syria before the year of the Hejra, 592^x.

ABOUT this time, 'Aláo'ddín Ebn Il Arslán, surnamed Tacash, the fifth Sháh, or Soltán, of What hap- Khowárazm, marched again towards the frontiers of Khorasán, to accommodate some fresh differences that had arisen between him and his brother Soltán Sháh, about the limits of their respective states. He was no sooner arrived in the territory of Abiwerd, than the governor of that place, and of the whole province of Sarakhs, which made part of the dominions of Soltán Sháh, came to meet him, took the oath of fidelity to him, and advised him to move with all possible expedition against his brother, that he might surprize him before he could put himself in a posture of defence. But the news of the Soltán Sháh's death then arriving, he made himself master of the large province of Khorasán without striking a stroke. Tacash now finding himself in full possession of all the states which had been governed by his ancestors under the name and title of the Soltáns of Khowárazm, he proposed to give the government of the provinces of Sarakhs and Merú to Mohammed Kotbo'ddín, his son. But Malec Sháh, Mohammed's brother, being desirous of changing the government of Nisábúr, which his father had bestowed upon him, for that of Sarakhs and Merú; Tacash conferred the latter of these upon that prince, and sent Mohammed to Nisábúr, to preside over the people there. Not long after which, Mohammed resigned his post to Malec Sháh; who thereby became sole governor of Khorasán, under the orders of Tacash. The transactions here touched upon proved a seasonable diversion in favour of Soltán Togrol II. who, by the absence of Tacash, was enabled to retake the castle of Tabrak, Tabrek, Tabarak, or Iabarek, and to recover every thing he had lost, the preceding year^y.

BEFORE the close of the year that we are now upon, Saifo'ddín Baftamar, or Boftemar the Sáheb of Khalát, or Akhlát, and the Atábek 'Azzo'ddín Mas'úd Ebn Mawdúd Ebn Zenki Ebn Aksankar, the Sáheb of Al Mawfel, departed this life. The former of these came to a violent death, according to the Arab historians, the first of the former Jomáda, not much above two lunar months after Saláb'addín's demise. Baftamar, or Boftemar, could not forbear expressing his joy openly, in an indecent manner, when the news of the Soltán's decease was brought him. As he bore an implacable hatred to that prince, he pretended to believe that he was destitute of every virtue and good quality. He assumed the surname of Abd'alaziz, not long before the tragical exit he made; the speedy approach of which, after the Soltán's death, that filled him with so much joy, seems to have been looked upon as a divine judgment by Abu'l Faraj. The Atábek 'Azzo'ddín Mas'úd Ebn Mawdúd, who died the 27th of Shaabán, was a religious good man, mild, patient, modest, extremely beneficent, and in fine a prince of a most amiable disposition. His patience resembled that of his grandfather Zenki, and his modesty was so great, that he never conversed with any person sitting near him but with his eyes fixed on the ground. His favours he granted with the utmost benevolence, affability, and condescension. He reigned, if Ebn Shoknah may be credited, at Al Mawfel about thirteen years and six months, and was succeeded there by his son Núro'ddín Arslán Sháh. Dhabíro'ddín Al Hazárdínári, one of Sháh Armen's Mamlúks, or purchased slaves, as Boftemar himself had been, enjoyed after Boftemar's death, the sovereignty of Khalát. Soltán Sháh Ebn Il Arslán, the fourth Soltán, or Sháh, of Khowárazm, is also said to have died in 589. We must not forget to remark, that the college founded by Nodhám Al Molc was either repaired or rebuilt by the Khalif Al Náser Ledin'illah, who added thereto a library, consisting of 12,000 volumes, most of which were originals, according to some authors of considerable repute, the present year^z.

THE next year, being the 590th of the Hejra, which began Dec. 27th, 1713, Kútlúk, a Togrol Ebn Arslán Sháh's ally in concert with Tacash, marched with a powerful army into the Persian Irák; but being defeated by Togrol Ebn Arslán Sháh the last Soltán of the Seljúks of Irán, he was obliged to fly with Tacash into Khowárazm. The Soltán after this, thinking he was delivered from all his enemies, abandoned himself to women and wine, with unlimited excess. And though he was told, that Tacash was raising a formidable army to invade his dominions, yet, intoxicated with his success and delights, he continued his debauches, and neglected affairs to such a degree, that the grandees of the court wrote themselves to Tacash to make haste; assuring him, that he might easily surprize Togrol in the midst of his revels. Whereupon Tacash, following their advice, made such expedition, that he arrived at the gates of Al Ray, whilst the Soltán was still buried in liquor. However, he put himself at the head of his troops, and marched towards the enemy; repeating certain verses out of the Shâb Nameh (K), spoken by some warrior, boasting of what he would do. But raising his mace, as if he was going to strike, in conformity to the words he had pronounced, he discharged such a blow on one of the forelegs of his horse, that the beast fell under him, and he was thrown himself by the fall. Kâtlik, seeing him on the ground, immediately ran, and, with one blow of his scymitar, put an end to his life, and the power of the Seljuks in Irâk. Tacash, not content with the downfall of this prince, whose territories he annexed to his own, sent his head to the Khalif Al Nâser Ledin'illah at Baghdâd, and ordered his body to be fastened to a gibbet at Al Ray. One of the authors consulted by M. D'Herbelot nevertheless relates the conquest of Irâk, by the Shâb of Khowârazm, in a different manner. He informs us, that Tacash receiving advice of the death of Tamgaj, whom he had left as his commandant in the city of Al Ray, and the strong castle of Tabarek, as also of Togrol's infraction of the treaty subsisting between them, entered the Persian Irâk with a numerous army, vanquished the Seljukian Soltân in battle, and joined the estates of that prince in Asia to his own. This, together with the death of Togrol Ebn Arslân Shâb, gave the finishing stroke to the dynasty of the Seljuks of Irân; after which, Tacash conferred the government of Esfabân upon Kilij Enbanej, the son, or rather grandson, of the Atâbek Ilâighiz, with whom he had always kept a close intelligence against the Seljukian Soltâns of Irân. But the government of all the other cities of the Persian Irâk, of which Al Ray was now the capital, he assigned his third son, named Yûnos Khân, and went himself to pass the winter at Kowârazm, which he ever looked upon as the royal seat of his empire. With regard to Soltân Togrol, it may not be improper to remark, that, according to Khondemir, he reigned eighteen years, ten months, and a half. The Lebtârikh exhibits twenty-nine years, by mistake for nineteen; as appears by collating the year of his death with that of his predecessor's demise, as marked by the same author. Togrol, notwithstanding what has been here said of him, had many noble qualities. He was not only eminent for his courage, on which account his subjects compared him to Rostam and Isfandiar, two Persian heroes of antiquity, but also for his wit and knowledge. He excelled so much in poetry, that some esteemed him not inferior to Anwari, or Anweri, and Dhahir, or Dhebir, two celebrated Persian (L) poets. A Persian quatrain of his has been transmitted down to us, the sense of which is contained in the following terms. "The possession of the good thing I loved filled my soul yesterday with joy, and a cruel separation from it renders me to day extremely miserable. Such is the deplorable state of my life. Fortune effaces to day what she had yesterday written in my favour." Togrol often disputed with the learned, had a majestic mein, and was very handsome. He is said to have surpassed all the Seljukian Soltâns in goodness and justice, as well as in managing his arms both on foot and on horseback. The poet Nazami, who admired Togrol's learning more than his power, says of

(K) Shâb Nameh, or royal book, is the title given by the famous poet Ferdûsi to the poem which he wrote upon the history of the ancient kings of Persia, composed for the use of Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekîn, founder of the dynasty of the Gaznevîds, and generally known by the name of Mahmûd Gazni. It consists of 60,000 Bâits, or distichs, amounting to 120,000 verses. The author was thirty years in composing it. Ferdûsi is styled by the eastern writers Danishmand 'Ajem, the learned Persian, and was the most celebrated of all the Persian poets. He received as a reward for the Shâb Nameh, written at the requisition of Soltân Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekîn, only 60,000 dirhems. This so irritated him, that he quitted the Soltân's court, satyrized him, and retired to Tûs, in Khorâsân, the place of his nativity, from whence he is sometimes denominated Al Tûsi; where he died, in the year of the Hejra 411. The Shâb Nameh has been translated into Arabic prose, by Kawâmo'ddin Fatah Abu Ali Al Hindi; who, according to M. D'Herbelot, undertook this translation at the command of Soltân Al Malec Al Aâdbam Isa, the son of Al Malec Al 'Adel, of the house of Ayûb, in the year of the Moslem æra 675. In this last article, however, we cannot help believing M. D'Herbelot to be mistaken, and would therefore willingly substitute in the room of it, as more consonant to the eastern writers, and particularly to Abu'l Faraj, the following words; "who undertook this translation at the command of Al Malec Al Moâbham, or Moadbhem, Isa, the son of Al Malec Al 'Adel, of the house of Ayûb in the year of the Hejra 615 (1)".

(L) Anwari, or Anweri, and Dhahir, or Dhebir, were two of the most excellent poets that Persia ever produced. The former of them was born in a village appertaining to the city of Abiwerd in Khorâsân, named Bedench, and pretended to profound skill in astrology, as well as poetry. But, by his false prediction relating to the consequence of the great conjunction of the seven planets in the third degree of Libra, in 581, he so exposed himself, that his reputation was thereby almost intirely ruined. This brought upon him so many reprimands from Soltân Togrol Ebn Arslân, and so much ridicule from those who envied his good fortune, particularly Ferid Câteb, that he found himself obliged to depart from Merû, then the royal seat of the Seljukian Soltâns, and retire to Balkh. But the people there insulted him to such a degree, continually reproaching him with the falsity of his prediction, and his ignorance, that he would have been forced to leave that place also, had not 'Amâdo'ddin, the first Kâdi of that city, taken him under his protection. Here it was that he wrote a poem, wherein he publicly and solemnly declared his intention never for the future to concern himself with judicial astrology. He died at Balkh, in the year of the Hejra 597. With regard to Dhahir, or Dhebir, the latter of the poets mentioned here, he composed several fine poems, and was held in high esteem, as well as Anwari, his contemporary, by Tacash, the fifth Shâb, or Soltân, of Khowârazm (2).

a him, "He reflected a lustre upon the throne of the kingdom of wit, and conquered the whole extent of the region of immortality." In Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shobnah's history, Tacash is corruptly called Bacshi. This writer relates, that Togrol Ebn Arslan Shâb was killed in battle; and that the Shâb of Khowârazm, after his death and defeat, obliged the country of 'Ajem, or Persia, to make its submission to him ^a.

THE 591st year of the Hejra, which commenced Dec. 10th, 1194, was rendered memorable to all succeeding ages by a signal victory, gained by the Magrebian, or Mogrebian, Moslems over the Christians of Spain, according to Abu'l Faraj. Alfonfus, Alonso, or Alonso IX. king of Castile, surnamed The Good, and The Noble, who married the princess Eleanor, daughter to our king Henry II. having written an insulting letter to Yakûb Ebn Yusef Ebn Abd'almûmen, king of the Al Moâbedûn, in West Barbary and Spain; that monarch marched against him at the head of a formidable army, overthrew him with incredible slaughter, and acquired an immense quantity of spoil. Some authors pretend, that the Moslems killed 146,000 of the Christians upon the spot, and took no less than 20,000 of them prisoners. But this exceeds all manner of belief. Alfonfus, continues Abul Faraj, was carried on a mule, after this defeat, to Toledo (M), then his capital; swearing that he would not mount a horse, before he had received succours from the neighbouring Christian princes. Nay, if M. Renaudot's authors may be depended upon, he made a vow never to sleep in bed, nor ride on horseback, nor lie with his wife, till he had revenged himself of his enemies. To which others add, that he shaved his head and his beard, and inverted the cross, in token of mourning; which seems to be too romantic, and to favour too much of the Moorish, or Arab, genius, to merit any regard. The Spanish historians themselves indeed own the defeat of the king of Castile, but they are far from admitting the loss of any such number of men as that mentioned here. Nor did this blow hinder Alfonfus from obtaining several victories afterwards over the Al Moâbedûn, particularly at the battle of Na as de Tolosa, wherein 200,000 of the Moslems are said to have been slain, and, by that means, recovering many cities and strong places from them. The action, that proved so disadvantageous to the king of Castile, happened near Alarcos; tho', if M. Renaudot in this point may be depended upon, it is denominated the battle of Zulaca by some of the Arab writers ^b.

Alfonfus or Alonso IX. king of Castile, is overthrown by Yakûb Ebn Yusef Ebn Abd'almûmen king of the Magrebian Moslems of Spain.

d THE Khân of Saganak having made some motions, towards the beginning of the spring, this year, in the Transoxana; Tacash, the Shâb of Khowârazm, found himself obliged to take the field with a powerful army. The Khân was no sooner apprized of this, than he waited in person upon Tacash, in order to obtain a peace; which the Shâb, or Soltân, at the request of the principal lords of his court, granted him, and then immediately returned to his capital. At the same time, Malec Shâb, Tacash's son, being come to his father's court, and having left his own son Arslân Shâb to command in Khorasân during his absence; Sanjar Shâb, the Soltân's brother-in-law, excited thereto by some turbulent and seditious spirits, who solicited him to avail himself of Malec Shâb's absence, and occupy a post that then seemed to be vacant, unluckily entered into a dangerous conspiracy, formed by a wicked cabal, against the Soltân. But he had scarce given his consent to the measures projected by these factious people, when Tacash, who had been apprized of the whole affair, commanded him to repair with all possible expedition to Khowârazm. As the conspiracy was only in embryo, and nothing yet had been openly undertaken against the Soltân, and consequently Sanjar Shâb was not apprehensive of his having incurred Tacash's displeasure; he punctually, without the least reluctance, obeyed the order he had received. But he was no sooner arrived at court, than Tacash deprived him both of his liberty and his sight, and by that means rendered abortive all his designs. 'Tis true, the Soltân not long after restored him to his liberty, at the intreaty of his sister, whom Sanjar had espoused. But he was obliged to content himself with a large pension, which the Soltân settled upon him, to comfort him in his disgrace. About this time it happened, that Yûnos Khân, Tacash's son, who commanded for him in Irâk, fell into a distemper, for which he could meet with no relief in the city of Al Ray, where he resided. He therefore took a resolution to change the air, and for that purpose went to Khorasân; leaving for his lieutenant in Irâk Miagen, in whom he reposed great confidence, but who was a secret enemy to the Atâbek Enbancj, governor of Esfahân, and a confidant of Soltân Tacash. Yûnos Khân had not long-been gone, before the Khalif Al Nâser Ledinî'llab, who was not a little disturbed at the approach of the Khowârazmians so near his frontiers, sent his orders to Ebn Cassab, his Wazîr, to enter with a formidable army the territories of Yûnos Khân. The Atâbek Kilij Enbanej, one of the best friends and most faithful servants of Tacash, was no sooner informed of the motions of the Khalif's forces, than he marched in person, and joined Miagen with his troops, to hinder Ebn Cassab from making an irruption into Irâk. Miagen, far from treating the Atâbek with the respect and affection his fidelity deserved, being jealous of him, caused his person to be seized, and his head to be cut off, which he instantly sent to Tacash; giving him at the same time to understand, that he had been forced to this execution by the treason the Atâbek had been guilty of, in keeping a correspondence with the Khalif. Tacash easily saw through the artifice of Miagen, and began to be afraid lest that general should betray him. He nevertheless took care to avoid every thing which might induce Miagen to believe, that he entertained any suspicion of him; and set out, with the utmost diligence, in order to attack Ebn Cassab, who died just at the time that the Khalif's forces and those of the Khowârazmians were going to engage. His death, however, which was kept so secret in the Khalif's army, that Tacash heard nothing of it before the end of the action, did not prevent a battle; which, after an obstinate dispute, terminated in the defeat of Al Nâser's troops. This obliged the Khalif to come to an accommodation with Tacash, and to leave him in peaceable possession of Irâk. But, before the Soltân returned home, he insisted upon having the head of Ebn Cassab; which he sent as a trophy of his victory to Khowârazm, and afterwards deprived Miagen of his government, for putting to death, without any just cause, the Atâbek his friend. That general, some time after, attempted to raise commotions in Irâk; he was seized, and thrown into prison, where he miserably ended his days^c.

In the 592d year of the Hejra, beginning Dec. 6th, 1195, Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr, Salâb'addîn's brother, the Sâkeb of Al Carac, and Al Malec Al 'Azîz, Othmân, the Soltân's younger son, who reigned in Egypt, having formed a design to dispossess Al Malec Al Afdal Nûro'ddîn Ali, Salâb'addîn's successor, of the territories that had been assigned him in Syrîa; they laid siege to Damascus, and obliged Al Malec Al Afdal to retire to Sarkhod. Both the city and the castle being surrendered to Al Malec Al 'Azîz, he resided some days in the latter, and then delivered it up to Al Malec Al 'Adel; after which, he returned to Al Kâbirab. Some authors write, that Damascus was betrayed to the Egyptian troops. Be that as it will, Al Malec Al Afdal was forced to cede that capital, with all its dependencies, to his brother and uncle, and acquiesce in the possession of Sarkhod, with the prefecture appertaining to it. Al Malec Al 'Azîz, after the cession of the kingdom of Damascus, was mentioned in all the mosques there, had money coined in his name, and was honoured with all the ensigns of royalty; notwithstanding which, the supreme authority was solely vested in Al Malec Al 'Adel, so that he was in reality the absolute master of the kingdom of Jerusalem and Damascus. Al Malec Al Afdal, being a good poet, wrote a letter to the Khalif Al Nâser Ledinî'llab, of the house of Al Abbâs, after his dominions had been ravished from him, in verse, to the following effect. "My lord, you very well know, that Abu Becr and Othmân deprived Ali by violence of the Khalifat; which of right belóngen to him, after the death of his father-in-law Mohammed. See then the fatality of the name of Ali, since I, who bear that name, have the same justice done me, by Abu Becr, my uncle, and Othmân, my brother." The Khalif Al Nâser Ledinî'llab, having received this letter, sent him the following answer to it likewise in verse. "Ali was deprived unjustly of his right, because he wanted a Nâser, or protector, at Medina. But be of good courage; they shall soon give an account of what they have done, and you shall find in me, who am Al Nâser, or the protector, every kind of succour and protection." This poor prince had deposited his father's corpse in the tomb erected by him near the Jâma', or temple, in Damascus, the 9th of Al Moharram, before he was driven from that city. He himself preceded the corpse, conducted from the castle, by Dâr Al Hadîth, to the Bâb Al Barid, and placed for some time within the temple, opposite to the pulpit. We are told by certain writers, that another battle was fought between the Christians and the Moslems in Spain, and that Toledo was besieged by the latter, the present year^d.

THE following year, being the 593d of the Hejra, commencing Nov. 24th, 1196, Malec Shâb, Tacash's son, governor in chief of the whole province of Khorasân, being dead; Tacash bestowed that government upon Mohammed Kotbo'ddîn, his other son, and gave him Sa'ido'ddîn Mas'ûd for his Wazîr. This Mas'ûd was surnamed Nodbâm Al Molc, as well as that famous Wazîr who had been prime minister to Malec Shâb I. Soltân of the Seljûks of Irân. The victory Tacash had gained over the Khalif's troops gave him an opportunity

a of purging at this time Adberbijân of the Ismaelians, or Affassins, who had made themselves masters of any castles and places of strength in that province. He chased them from the castle of Arslân Kufshâi, which they had occupied, and constrained them to take refuge in that of Calâat Al Mût, their principal fortress, which he did not think fit to attack. Before his departure, he conferred the government of the Persian Irâk upon a third son of his, named Tâjo'ddîn Ali Shâb. This year, according to some of the eastern writers, died Saif Al Islâm Tagtakîn Ebn Ayûb, Salâb'addîn's brother, at Zabîd, in Al Yaman, where he had amassed immense riches, by fleecing his subjects; all which he left to his son and successor Al Moezz Shamsalmolûc Ismael, who assumed the title of Khalîf. This so incensed his subjects, who looked upon Al Nâser Ledînî'llah as the only true Khalîf, or rightful successor of Mohammed, b that, in the 599th year of the Hejra, they conspired against him, and slew him; vindicating, as they imagined, by such conduct, the honour of their religion. After which, the Emîrs saluted his younger brother Sâbeb of Al Yaman, and dignified him with the title, or surname, of Al Nâser. As this prince was incapable of holding the reins of government himself, by reason of his tender age; he remained, for a certain time, under the tutelage of his mother. But being poisoned, by some of the people about him; she thought fit to marry Solimân Ebn Takîo'ddîn Omar Ebn Shâbînshâb Ebn Ayûb, who had lived from his infancy amongst the Fakîrs, or poor religious, and still lived as one of them at Mecca. Solimân, being by no means qualified for the sublime station to which he had been advanced, was afterwards deposed by his subjects; and the family of Ayûb at last, according to some of M. Renaudot's
c authors, lost all their power and influence in Arabia (N). Every thing remained quiet on the side of Khûzistân, the Susiana of the antients, this and the two preceding years; Mowayyado'ddîn, surnamed Ebn Cassab, the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledînî'llah's Wazîr, having extinguished a rebellion there, in the 600th year of the Hejra, by defeating in several rencounters the revolted troops, and reduced that province entirely to the obedience of the Khalîf. We must not forget to remark, that Al Malec Al 'Adel took Tâfâ, Tâffâ, or Joppa, from the Franks, as they did Bayrût, or Berytus, from the Moslems, in the year that we are now upon*.

THE next year, being the 594th of the Hejra, which began Nov. 13th, 1197, 'Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Mawdûd Ebn Zenki Ebn Aksankar, the Sâbeb of Senjâr, or Sinjâr, Nasîbîn, d cities, and the districts appertaining to them, by Kotbo'ddîn Mahmûd, his son. Nasîbîn was, however, soon after occupied by one Nûro'ddîn, perhaps another of 'Amâdo'ddîn's sons, according to Abu'l Faraj. The same year, Tacash Ebn Arslân, the Shâb of Khowârazm, marched to Bokhâra, then possessed by the Katayans, and laid siege to that city. The inhabitants, supported by the Katayans, had so little apprehension of the Shâb, who was blind of one eye, that they led a dog with one eye, dressed in a vest and tunic, with a cap or turban on his head, round the walls; saying at the same time, by way of derision and contempt, "This is the Khowârazm Shâb, or Shâb of Khowârazm." After which, they discharged him out of one of their military engines upon the besiegers; crying out aloud, "This is your king." Tacash nevertheless, in a few days, made himself master of the town; and, notwithstanding the high provocation he had received, treated both the people and the garrison with great lenity and moderation. Nay, if in this point we may depend upon Abu'l Faraj, he behaved more like a benefactor than a conqueror to them. About this time, Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb came to an open rupture with Hosâmo'ddîn Tûlak Arslân, the Sâbeb of Mâredîn, and advanced at the head of his forces to that city. Soon after he had presented himself before the place, the suburbs were betrayed to him; which he permitted his troops to pillage, in a shameful manner. He had no sooner possessed himself of the suburbs, than he formed the siege of the castle; which, notwithstanding all his efforts, he found himself obliged to raise, the following year†.

f THE 595th year of the Hejra, which commenced November 3d, 1198, produced several remarkable events; the principal of which, that have been taken notice of by the oriental writers, and of the year 595.

(N) Notwithstanding what is advanced here, from M. Renaudot, we are told, with no small appearance of truth, that the present reigning family in Al Yaman is probably that of Ayûb; a branch of which reigned there in the thirteenth century, and took the title of Khalîf and Imâm, which they still retain. They are not possessed of the whole province of Al Yaman, there being several other independent kingdoms there, particularly that of Fartach. The capital of this kingdom bears the same name, and its principal port at present is that of Sheer, or Shîbr, a town situated between the city of 'Aden and cape Fartach. This tract produces the frankincense, gums, and all the most esteemed spices. A considerable part of the sea-coast likewise does not recognize the authority of the king of Al Yaman, as sufficiently appears from the modern traveller referred to here (1).

writers, we shall beg leave just to touch upon. The 20th of Al Moharram (O), died Al Malec Al 'Aziz, the Sáheb of Egypt. Upon his demise, the Omrá, or Emírs, sent to his brother Al Malec Al Afdal; desiring he would repair to Al Kábirab, without delay, that they might place him upon the throne. Hastening, therefore, to the capital, his authority was recognized by people of all ranks and denominations there. So far we are informed by Abu'l Faraj. But other authors relate this affair in a different manner. According to them, Al Malec Al 'Aziz left behind him a son, named Al Mansúr, then only nine years of age, to whom the Asadian and Salábian Emírs (P) took the oath of allegiance; but insisted, that Al Malec Al Afdal should be nominated regent, and govern the kingdom of Egypt, during the minority of the young prince. This being notified to him, he came immediately to Al Kábirab, put himself at the head of the administration, and entered into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with his brother Al Malec Al Dháber, the Sáheb of Aleppo; the effects of which, with regard to their uncle Al Malec Al 'Adel, very soon appeared. For, uniting their forces, they formed the siege of Damascus; which obliged Al Malec Al 'Adel to draw off from before Máredin, a city that he had long besieged, and march with the utmost expedition to the relief of his capital. Some time after his arrival, Al Malec Al Dháber having lost a beautiful Turkish boy, the object of his unnatural lust; Al Malec Al 'Adel sent a messenger to acquaint him, that his brother Al Malec Al Afdal had carried off the young Turk, and to discover to him the place where he lay concealed. This intelligence so incensed Al Malec Al Dháber against Al Malec Al Afdal, that he ordered the Emír, employed by him on this occasion, to be immediately thrown into irons, reproached his brother in the sharpest terms, and returned to Aleppo with his troops; which constrained Al Malec Al Afdal to retire, with great precipitation, to Al Kábirab, when Damascus, which had been so long pressed by him and his brother, was upon the point of surrendering to them. Takúb Ebn Yusef Ebn Abd'almúmen, the fourth monarch of the Al Moábedún, surnamed Al Mansúr, likewise departed this life, if Ebn Shohnab may be credited, the present year. He was forty-eight years old, of which he had reigned fifteen, at the time of his death; being succeeded by his son Al Náser (Q) Mohammed, who assumed the title of Emír Al Múmenín, as his ancestors had done before. The famous Abd'almalec Ebn Zabar, or Zohar, known amongst us by the name of Avenzohar, a Spanish, or Andalusian, physician, by religion a Mohammedan, also paid the common tribute to nature, according to Ebn Shohnab, before the close of the present year^e.

Tacash dies.

In the 596th year of the Hejra, beginning October 23d, 1199, Tacash having received advice, that Nodbám Al Molc, whom he had appointed to serve his son in the capacity of Wazír, had been murdered by some Ismaelians, or Assassins, who after the execrable action had retired to the castle of Tarshíz; he sent orders to his son Kotbo'ddín Mohammed, the governor of Khorasán, to undertake the siege of that place, and intirely to extirpate the race of those robbers. Mohammed, in obedience to those orders, set out upon the expedition; when a vessel full of water, which was brought him, that he might make the necessary ablutions, broke to pieces of itself. This he interpreted as an ill omen, and thereupon was persuaded that some signal misfortune would in a short time happen to him. Accordingly he was soon after apprized of the death of his father Tacash; who died, in the month of Ramadán, at Tshab-Arab, upon the confines of Khowárazm. He reigned, according to Khondemir, twenty-

(O) Al Malec Al 'Aziz was grievously wounded by a fall from his horse, that he got in hunting; which, according to an author followed by M. Renaudot, occasioned his death. (1).

(P) The Asadian Emírs were those old officers who had served Asado'ddin Shairacúb, and the Salábian those who entered the service in the time of Saláh'addin Yusef Ebn Ayúb. The former had but little regard for the family of Saláh'addin, whom they considered as an upstart; and one that had acquired his power by perfidy and fraud. Nor did the latter, consisting chiefly of Mamlúks, or purchased slaves, retain a very grateful sense of the favours they might at any time have received from him; nor consequently entertain any real affection, or esteem, for his sons. These Emírs, therefore, unanimously agreed to invest with the supreme authority Al Malec Al 'Adel, upon his arrival in Egypt (2).

(Q) The name of this prince has been omitted by the author of the Nighiariján, who has been followed by M. D'Herbelot, in his list of the kings of the Al Moábedún. The latter of these writers, however, in another part of his work, tells us, that Ebn Zehar, or Ebn Zohar, whom he calls Mohammed Ebn Abd'almalec, the Arab physician of Andalusia, lived in the reign of Al Náser, the son of Takúb Al Mansúr, Soltán of the Al Mohades, or Al Moábedún, in Africa and Spain; and that he died, of the plague, in the year of the Hejra 594. But, in this, if Ebn Shohnab is to be credited, he has been guilty of a double mistake. For, according to that author, Ebn Zohar departed this life, the following year, about the very time that Al Náser Mohammed, the son of Takúb Al Mansúr, ascended the throne (3).

- a eight years; or twenty-eight years, and six months, if we chuse to follow the author of the Lebtârikh. In the Nighiaristân, he has only eight years assigned him for the space of his reign; the writer of that history placing the commencement of it in 589, after his brother Soltân Shâb's demise, and the end of it in 597. Tacash being one day in company with Kemâlo'ddîn Ismael, a most celebrated doctor and poet, and an intimate friend of Soltân Togrol, whom he had vanquished, could not forbear expressing his astonishment to him, that this Soltân, who had acquired so great a reputation for his bravery, could not sustain the first shock of his arms; Kemâlo'ddîn answered him instantly with a Persian distich, deduced from the Shâb Nameh, the royal book, or royal history, of Ferdûsi, importing, "That Haman was overcome by Pigen, though he surpassed him in strength; as valour itself is feeble, when
- b "abandoned by fortune." The same Kemâlo'ddîn composed a poem in praise of Tacash, in which he was followed and imitated by another poet, not less famous, named Khâcâni. Amongst other elogies bestowed upon him, they affirm, "That he had at the same time the fortune of Feridûn (R), and the virtues of Alexander the Great." He left for his successor Kotbo'ddîn Mohammed, his son, who was made one of the most unfortunate princes of Asia by Jenghiz Khân. For it was under him, that the monarchy of the Khowârazmians was dissolved by that conqueror, in the same manner as that of the Seljûks had been by his father *Tacash Khân*¹.

- THE siege of Damascus being raised, Al Malec Al 'Adel found himself at liberty to march into Egypt; which he accordingly did, and advanced to Al Kabirah. After eight days' siege, that capital surrendered to him; and a treaty of peace was concluded between him and Al Malec Al Mansûr Mohammed, Al Malec Al 'Azîz's son, or rather Al Malec Al Afdal, upon the following terms. 1. All the Egyptian provinces shall be ceded to Al Malec Al 'Adel. 2. Al Malec Al Afdal shall have in lieu thereof Mayyâfâraîn, Hâni, and Jebâl Jawr. After the conclusion of the treaty, Al Malec Al Afdal retired to Sarkhod, and took possession of Hâni and Jebâl Jawr. But as for Mayyâfâraîn, Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb, Al Malec Al 'Adel's son, who commanded there, in conformity to his father's order, refused to deliver it up to him. With regard to Al Malec Al 'Adel himself, he first ruled the Egyptians in Al Malec Al Mansûr Mohammed's name; but afterwards caused (S) himself to be acknowledged the sole and absolute Sâheb, or Soltân, of Egypt. We must not forget to observe, that Al Kâdi Al Fadl, one of Salâh'addîn's greatest favourites, who was with that prince when he expired, departed this life, at Al Kâbirah, on Friday, the 17th of the latter Rabî, the day before Al Malec Al 'Adel made his public entry into that city. Al Kâdi Al Fadl, who took the name of Abd'alrahîm, was about seventy years old, at the time of his decease; and, according to Ebn Al Athîr, as cited by Ebn Shohnah, one of the most learned and virtuous men of the age in which he lived².

THE following year, being the 597th of the Hejra, commencing O^r. 12th, 1200, Rocno- The principal

(R) This Feridûn, or Frayhdûn, called by some writers Afridûn, and Fridûn, was the seventh, or, as some will have it, the sixth, king of Persia of the race of Pishdad. He is supposed to have been cotemporary with Abraham. He defeated in a pitched battle Zobak, who usurped the crown of Persia, took him prisoner, and kept him confined under a good guard in a cave, or grotto, of mount Damarwand. The day he gained this famous battle, which delivered Persia from the tyranny of Zobak, was called by the Persians Mihrijan, and fell in with the autumnal equinox; which, in the Persian kalendar, bears the same name. For a farther account of this prince, our readers may have recourse to the Persian historians, and to what has been extracted from them on this head by M. D'Herbelot (1).

(S) Al Malec Al 'Adel, in order to carry his point with an air of religion, convoked the Mohammedan doctors; and first asked them, Whether the younger ought to govern the elder? To which they answered, No. He then demanded of them, Whether the elder could legally rule in the name of the younger? To which the abandoned villains likewise replied in the negative; assigning as a reason for this decision, that no one could transfer to another a power that in reality he had not. Upon which, without any farther ceremony, he assumed the supreme authority to himself. As he had, therefore, before procured by fraud, or rather violence, Damascus for his son Al Malec Al Moadhem, or Moadhem, Isa, that is, for himself; he now occupied almost all the extensive territories his brother Salâh'addîn had possessed, not above six or seven years after the death of that prince (2).

Malatiya he marched to Arzan Al Râm, or Erzerum, in the Greater Armenia, at present the seat of a Beglerbeg, in order to lay siege to it. At a small distance from the town, he was met by the son of Al Malec Mohammed Ebn Salik, the last of his family, who was Sâheb of the place. Depending upon Rocno'ddin's faith, he came to make overtures of peace; but was seized, and thrown into irons. After which, Rocno'ddin possessed himself of that city. The same year, Al Malec Al Dbâber and Al Malec Al Afdal, joining their forces, formed the siege of Damascus, then subject to their uncle Al Malec Al 'Adel. That city, according to Ebn Shobnah, when reduced, was intended to be put into the hands of Al Malec Al Afdal; and, upon the cession of it to him, Al Malec Al Dbâber was to be fixed upon the throne of Egypt. In the mean time, Al Malec Al 'Adel incamped with his forces at Nâblos, or Nâbolos, not daring to approach Damascus. But an accommodation being brought about between these contending princes, by virtue of which the two brothers had several cities assigned them; Al Malec Al Dbâber returned to Aleppo, and Al Malec Al Afdal to Someisât. The places ceded on this occasion to Al Malec Al Dbâber were Manbij, Afâmiyâ, Casar Tâb, and Al Maarra, or Al Moarra; and those to Al Malec Al Afdal Someisât, Sarij, Râs 'Ain, Jamlin, and the castle of Nojm. Al Malec Al 'Adel, who remained in Damascus, therefore, now enjoyed the sovereignty of the kingdoms of Egypt, Damascus, and Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, without any fear, or danger, of a competitor. In the first year of his reign over Egypt, the people there were so afflicted with a famine, that they fed upon carrion; and even carried off the children exposed at the doors of the mosques, in order to kill and eat them. A dreadful pestilence then likewise raged in that country, which swept away an infinite number of men. Before the close of the year 597, died the poet Al Anwari, and Al Emâd Al Câteb Mohammed Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Sâmed Al Esfabâni, an illustrious author, and native of Esfabân, mentioned oftener than once in the life of Salâb'addin Yusef Ebn Ayûb. The village of Bedenab, or Badanab, in the plains of Dasht Kbaweran, near the city of Aliwerd in Khorasân, where Anwari was born, produced likewise three other very great men. The first was Abu Ali Shadan Al Kbawerani, Wazîr and minister of state to Togrol Bek, the first Seljukian Soltân of Irân. The second was the famous doctor Abu Sa'id Mehenab, or Mabanab, who frequently disputed with Al Ghazâlî, in the presence of Malec Shâb, the third of the Seljukian monarchs; and the third Sûfi, the chief of the Sûfis, or religious, who bore the name of Abu Sa'id, and was by way of eulogy surnamed Soltân Al Tharicat i. e. the king, or master of the spiritual life. Anwari, on account of the excellency of his poetry, was denominated, by way of eminence, Soltân Al Khorasân, or the king of Khorasân. When Soltân Sanjar undertook a journey to Radekan, he met with Anwari; who making some verses, in honour of that prince, which pleased him, he gave the poet his option, either to receive a reward in money for them, or to be admitted into his service. Anwari chose the latter, and ever afterwards remained near the Soltân's person to the day of his death. But for a farther account of this celebrated poet, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to what has already been said of him, and to some of the writers cited here. With regard to Al Emâd Al Câteb, it may not be improper to observe, that he composed many fine works in the Arabic tongue; the principal of which were the Jeridât Al Cassar, or the palm and most precious jewel of the age, and the Bark Al Shâmi, or the lustre of Syria. The latter of these is the history of Salâb'addin in seven volumes, in which he enlarges much upon the praises of that Soltân. He is said by Ebn Shobnah to have been a person adorned with singular virtues, which attracted universal esteem. The former of the pieces above-mentioned is considered as a supplement to the Yetimat Al Deber of Al Thâ'lebi, who departed this life either in 429, or 430, and is to be met with in the French king's library, N^o 1:67¹.

THE next year, being the 598th of the Hejra, which began Oct. 1st, 1201, was rendered remarkable by two or three events, which are not to be passed over in silence here. Al Malec Al Dbâber either left Damascus, or reached Aleppo, according to Ebn Shobnah, the 1st of Al Moharram; though it seems to be intimated by Abu'l Faraj, that he departed from Damascus the preceding year. Ebn Shobnah likewise remarks, that a dissention broke out between the two brothers Al Malec Al Dbâber and Al Malec Al Afdal, when Damascus was upon the point of surrendering to them; the former desiring the latter to take Egypt, and cede to him Damascus, when reduced, to which he would by no means agree. This ending in a sort of rupture, they concluded a peace with Al Malec Al 'Adel, upon the terms above-mentioned, and immediately raised the siege of that capital. If the last mentioned author may be depended upon, Al Malec Al Afdal's troops took the route of Hems, and were soon after followed by that general himself. This year, if Ebn Shobnah merits our regard, died Sokmân Ebn Mohammed Ebn Karâ Arslân Ebn Dawd Ebn Sokmân Ebn Artok, the Sâheb of Hishn Caifâ

- a and Amed, of the hurt he received by a fall from the top of an house; as did also Abu'l Faraj Abd'alrahmân Ebn Ali Al Jawzi Al Hanbali, a celebrated Moslem preacher, born in the year of the Hejra 510. He has been represented by Soltân 'Amâdo'ddin, says that historian, as a person of great erudition, who was engaged in many controversies with other learned men. The throne of Hisn Caifâ remained for some time vacant, after Sokmân Ebn Mohammed's death; but was filled at last by his son. About this time, Gayâtho'ddin Abu'l Fateh Ebn Sam Ebn Al Hosein, the third Soltân of the house of Gaur, paid the common debt to nature, after he had separate the province of Gaur from Hindostân; or, according to some, form one part of that vast region. He also retook from the Seljuks the cities of Badghis and Herât, in 571; the latter of which was then the capital of Khorasân. In 573, he forced the city of Fâshanj in the same province; and, four years after, marched with his troops to the gates of Shadbagh, near Nisâbûr, reduced that place, and took Ali Shâh, the son of Tacash Khân, the Shâh of Khow-ârazm, and many other princes, who had shut themselves up therein, prisoners. The following year, he carried by assault the city of Merû; and, in fine, having finished the conquest of all Khorasân, by the reduction of that important place, he returned to Gazna, covered with laurels, and full of glory. At the time of his demise, he was about sixty-three years of age. The country of Syria was also visited, the present year, by a dreadful famine and an earthquake; the terrible effects of which were severely felt, in several places there^m.
- c THE 599th year of the Hejra, beginning Sept. 20th, 1202, was distinguished by the commencement of the empire of the Moguls, founded by Tamûjin, Temujin, or Jenghiz Khân; which happened in it, according to Abu'l Faraj. Tamûjin, the son of Tesukâi Babâder, if we chuse to follow Khondemir, or Bisukâi, according to Mohammed Ebn Emîr Khouandshâh, descended in a right line from Tumenab Khân, king of the Moguls, first asserted his independency this year. He had from his childhood been engaged in the service of Ung, Wang, Onk, Awank, or Awonak, Khân, styled by the Arab writers King John, and by the European travellers Prester John, of whom we have spoken above. But having distinguished himself on several occasions against that prince's enemies, and thereby excited the envy of his principal courtiers, some of them calumniated him to his sovereign; who thereupon, at their instigation, resolved to throw him into irons. Of which being apprized by two boys, servants or slaves of Ung Khân, he left his tents standing empty, and posted a body of his troops in ambuscade towards the middle of the night, at a small distance from them; which, with Tamûjin himself at their head, rushing out upon a party of the Khân's men, the next morning entered the abandoned tents without opposition, cut many of them to pieces, and put the rest to flight. This action happened near a well, or fountain, denominated Balciva, or Beljiân, by Abu'l Faraj. Several battles were afterwards fought between them, which proved fatal to Onk, or Awank, Khân; he, with all his most valiant commanders, being at last killed, and his whole family carried by Tamûjin into captivity. The two slaves, to whom he owed his preservation, he honoured in a most particular manner. He enacted a law in their favour, the benefits of which were to extend to their latest posterity. By this law they, as well as all their descendants, were declared to enjoy all the plunder they should acquire in war, without being obliged to give any part of it to the Khân, allowed to appear before him without asking leave, and rendered incapable of being punished with death even for capital crimes. The chief of those who had adhered to him he made general officers, and principal lords of his court. As a particular Aymak, or tribe, of the Moguls, named Avirathæans (T), had exerted themselves more than any others of that nation in his favour, he permitted their leading men to contract a perpetual alliance by intermarriages with his own family; which, if we will credit that author, continued to the days of Abu'l Faraj. In the mean time, a certain Mogul Khân, or Emîr, who had spent several days in traversing deserts and mountains barefoot and naked, in the middle of winter, returned to Tamûjin's camp; protesting that God had said to him, "I have given the whole earth to Tamûjin and his posterity, and have named him Jenghiz Khân." In consequence of which declaration of Tubt Tancri, for so was this Khân called, Tamûjin assumed the name of Jenghiz Khân, and vast crouds of people came in to him. Being now arrived at a superior degree of power, he dispatched messengers to all the Turkish tribes; requiring their submission, and an

ters in marriage. This we learn from Paulus Venetus. Vincentius Bellouacensis denominates the aforesaid tribe Vidirath. They were probably the Virats, of whom we shall speak more largely hereafter (1).

immediate recognition of his authority. Those who paid a proper regard to this requisition he a treated as friends, and the others in a different manner. The four sons that he had by Al Khâtûn Awîsînajîn, the most noble of his (U) wives, he appointed to preside, under him, over the affairs of his empire; assigning each of them a particular department, for this purpose. Tûshi, the eldest of them, had the management and direction of every thing relative to hunting, which the Moguls hold in the highest esteem, committed to his care. When the empire of the Moguls was in its meridian, and completely formed, he governed the immense tract extending from Kambâlîg, perhaps the Khân Bâlîk of the Tartars, to the farthest limits of Saksîn and Bolgâr, or Bulgaria. On Jagatâi, the second of these sons, Jenghîz Khân conferred the province of superintending the due execution of the laws, and all judicial matters. He ruled the Belâd Al Igûr, near Mâligh, and all the adjacent country as far as Bokbâra and b Samarkand. Awcatâi, or Ogatâi, the third of them, he placed at the head of the administration, as his excellent judgment and consummate prudence qualified him for so sublime a post. He also made this prince, who had the region bounded by Aymîl, or Yamil, and Kûtâk, allotted him, his executor, some time before his death. Tûli, the youngest of them, he constituted generalissimo of his forces, and bestowed upon him territories near those of his brother Awcatâi. His own brother Awtakîn this great conqueror settled in Katay, which contained the northern provinces of China, and a great part of Tartary, to the north and north-west of it. He had, however, more children than those mentioned here; as his sons and daughters were pretty numerous, according to Abu'l Faraj. Some authors write, that all the c family of Onk, or Awank, Khân, whose name was Dawd, or David (W), were put to the sword, except one daughter; who, if they may be depended upon, was married to Jenghîz Khân. That prince, who professed the Christian religion, was styled by the Syrians Yohannan Malca; being dignified by them with a title equivalent to the Al Malec Yohannâ, or King John, of the Arabs. The dissolution of his monarchy and his death have been ascribed by Abu'l Faraj to a desertion of Christ his lord (X), to a taking a Katayan, or Karakatayan, lady to wife, and to an introduction of idolatry into his kingdom. Marcus Paulus Venetus refers the violent death of Dawd, or Onk Khân, to the year of Christ 1187, nearly coincident with the year of the Hejra 583; but it has been placed in the 599th year of the Moslem æra by Vincentius Bellovacensis, Nangius, and Marinus Sanutus, as well as by Abu'l Faraj ⁿ.

THE same year, in the month of Al Moharram, Al Malec Al 'Adel sent an army against d Mâredîn, under the command of his son Al Malec Al Ashraf Mûsa, in order to lay siege to that city. And so sure did he think himself of carrying his point, that he constituted deputies to preside over all the districts appertaining to it. But Al Malec Al Ashraf having for a considerable time carried on the siege, without any prospect of success; a peace was at last concluded between Al Malec Al 'Adel and the Sâheb of the place, under the mediation of Al Malec Al Dhâber, the Sâheb of Aleppo. The principal terms of which were, that the prince of Mâredîn should remit to Al Malec Al 'Adel 150,000 dinârs of Emîrin gold, weighing ten

(U) This lady, in some MSS. of Abu'l Faraj, is called Ozîsûlujîn. She is said to have been the daughter of Wang, or Awank, Khân. She seems to have been made the greatest, most noble, or at least the best beloved, of all the wives of Jenghîz Khân by Abu'l Faraj; who asserts her to have been the mother of those four sons that were distinguished, in a most particular manner, from all the rest of his children by Jenghîz Khân. He also relates, that amongst the Moguls the rank of the mother determined that of the sons, when the father had more wives than one. As this lady's sons were, therefore, preferred so greatly to all his other children by Jenghîz Khân; from hence it seems evidently to follow, that he looked upon her as the first and most considerable of his wives. Nevertheless, according to the Chinese historians, Hyu-chen, daughter of Te-in, lord of the Honkirat, or Kongorat, tribe, was the chief of this conqueror's wives; and the mother of Ogatâi and Tuli, two of his favourite sons. Which of these jarring accounts is the most to be depended upon, we leave to our learned readers, who have been the most conversant with the oriental historians, to decide (1).

(W) This prince, according to Pet. de la Croix, was at first called Togrol, or Togrul; but this appellation, says that author, he afterwards quitted, because it was the name of a bird deemed ominous by the Moguls (2).

(X) That this prince's life, though he professed the Christian faith, did not in all points correspond with the doctrine laid down by Christ, may be inferred from his having several wives. For that this was really the case, we are assured by Abu'l Faraj (3).

- a kîrâts apiece (Y); that the money of Mâredîn should be coined in Al Malec Al 'Adel's name; and that all the forces of that city should be at his devotion as often as required. About this time, Al Moezz Shamsalmolûc Ismael Ebn Saif Al Islâm Tagtakîn Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Al Yaman pretended to deduce his origin from the house of Ommiyah; and, in consequence of this pretension, wore a vest of a green colour, with a sort of sleeve or train twelve spans long, called by several of the eastern writers the sleeve of the Khalîfs, and caused himself to be prayed for in all the mosques under the title of Khalîf. This giving great disgust to his subjects, who considered it as an affront offered to their religion; some of them entered into a conspiracy against him, and soon after assassinated him. Ismael being removed, the Emîrs of Al Yaman elected his younger brother, then a child, to succeed him. But he, being under the
- b tutelage of his mother, was in a short time poisoned, by their order and direction; upon which, an interregnum ensued. In the mean time, his mother retired to Zabîd, with the vast treasures she had amassed; expecting, that some prince of the family of Ayûb would make his addresses to her. Whereupon Solimân, the son of Al Malec Al Modhaffer Omar Ebn Shâhin-shâh Ebn Ayûb, who strolled about with the Derwîshes, or Fakîrs, and carried on his shoulders the alms that were given him, being conducted by one of her slaves to her; she thought fit to marry him, and by that step to make him king of the Belâd Al Yaman. This country he filled with tyranny and injustice, repudiated his wife Omm Al Nâser, and rendered himself so obnoxious to the people he governed, that they found themselves obliged to depose him. Whereupon Solimân, according to Ebn Shobnah, wrote a letter to his great uncle Al Malec Al 'Adel for succours against his revolted subjects. But, in his letter, which he began with these words, "From Solimân, IN THE NAME OF THE MOST MERCIFUL GOD," he placed his own name before the Bismi'llah (A); by which he clearly betrayed his want of understanding, and insanity of mind. Al Malec Al 'Adel, therefore, paid no manner of regard either to his letter or his person. We must not forget to remark, that Al Malec Al 'Adel Mohammed Ebn Al Mansûr Ebn Al Azîz Othman, with his mother and sister, departed from Egypt, and came to Al Malec Al Dhâber at Aleppo, if Ebn Shobnah in this point merits any regard, before the close of the present year ⁿ.

- In the 600th year of the Hejra, which commenced Sept. 16, 1203, the Franks, or The most memorable events of the year 603, Latins, took Constantinople from the Greeks, after they had continued the siege of that city from the month of Shaabân to that of the former Jomâda, according to Abu'l Faraj. We are farther informed by this author, that 30,000 Franks were enabled by the vast extent of that capital, to live there concealed; who, when their brethren made a general assault, set the town on fire, by which about a quarter of it was consumed. The Greeks, adds he, being, by this accident, employed within the walls, in extinguishing the flames, the Franks without any great difficulty entered the place, and slaughtered the miserable inhabitants for three days together; putting even the bishops, monks, and priests, who came in procession from the church of St. Sophia to implore mercy, with crosses and the Gospels in their hands, to the sword. After which, continues he, they plundered that church, and proceeded to the election of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who was placed on the Greek imperial throne, and to the division of the territories of the Greeks amongst the princes of the crusade; of which a full and ample account has already, in a place to which it more properly belongs, been given. In the month of Dhu'l-kaada, died Soltân Rocno'ddîn, or Rucno'ddîn, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Rûm, and was succeeded by Kilij, or Kelij Arslân, then a minor, his son. This year, as well as the preceding, proved favourable to the arms of Jenghîz Khân. In it likewise happened a dreadful earthquake, which by its terrible concussions shook a considerable part of Mesr and Sham, or Egypt and Syria, the island of Cyprus, Irak, and the Belâd Al Rûm, and almost intirely destroyed the city of Tyre. As the 599th year of the Moslem æra corresponded with the latter part of the 1202d and the former part of the 1203d years of CHRIST, Sig. Assemani asserts the death and defeat of Awank Khân to have been placed in the year of our LORD 1203, by

(Y) The kîrât is half of a danck, or grain; six of which make up the dirhem, or Arabic drachm. Twelve kîrâts, therefore, must be equal to a dirhem. From the Arabic kîrât the term carat, used by us to denote the weight of four grains, was perhaps originally taken. The Emîrîn gold was probably the purest and finest gold, called by way of eminence the gold of the Emîrs; or such as that of which the dinârs consisted, with the Khalîf's, or Emîr Al Mumînîn's, name impressed upon them (1).

(A) This solemn form, in the Arabic original Bismi'llah Arrâhman Arrahîm, from the first word of it denominated the Bismi'llah, is constantly placed by the Mohammedans at the beginning of all their books and writings in general, as a peculiar mark, or distinguishing characteristic, of their religion; so that amongst them, it is deemed a sign of either folly or impiety to omit it (2).

THE following year, being the 601st of the Hejra, beginning Aug. 29th, 1204, Kaykhusru, Rocno'ddin's brother, then residing in a castle not far from Constantinople, receiving advice of his nephew Kilij Arslan Ebn Soliman's accession to the crown of the Belad Al Rum; he returned home, assembled a body of troops, subdued all the provinces that had been subject to Soltan Rocno'ddin Soliman, occupied his capital, and in fine drove his son Kilij Arslan from the throne. All which happened in the month of Rajeb, according to Abu'l Faraj. The same year the Corj, or Georgians, made an incursion into Adherbijan, advanced first to Akblat and Arjish, and penetrated afterwards as far as Malazkard, without opposition. Having thoroughly pillaged the province, they returned home, with a large number of prisoners, and an immense quantity of spoil. About this time, and not the former year, if Ebn Shohnab may be credited, Constantinople fell into the hands of the Franks, who sixty years afterwards were expelled from thence by the Greeks; with whom the western writers, as has been already observed, extremely well agree. It seems likewise to appear from this author, that the Franks now possessed themselves of the city of Fowwab, not far from Alexandria, and plundered it for five days together. About the same time, John, the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, ordained Kilus, the bishop of Fua, metropolitan of Ethiopia, at the requisition of the Najashi; who sent ambassadors to the patriarch at Al Kabirah, to beg that favour in their master's name of him. Soon after Kilus's arrival in Ethiopia, when he had first officiated as metropolitan there, the Abissins were in part delivered from a great drought they had been visited with, by a copious shower that fell, and vastly refreshed them. This they attributed to the metropolitan's prayers, who was treated with uncommon marks of distinction on that account. The Najashi, or king of Ethiopia, frequently visited him at his own house; and, together with the noblesse, supplied him with a proper number of men and maid servants to take care of his domestic affairs, camels, and all kinds of household furniture which he then stood in need of. We must not forget to remark, that Tamijin, or Jenghiz Khan, is said to have subdued the tribes of Kashin and Merkit, or Markat, in the year that we are now upon ?

THE next year, being the 602d of the Hejra, commencing Aug. 18th, 1205, Gayatho'd-din Khaykhusru continued to strengthen himself in the Belad Al Rum, and arrived at a higher degree of power there. This year was slain Shahabo'ddin Abu'l Modkaffer Ebn Sam Ebn Al Hosein, the fourth Soltan of the dynasty of Gaur, and brother of his predecessor Gayatho'ddin Abu'l Fatah Ebn Sam Ebn Al Hosein, after he had reigned about four years. In 571, whilst his brother sat upon the throne, he conquered the kingdoms of Multan, or Moltan, and Debeli, called by the Europeans Delli, or Debli, at this day, in Hindustan, and settled Kotbo'd-din Ibek, who had been one of his slaves, in the latter of those kingdoms. He was, however, afterwards overthrown by Mohammed Khowarazm Shah, and obliged to retreat into the country of Zablestan; where he staid some time, in order to recover the losses he had sustained. Having extinguished a rebellion, by the punishment of the ring-leaders, and the massacre of a vast number of the most guilty of the rebels, in the province of Jild; he set out for the royal city of Gazna, well-pleased with the success of his expedition. But, upon his arrival at Debeli, he was assassinated by an Indian idolater, who had devoted himself to the perpetration of this horrid fact. When this tragical event happened, Shahabo'ddin was, according to Khondemir, sixty-two years old. A general diet, at which all the Mogul and Tartar lords were summoned to attend, was held, by the order of Jenghiz Khan, with a view to introduce several regulations both into the army and the state, on the first day of spring, when the sun entered Aries, either this or the former year ?

THE 603d year of the Hejra, which began Aug. 8th, 1206, did not expire without producing two or three remarkable events. Sanjar, who had been brought up one of the Khalif Al Naser Ledini'llah's slaves, but was afterwards manumitted by him, having gone through the principal offices of the state, by his own merit, and his master's favour, at last obtained the government of Khuzistan; in which post he subdued all the people of the most southern part of Persia, extending to the coast of the Persian gulph and the Indian ocean. The troops at Akblat in Armenia, this year, seized upon Mohammed Ebn Boftemar, the Sahib of that city, deposed him, and substituted Balaban, one of Shah Armen's slaves, in his room. a year was also rendered memorable by the intire defeat of Pologu, or Boyrak, brother of Tayyân, Kbân of the Naymans; which, if the Chinese historians followed by F. Gaubil may be depended upon, happened in some part of it.

In the 604th year of the Hejra, which commenced July 28th, 1207, the Khalif Al Nâser suppressed in every part of his dominions all the imposts, which had been usually raised on merchandises, or commodities, sold by retail. Nor would he permit any other duties to be paid than those of the custom-house, levied on goods sold by wholesale only. This year, Al Malec Al Awhad, or Awhed, Nojmo'ddin Ayûb, Al Malec Al 'Adel's son, occupied the city of Akblât; and was proclaimed king, or Sâheb, there. From thence he marched to Malâzkerd, in order to receive the homage of the inhabitants of that place; but they sallied out of the town upon him, at his approach, obliged him to retire, and openly rebelled against him. They also convoked a general assembly in the name of Shâb Armen, though he had been long dead; intimating by this, that they were extremely desirous of being under the power and jurisdiction of one who had formerly born some relation to him. However, Al Malec Al Awhad soon returned with a superior force, and put many of the principal citizens to death. He also deprived the noblesse of Akblât of the authority they had lately exercised; they having disposed of the sovereignty of their city, for a short time past, in an arbitrary manner, cutting some of their princes off, and elevating others in their room, just as absolute will and pleasure dictated to them. The same year Sheikh Shabâbo'ddin Al Shabarûdi, brought a crown and the Kaftân of Soltân from the Khalif Al Nâser at Baghdâd to Al Malec Al 'Adel at Damascus, if the Oxford MS. copies of Ebn Shohnab may be depended upon. The Kaftân, according to these MSS. he himself put on; and the crown was placed successively on the heads of Al Malec Al Ashraf and Al Malec Al Moaddhem, his sons. It appears from some authors of good repute, that Jenghîz Khân completed the conquest of Mogulestân, of which our readers may expect a distinct and particular relation, in a proper place, the present year.

The following year, being the 605th of the Hejra, beginning July 16th, 1208, the metropolitan Kilus, to the great regret of the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, returned to Egypt from Ethiopia, and deserted the church there committed to his care. Hereupon the patriarch dispatched a priest named Moses, to Adafa (B), the residence of the Najâshi, in order to inquire into Kilus's conduct, and discover, if possible, the true motive of his departure. This was done with the approbation of the Sâheb, or Soltân, of Egypt. The same year Al Malec Al Ashraf Mîsa, Al Malec Al 'Adel's son, went from Damascus, to the eastern provinces; and, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab, took Aleppo in his way, where he met with a most gracious reception from Al Malec Al Dbâher, the Sâheb of that place. The latter of these princes, if that copy may be credited, caused the canal of Hailân to be now continued to Aleppo, at a vast expence. The king of Hya, whose territories were situated near the great wall separating China from Tartary, towards the close of this year, became a tributary to Jenghîz Khân.

The next year, being the 606th of the Hejra, commencing July 6th, 1209, Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb made himself master of Al Khâbûr and Nasîbîn, with their respective dependencies, and laid siege to Senjâr; which the garrison defended with so much bravery, that he found himself obliged to retire. Whilst Al Malec Al 'Adel was employed in this expedition, the Franks landed a body of troops at Dimiyât, Dimyât, or Damiata, and penetrated as far as Al Jizab, within sight of Al Kâbirah, the capital of Egypt; laying all the country through which they moved waste with fire and sword. As Al Câmél, Al Malec Al 'Adel's son, had not forces enough to oppose them, he kept himself shut up within the walls of Al Kâbirah; whereupon they formed the siege of Dimiyât, but were not able to reduce the town. They, therefore, went on board their ships, and returned to Palestine. Amongst other ravages that they committed, they plundered the monastery of the Melchites, in the neighbourhood of Al Kâbirah, before they retired. Either this or the following year, Moses returned from Ethiopia, accompanied by some ambassadors, sent by the Najâshi to the Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria, to beg he would immediately ordain a new metropolitan, in the room of Kilus, as he and his subjects had been long without rain; which they imputed to the non-residence of a metropolitan, and therefore most earnestly requested that one might be sent them without delay. With regard to Kilus, Moses informed the patriarch, that, having whipt to death a priest of some distinction, who had ten others under him, on suspicion of his having stolen a gold rod, belonging to the rich utensils of the metropolitanical church, he was pursued with so much violence by the friends of the deceased, that he was constrained to abandon Ethiopia, in the most precipitate manner. The Abissine ambassadors brought with them several valuable presents both for the patriarch and the Soltán. Amongst those designed for the patriarch, there was a crown of gold of exceeding great value. The person placed at the head of the administration, who was Al Câmel, his father Al Malec Al 'Adel being now engaged in the Mesopotamian expedition, besides several things of moment, received, as curiosities, from them an elephant, a lion, a beast resembling a panther, and a camel, or a Girafa, and a wild Ethiopian ass. Al Câmel could not forbear wondering at the value and elegant workmanship of the crown, sent by the Abissine monarch to the patriarch; which being perceived by one of the ambassadors, he said, "His master would have covered that crown with jewels, equal in value to the annual public revenues of Egypt, had he not been persuaded that the patriarch's extreme modesty would force him to decline wearing it." Kilus being deprived both of his metropolitanical and episcopal functions, one Isaac a monk was ordained metropolitan of Ethiopia; and met with a most gracious reception, on his arrival at Adafa, the residence of the Najásbi, who loaded him with honours. In order to give Al Malec Al Câmel a proper idea of the power of the Ethiopian monarch, the aforesaid minister assured him, that this prince reviewed, the day of his departure, an army commanded by one of his generals, consisting of 60,000 horse, besides a vast number of other soldiers not held in such esteem. The same year, died Al Malec Al Mowayyad Nojmo'ddîn Mas'ûd, one of Salâb'addîn's sons, and Al Imâm Fakro'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Omar Ebn Khattib Al Ray Al Tamîmi Al Becri, surnamed Al Râzi, if Ebn Shobnah may be depended upon. The latter of these was a native of Al Ray, though he was originally descended from a family in Tabrestân; for which reason, he is sometimes called Al Tabrestâni by the Arab writers. He was born, according to Ebn Al Athîr, in the year of the Hejra 543, and became a most celebrated doctor of the sect of Al Shâfeî. For he was not only well versed in the Moslem jurisprudence and theology, but likewise acquainted with most branches of learning in vogue amongst the Greeks. He preached also very eloquently both in Arabic and Persian. These shining qualities acquired him the favour of several princes, and particularly that of Gayâtho'ddîn, Soltân of the dynasty of Gaur; who founded a college purposely for him, at the city of Herât, in Khorasân. Here he one day engaged in a formal dispute with the Kadi Abd'almajîd, of the sect of the Kerâmians, or followers of Mohammed Ebn Kerâm, called also Mojasssemians, or Corporealists, by a certain oriental author. The Kâdi Abd'almajîd Al Kadûb being confounded in the dispute by the Imâm Fakro'ddîn, and supported by Dhiâbo'ddîn, the Soltân's cousin, took occasion from thence to calumniate that Imâm on the subject of religion. He made him pass to the Soltân for a philosopher, that is, in the language of the Kerâmians, who, by adhering to the strict letter of the Korân, not only admitted a resemblance between God and created beings, but declared God to be corporeal, a most impious person. However, the Soltân for some time continued to him his protection. But Al Kâdi Abd'almajîd Al Kadûb, who was his open and declared enemy, preached against him, representing him as a Magician and an infidel; and pressed his audience to defend the religion of Islâm, and the prophetic traditions, against the philosophy of Aristotle, Ebn Sînâ, and Al Farâbi, in so pathetic a manner, that he made all the people present burst out into tears. This excited such commotions amongst the inhabitants of Herât, especially as the Kâdi condemned the tenets laid down by Fakro'ddîn, whom he contemptuously styled the Sheikh, the day before, that Gayâtho'ddîn found himself obliged, in order to restore the public repose, to send this learned man out of the city. However, the Soltân afterwards recalled him, and distinguished him by his favours as much as he had done before. He is said by Ebn Shobnah, who has preserved a few of his verses, to have composed several poems held in good esteem. For a list of the principal of his works, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to M. D'Herbelot. The above mentioned blasphemous and monstrous notions of the Kerâmians were the consequence of the literal acceptance of those passages in the Korân which figuratively attribute corporeal actions to God, and of the words of Mohammed, when he said, that God created man in his own image, and that himself had felt the fingers of God, which he laid on his back, to be cold. Besides which, this sect are charged with fathering on their prophet a great number of spurious and forged traditions, borrowed chiefly from the Jews, to support their opinion. Before the close of the present year, died also Abu'l Saadât Al Mobarec Majdo'ddîn Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alcarîm Al Shaibani, known by the name of Ebn Al Athîr, a native of Jazîra Ebn Omar, from whence he is sometimes surnamed Al Jazîri by the Moslem writers. He wrote a book, intituled, Jamé Al Ofsûl; in which he has collected the sentiments of all the most celebrated doctors of Islamism, together with their qualities, ages, and the fundamental principles of their law. He likewise composed a piece bearing the title of Kitâb Al Shâfeî, wherein he attempts

- a to establish the foundations of the doctrine of Al Shâfeï; and a commentary upon the Korân, extracted almost intirely from those of Al Thaalebi and Al Zamakhsari. He was brother to the famous Abu'l Hasan Ali 'Azzo'ddin Al Jaziri, the author of Al Câmel, or general history, of whom we shall hereafter have occasion to speak. He is said to have been born in the year 544. Ebn Shohnab represents him as a most eminent Fakih, logician, and grammarian, well acquainted with the fundamentals of Islâm, and the traditions of Mohammed. Al Majd Al Motarezzi, the best Arab grammarian of his age, and the author of many excellent compositions, likewise departed this life, in the year of the Moslem æra 606. About the same time, the Khân of the Igûrs, Oygûrs, or Vigûrs, a very powerful Turkish tribe, put himself under the protection of Jenghîz Khân, and that conqueror reduced to his obedience the provinces
- b of Karakitay, or Karakatay, according to Abu'l Faraj."

THE 607th year of the Hejra, which began June 25th, 1210, was rendered remarkable ^{and of the year} by two or three events, that have been mentioned by the eastern historians. Towards the close of Rajeb, died Nûro'ddin Arslân Shâh, of the house of Aksankar, the Sâheb of Al Maw-sel, after he had reigned there about eighteen years. He was a brave and magnanimous prince, governed his subjects well, and restored the pristine discipline, power, and dignity of the Atâbek family; which had, for some time past, gone greatly to decay. When he perceived his end to approach, he appointed his son Al Malec Al Kâher 'Azzo'ddin Mas'ûd to succeed him; charging him to apply himself to business with the utmost diligence, to be indefatigable in distributing justice to his subjects, and to chuse Bedro'ddin Lûlû for his Wazîr, as c he knew him to be a man of consummate prudence, a happy judgment, and thoroughly versed in the art of government. To his younger son 'Amâdo'ddin Zenki he left the castle of Al Akr Al Hamîdiya, and that of Shûsh; ordering him, before his death, to retire to the former of those places. This year, the Corj made an irruption into the principality of Akhlât, and besieged Al Malec Al Awhad Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel in that city. But their king being drunk, and approaching too near a party of the Moslem troops with only twenty horse; his horse threw him, and he was taken prisoner. However, he obtained his liberty, by releasing 5000 Moslem captives, paying 100,000 dinârs, and granting Al Malec Al Awhad a truce, or suspension of arms, for three years. Soon after this event, he gave his daughter in marriage to Al Malec Al Awhad; who repudiated her, and died, before the expiration of the present

d year. He was succeeded by his brother Al Malec Al Asbraf Mûsa, before possessed of some of the eastern provinces; who, by this accession of territory, became a very powerful prince. About the same time, Gayâtho'ddin Kaykhusrû, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Rum, after whom reigned his son Azzo'ddin Kaykûwas, was slain. We must not forget to remark, that Jenghîz Khân with a formidable army invaded the Kin, before the end of the year that we are now upon *.

IN the 608th year of the Hejra, which commenced June 15th, 1211, Al Câmel treated ^{What happen-} the Christians with great equity and moderation in Egypt; not listening to the calumny of a ^{ed, in the East,} renegado monk, when he accused his brethren of having buried a large sum of money at ^{the following} the bottom of a well. As little regard did he pay to another monk, when he asserted the ^{year.} Jacobite patriarch of Alexandria to have amassed prodigious treasures; which he proposed to send by sea out of Egypt, as some of his predecessors had formerly done. Nay this prince permitted a Christian, who had embraced Islamism, to return to the faith he had left; though Al Malec Al 'Adel obliged him to renounce it again, threatening him otherwise with immediate death. Before the close of the present year, died Al Kâdi Al Rayis Al Mashûr Behabî'al-labi Ebn Jaafar Shâh Al Malec, the author of many good poems; a specimen of whose verses Ebn Shohnab, in the place referred to, has handed down to us. This year, Jenghîz Khân overthrew an army of the Kin, incamped near mount Yebû, under the orders of Hûjakû and Wan-yen, consisting of 300,000 men *.

THE following year, being the 609th of the Hejra, beginning June 3d, 1212, three mer- ^{The occasion of} chants of Great Bukhâria carrying a large quantity of cloth imbroidered with gold, rich silks, ^{the war be-} tiffany, and other valuable commodities, such as they apprehended might be wanted by the ^{between the} Khân, into the territories of the Moguls; one of them, named Abmed, demanded three Bâl-lîshs, or 225 dinârs, for every piece of imbroidered cloth, which did not cost him above ten, or ^{Shâh of Kho-} at most twenty, dinârs. This not a little incensed Jenghîz Khân; who thereupon could not ^{wârazm and} forbear saying, "This fool seems to imagine, that we never saw any fine cloaths before he ^{Jenghîz} arrived amongst us." He then ordered the clerk of his wardrobe to shew him some sumptuous robes, sent him as presents by the kings of the Katayans; and commanded Abmed to be thrown into prison, for setting so extravagant a price upon his goods. After a which, sending for the two other merchants; he asked them how they sold their wares? They replied, they came not thither to sell them, but to present them to his majesty, as a mark of their profound veneration for, and close attachment to, him. But, notwithstanding this, he insisted upon their fixing some valuation on the costly merchandize they had brought with them; which they, however, refused to do. This pleasing Jenghîz Khân, he ordered a Bâlîsh (A), or purse, of gold to be paid them for every piece of embroidered cloth, and one of silver for every two pieces of cotton. His wives, sons, and the principal lords of his court, having then, at his command, made a collection of Bâlîshs, both of silver and gold; he dispatched several of the officers of his household, attended by 150 Mogul merchants, with those of Great Bukhâria, when they returned home, in order to buy every thing fine and valuable, b that was proper for them, to be met with there. Of these Mogul merchants some were Christians, others Pagans, and others Mohammedans; and that they might meet with a more favourable reception from the governors of Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh, they were accompanied by a Mogul ambassador from Jenghîz Khân to that prince. This minister carried presents, and letters of credence, to Soltân Mohammed, with orders to acquaint him, that his master desired nothing more than to enter into a new alliance with him; that he had dismissed the merchants of Khowârazm, who came to trade in his dominions, with their purses full of money, and well pleased with the security they had enjoyed; and that he therefore flattered himself his subjects, who came to purchase some of the most elegant and valuable of the manufactures of his kingdoms, would find with him all manner of protection, and be permitted to return safe c to Mogulestan; especially, as their principal design in undertaking so long a journey was, to perpetuate that union and friendship which then so happily subsisted between them. The Mogul merchants and ambassador were, however, no sooner arrived at Otrâr, than Gâyer Khân, who thirsted after the riches they had brought with them, dispatched an express to Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh, to inform him of their arrival, and to procure his permission to murder them; which having obtained, he assassinated all of them, except one, who escaped out of prison, made the best of his way to Mogulestân, and acquainted the Grand Khân with what had happened. In the mean time, Gâyer Khân confiscated all the money and effects belonging to the massacred Moguls to Soltân Mohammed's use. The relation of that prince's barbarous conduct so affected Jenghîz Khân, that he could not sleep till he had formed a proper plan of d action against the Shâh of Khowârazm. Nay, according to Abu'l Faraj, whom we follow here, he fasted and prayed to Almighty God three days and nights together, without intermission, on the top of a hill, with his head uncovered; imploring the divine assistance, in the most fervent and suppliant manner, against so faithless and perfidious a prince. The third night, continues this writer, a monk clothed in black, with a staff in his hand, standing at the gate of his palace, appeared to him in a dream; bidding him fear nothing, for that he should be successful in all his undertakings. Being struck with this dream, and not a little animated by it, he returned to his palace, and communicated it to his wife, who was the daughter of Awank Khân. This princess, having attentively heard him, assured him, that the monk he had seen in his sleep, and described to her, was a bishop, who sometimes used to visit her father, and give him his benediction. Whereupon Jenghîz Khân inquired of the Christian Igûrs, at his court, if they had not a bishop amongst them? They answered, the bishop of Mar Denha was there. That prelate then, by his command, approaching him with a black mitre on his head, he said, that his habit was indeed the same with that of the monk who appeared to him, but his face different. Whereupon the bishop replied, that the person seen by his majesty was undoubtedly one of the Christian saints. From this time, adds our author, that conqueror was always well disposed to the Christians, entertained a good opinion of them, and treated them with particular marks of affection and esteem. 'Tis worthy observation, that M. Pet. de la Croix, in his history of Jenghîz Khân, explodes this dream as a fiction, similar of that of Alexander the Great, desirous of chastising the Tyrians, for putting his em- f bassador to death, when he persuaded his troops, that Hercules had appeared to him, and introduced him by the hand into the city of Tyre; the Arab historian, according to our French compiler, meriting no regard in this particular, because he assigns the Khân of the Moguls an effeminate character, and represents him as shedding tears. This is the more remarkable, as such a representation does not occur in any part of the relation, to which he refers, handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj. Nor is it less surprizing, that this gentleman, in order to make his notion pass the more glibly amongst his unlearned and less intelligent readers, has not scrupled to foist in the following spurious passage, as penned by Abu'l Faraj; though not a word of it is to be found in that author: "And that he failed not to publish this vision to

 “ this prince had a communication with God.” Besides, the instances produced on this occasion by M. Pet. de la Croix and Abu'l Faraj are by no means parallel. Alexander's soldiers paid at least a sort of divine honours to Hercules; whereas, from the account he himself has given us, it seems clearly enough to appear, that the Moguls in general were far enough from being prejudiced in favour of the Christian religion, when this event is said to have happened.
 Instead, therefore, of a supposed fiction, transmitted down to us by Abu'l Faraj, the French- man has been pleased to present us with a real one of his own. The above-mentioned interpolation, without other proofs of M. de la Croix's fidelity, that might, with equal facility, be produced, will probably enable our curious and learned readers to determine what degree
 b of credit at least some part of his performance now before us may deserve.

 brother Mohammed Khowārazm Shāh, and afterwards taken refuge at Mahmūd's court; that prince, under the pretext of the strict alliance subsisting between him and Soltān Mohammed, delivered him up into his brother's hands. This infidelity so irritated the Khawārazmians and Irākians in the interest of Ali Shāh, that they hired the aforesaid assassins to murder him. His corpse was first interred in the castle of Firūz-Ghūc, where he presided, and afterwards transported to the great mosque at Herāt; which his father had begun, and he had finished. He c succeeded his uncle Shahābo'ddīn in the sovereignty of Gaur, Gazna, Zablestān, Hindostān, and a large part of Khorasān, in 602. He left behind him a son, named Sam; who soon entered into a war with Atsir, or rather Atsiz, the son of Jehānsūz, his relation, who disputed the crown with him. But neither of these princes possessed what they contended for. Moham- which terminated in the person of Mahmūd Ebn Gayātho'ddīn, was swallowed up by that of the Khawārazmians. It continued, according to Khondemir and Mirkhond, about sixty-four

year 612,

IN the 612th year of the Hejra, which commenced May 2d, 1215, Soltân Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh made himself master of the city of Gazna; being possessed before of the greatest part of Khorasân, and the kingdom of Bâmiân. This, as we are told by Abu'l Faraj, happened in the month of Shaabân. The same year, Al Malec Al Câmél, the son of Al Malec Al 'Adel, sent his son Al Malec Al Mas'ûd Yusef upon an expedition against Al Yaman; who subdued that fine country, took Solimân Ebn Shâhinsâh, the Sâheb of it, prisoner, and ordered him to be conducted under an escorte to Mesr. Upon his arrival there, he met with a favourable reception from Al Malec Al Câmél, who supplied him with all kinds of provisions in a very copious manner. This year died Al Wajiah, the son of Ebn Al Mobârek Ebn Abu'l Azbar Sâid Al Dahân Nabûi Al Dbarîr; who first professed the tenets of Abmed Ebn Hanbal, afterwards those of Abu Hanîfa, and lastly those of Mohammed Ebn Edrîs Al Shâfêi. Ebn Shohnab has preserved a specimen of a poem, written by Abu'l Baracât Zeid Al Tecriti, in praise of him, held in considerable esteem. About this time, Yen-king, called Khân-bâlik, or the city of the Khân, by the oriental writers, the capital of the emperor of the Kin, was occupied, according to the Chinese historians, by the forces of Jenghîz Khân ^d.

THE following year, being the 613th of the Hejra, beginning April 20th, 1216, Al Soltân Al Mâlec Al Dhâber Gâzi, the son of Al Soltân Salâh'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, and the Sâheb of Aleppo, departed this life, the 20th of the latter Yomâda, if Ebn Shohnab may be depended upon. He was born, according to that author, at Al Kâbirab, in the middle of Ramadân, and the year of the Hejra 568; and was consequently almost forty-five lunar years old, at the time of his death. He reigned at Aleppo, if we compute from the time that his father first constituted him governor there, thirty-one years; and was succeeded by his son Al Malec Al 'Azîz Mohammed, whose mother was Al Malec Al 'Adel's daughter, then only in the third year of his age. The care of this young prince Al Malec Al Dhâber committed to the eunuch Shabâbo'd-dîn, one of his slaves; who accordingly, after the Sâheb's demise, was declared Atâbek, or tutor, to Al Malec Al 'Azîz, and gave him an education suitable to his high rank. Al Malec Al Dhâber, in his last illness, settled the succession, if Ebn Shohnab may be credited, in the following manner. He obliged the people of Aleppo to acknowledge his youngest son Al Malec Al 'Azîz Mohammed for his next and immediate heir; to recognize the authority of his eldest son Al Malec Al Sâleh Salâh'addîn Abmed, in case he survived his brother; and finally to own for their sovereign his nephew Al Mansûr Mohammed Ebn Al 'Azîz Othmân, if Al Malec Al 'Azîz and Al Malec Al Sâleh died before him. Kaykâwas, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Rûm, was no sooner apprized of Al Malec Al Dhâber Gâzi's decease, than he proposed a treaty of alliance to Al Malec Al Afdal, the Sâheb of Someisât; which, with its territory, was then the only place under the jurisdiction of that prince. In consequence of this treaty, the two Sâhebs, uniting their forces, penetrated into the Belâd Al Sharkîa, or eastern country; which they took from Al Malec Al Asbraf Mûsa, Al Malec Al 'Adel's son. From thence they marched to Aleppo, which ^e

(C) The word Simiâ amongst the Arabs denotes properly one part of chemistry, when the latter of these terms is taken in its most extensive signification. For, according to the most received idea of chymistry amongst them, that art confines itself to the extraction of the juices and essences of plants; though, by extension, it is sometimes supposed to comprehend the preparation of metals and minerals, the proper object of Simiâ, as the Arabs primarily define that art. However, when they, and the other orientals, talk of chymistry, or chemistry, in general, and the wonderful effects it produces; they always join the words Kimîâ and Simiâ, in order to comprehend all the operations performed by fire, upon metals and minerals, as well as plants and animals. The Arabs also apply the word Simiâ frequently enough to another art, which has for its object names and numbers; from whence they draw a species of divination, in the same manner as they do one likewise from points and lines, by the assistance of geomancy. This knowledge, or rather science, of names goes a good deal further, as it includes the names of spirits, and their invocation; and, in the book intitled, Kitâb Al Anwâr, the book of lights, we find twenty-eight alphabets of Simiâ, of which the Arabs form *Talisman*s, in order to draw down superior spirits and their virtues, or powers, and make divers superstitious uses. This they define, The art of knowing superior spirits, and bringing down their virtues, or powers, to us, that we may learn of them what we desire. It is divided into three parts, Tarji, Thalsam, and Salhamûs. We must not forget to remark, that the term Kimîâ does not only signify amongst the Arabs chemistry, taken in the proper acceptation of the word, but likewise a magical and superstitious science, denominated by them, the knowledge of inferior, or terrestrial, spirits, to draw what is the most subtle and acute from them, in order to serve some particular purpose. The origin of the word Simiâ, according to its former signification, is deduced from the Arabic, Sam, and Samat, denoting the veins of gold and silver in mines; and, according to the latter, from Sim, and Isim, a name. The Arabs attribute the invention of Simiâ, to Ammonius, and that of Kimîâ to Kirûn, or Carûn, that is, Chiron the Centaur, the preceptor and governor of Achilles; whom they assert to have been the Korah of Moses, according to M. D'Herbelot (1).

a by one of the articles of the last convention was to be put into Al Malec Al Afdal's hands, and laid siege to it; but were repulsed in all their attacks, and at last forced to draw off, after having sustained a very considerable loss. As for the Belád Al Sharkia, Kaykâwas occupied the whole tract; and Al Malec Al Afdal returned to Someisât, where his affairs were in a declining condition, having been duped by the Sâheb of the Belád Al Rûm. This year, according to the Chinese historians, the city of Ton-quan was forced, and other advantages obtained over the emperor of the Kin, by the Moguls ^c.

THE next year, being the 614th of the Hejra, commencing April 9th, 1217, Mohammad, <sup>The most memorable even-of the year 614,</sup> the Soltân of Khowârazm, commonly called Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh, after the reduction of Gazna, having found amongst the treasures and in the archives of Shabâbo'ddin, Soltân of the dynasty of the Gaurids, the original patent of the investiture sent by the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledini'llab to that prince, and read it, was so incensed against the Moslem pontiff, that he formed a design to depose him. The Khalîf, in this instrument, had not only given Shabâbo'ddin the most magnificent elogies and titles, but likewise exhorted him to make war with the utmost vigour upon the Khowârazmians, who were declared enemies of the Khalîfat. In order, therefore, to be revenged on the Khalîf, he convoked a general assembly of all the Imâms, and principal doctors of Islamism, in his dominions; who unanimously declared, that the Khalîfat of full right belonged to the descendants of Hosein, the second son of Ali, the last Khalîf of the family of Mohammed; that the house of Al Abbâs had, for a long time, usurped the supreme authority, both in temporals and spirituals, at Baghdâd; and that the members of that house had rendered themselves unworthy of the high dignity they had enjoyed, not only by their usurpation, but likewise by the many other violations of the Mohammedan law they had been guilty of, and the frequent wars they had unjustly excited amongst the faithful. They, therefore, formally deposed Al Nâser, and elected Alâo'ddin, surnamed Al Malec Al Termedi, in his room. Mohammed, having caused this great schism in Islamism, and withdrawn the religious obedience he owed to Al Nâser, moved with an army of 300,000 men, towards Baghdâd, in order to make himself master of that capital, and consequently of the Khalîf's person there. Al Nâser, having received advice of the Soltân's march, dispatched Al Sheikh Shabâbo'ddin Shabarzûri, as his ambassador to him, in order to appease him, and prevail upon him to desist from the enterprize he had undertaken. But he was very ill received by the Soltân; who refused him an audience, and continued his march towards the frontiers of Irâk. The Khalîf hereupon endeavoured to put the city of Baghdâd, his residence, in as good posture of defence as the shortness of the time would permit; imagining that he should soon be obliged to sustain a siege, as he was not able to make head against the Soltân's numerous army, that now began to draw near. In the mean time, happily enough for the Khalîf, so deep a snow fell in the narrow passages and defiles of the mountains of Hamadân, as in the beginning of the autumn had never before been known in the memory of man. Those defiles being by this means shut up, the Khowârazmian army could neither advance nor retreat, insomuch that the greatest part of it perished miserably in that route; and the Soltân himself, after having been in the most imminent danger, was obliged to make the best of his way home, and leave almost all his equipages in the middle of the snow. This misfortune, however, did not induce him to lay aside this design. On the contrary, he was determined to carry it into execution, at a more favourable season. But he was constrained to drop all thoughts of undertaking another expedition to Baghdâd, though his late disaster had irritated him more than ever against the Khalîf, by the dreadful irruption of the Moguls, under the conduct of Jenghîz Khân, that soon after happened, into the territories of Khowârazm; of which a full and ample account will be given in a subsequent part of this work, to which it will more properly belong ^f.

THE 615th year of the Hejra, which began Mar. 30th, 1218, was far from being altogether destitute of memorable events. Al Malec Al Kâber 'Azzo'ddin Mas'ûd Ebn Arslân Shâh, <sup>and of the year 615.</sup> of the house of Zinki, or Aksankar, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel, departed this life, on Monday, the 27th of the former Râbi, after he had reigned nine years, and nine months; being succeeded by his eldest son Nûro'ddin Arslân Shâh, then about ten years of age. As this young prince was incapable of holding the reins of government, Al Malec Al Kâber constituted Bedro'ddin Lûlû his guardian; and ordered that minister to act at the head of the administration, during the minority of his son. Soon after Nûro'ddin's accession to the crown, his uncle 'Amâdo'ddin Zenki Ebn Arslân Shâh, the Sâheb of Al 'Aker, entertained hopes of placing himself upon the throne of Al Mawfel; but he was frustrated of them by the prudent conduct of Lûlû, which wonderfully conciliated the affections of the people he governed, both to him and his pupil. Some time after, the patent of investiture arrived from the Khalîf at Baghdâd; by which Nûro'ddin was confirmed in the prefecture of Al Mawfel, and Lûlû in the post of prime minister there. The same messenger likewise brought with him magnificent Kaftâns, or vests, both for the young Sâheb and his Wazîr. Notwithstanding which, Modbaffero'ddîn a Cûcabri, or Cûcheri, Ebn Zîno'ddîn, the Sâheb of Arbel, delivered up the castle of Al Ammâdiya, and the others of the Al Haccâriya, or Haccârite Curds, as well as that of Al Zawzân, into the hands of ' Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Arslân Shâh; whose interest, in opposition to that of the young Sâheb of Al Mawfel, he had espoused. Nor could he be prevailed upon by Bedro'ddîn either to take the oath of allegiance to Nîro'ddîn Arslân Shâh, or to stand neuter in the quarrel between that prince and the Sâheb of Al 'Akr. Being determined, therefore, to assist the latter with all the force he was master of; Bedro'ddîn found himself obliged to apply for succours to Al Malec Al Asbraf Mûsa, the son of Al Malec Al 'Adel, now the Sâheb of Diyâr Al Jaz'ra and Akblât. Upon which, Al Malec Al Asbraf wrote to Modbaffero'ddîn; threatening to march with an army against him, if he did not return to his duty. But this made b so little impression upon Modbaffero'ddîn, that he did not so much as answer that letter. However, an accommodation between the Sâhebs of Al Mawfel and Arbel was at last effected, before they came to an open rupture, by the mediation of the Khalîf Al Nâser and Al Malec Al Asbraf. Not long after which event, died Nîro'ddîn Arslân Shâh; who was succeeded at Al Mawfel by his brother Nâsero'ddîn Mahmûd, then only three years old. The army having taken the oath of fidelity to the infant prince, Bedro'ddîn caused him to be presented to their view on horseback; with which, as all the troops retained the highest veneration for Zenki's family, they were extremely well pleased. The same year Al Malec Al 'Adel (D) Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb Sâlah'addîn's brother, according to Al Makrîzi, Ebn Shohnab, the author of the (E) Mawredo'llatîfa, and other Moslem writers, paid the common tribute to nature, when he was c upon the point of going to pillage a particular district, the 7th of the latter Jomâda; being, at the time of his decease, seventy three years of age, according to Abu'l Faraj. But, if Ebn Shohnab in this point merits any regard, he was born in the year of the Hejra 540; and must consequently have been about seventy-five lunar years old, when he expired. From what has been already related of him, as well as from Ebn Shohnab, it appears, that he reigned twenty-three years at Damascus, and nineteen in Egypt. The last-mentioned author gives him the character of a wise, mild, and indefatigable prince. The following list of his sons, that survived him, has been handed down to us by Abu'l Faraj, Al Malec Al Câmêl, the Sâheb of Egypt; Al Malec Al Moadbâhem, or Moadbâham, the Sâheb of Damascus; Al Malec Al Asbraf Mûsa, the Sâheb of Harrân, Al Robâ, and Akblât; Al Malec Al Modbaffer Shabâbo'ddîn d Gâzi, the Sâheb of Mayyâfârakîn; Al Malec Al Hâfedh, the Sâheb of the castle of Ja'bar; Al Malec Al 'Azîz, the Sâheb of Bânîâs; and Al Malec Al Sâleh Ismael, the Sâheb of Basra; as also Al Malec Al Fâyez Takûb, Al Malec Al Amjed, or Amjad Abbâs, Al Malec Al Afdal, and Al Malec Al Kâber. We are told by Ebn Shohnab, that Al Malec Al 'Adel left behind him sixteen sons, besides several daughters; and that no prince had ever more reason to be delighted with his children, however happy in this respect he might be, than had Al Malec Al 'Adel. None of his sons attended him, during his last illness; but Al Malec Al Moadbâhem came from Nabolos, soon after his death, which for some time he kept concealed, interred him at Damascus, seized upon all the jewels, horses, arms, &c. he found in the palace there, and constrained the people of that capital to take the oath e of allegiance to him. He then communicated to his brothers, of whom Al Malec Al Awhad Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb occupied Akblât, according to M. D'Herbelot, though this city and its dependencies have been assigned Al Malec Al Asbraf by Abu'l Faraj, the news of their father's demise. The money Al Malec Al 'Adel had deposited in his treasury, which remained for his successor's use, amounted to 100,000 dinârs. Ebn Shohnab mentions a poem, written in praise of that powerful monarch; but has neither preserved the name of its author, nor favoured us with the true character of that performance. This year, likewise, died Al Imâm Afdal Addîn Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Al 'Amûdi, a follower of Abu Hanîfa. He was a great and excellent person, and composed a book intituled, Al Arshâd fi Al Khalâf. ' Amâdo'ddîn Zenki Ebn Arslân Shâh, the Sâheb of Al Akr, and Modbaffe- f

(D) That this prince caused his face, or effigies, to be imprinted at least on some of his coins, appears from a brass Arabic one, now in the possession of the Rev. John Savinton, A. M. of Christ-church, Oxon. F. R. S. which is adorned with the legend Al Malec Al 'Adel Saifuddîn Abur Becr Ebn Ayûb. This coin is of the size of the middle Roman brass, and has been tolerably well preserved (1).

We must beg leave to inform our readers here, that the words AL EMIR ABU'L MAHASSEN YUSEF EBN TANGRI WIRDI, which ought to have been inserted in the references, or citations, immediately after AL MAKRIZI, have been omitted from P. 1, to P. 20, Vol. II. through inadvertency rather than mistake (2).

- a ro'ddin Ebn Zinnu'ddin, the Sâheb of Arbel, having received advice of the recognition of Nâse-ro'ddin Mahmûd's authority at Al Mawfel; they entered into an alliance against him, excited thereto by his tender age, assembled all their forces, and made the necessary dispositions for attacking that city. Of which Bedro'ddin Lûlû having been apprized, he solicited succours of Azzo'ddin Aybec, the commander of Al Malec Al Asbrâf's troops at Nasîbîn, who thereupon began his march for Al Mawfel, at the head of a considerable corps, the 4th of Rajeb; and having passed the Tigris, posted himself on the eastern bank of that river, at the distance of about a parasang from Al Mawfel. The Sâhebs of Al 'Akr, and Arbel also, with their forces, crossed the Zâb, and took post on a spot of ground about two or three parasangs from the army under the orders of Lûlû and Aybec. The two armies had not been long in this position, before
- b an engagement ensued. Azzo'ddin Aybec with his right wing fell upon the enemy's left, commanded by Zenki, the Sâheb of Al 'Akr, broke it, and put it to flight; whilst Modbaffero'ddin's right wing treated Bedro'ddin's left in the same manner. This being observed by Modbaffero'ddin, he charged with his main body that of Al Mawfel, under the conduct of Bedro'ddin himself, with so much bravery, that he routed and dispersed it; obliging Bedro'ddin to fly first to Al Mawfel, and afterwards to a castle on the other side of the Tigris. Hither Modbaffero'ddin having pursued him, he posted himself behind the hill of Nineveh; where he remained three days, and retired from thence undiscovered, by favour of the night. The late action was, however, by no means decisive. For though Amâdo'ddin Zenki Ebn Arslân Shâh made himself master of the castle of Al Cawâshi, yet Bedro'ddin reduced to his obedience Tel A'far, and Al Malec Al Asbrâf
- c Senjâr. Nay, it seems to appear from Abu'l Faraj, that all the contending parties being soon tired with this war, a treaty of peace was concluded between them, by the intervention of the Khalîf Al Nâser, the following year. About this time, as some of the eastern writers relate, the Khalîf Al Nâser, dreading the resentment of Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh, sent an envoy to Jenghîz Khan, in order to excite that conqueror to invade the Shâh of Khovârazm on one side, whilst he attacked him on the other. Nevertheless it does not certainly appear, that Al Nâser, however his conduct on this occasion may have been censured by the Moslem historians, ever gave any assistance of moment to the Grand Khân of the Moguls. But it would be superfluous to expatiate upon this affair here, as our readers may expect to meet with a particular and circumstantial account of it, when we come to the reign of Jenghîz Khân, to which it more properly
- d belongs.

- In the 616th year of the Hejra, which commenced Mar. 19th, 1219, Soltân 'Azzo'ddin The chief currencies of the year 616; Kaykâwas Ebn Kaykhusrû Ebn Kiliç Arslân, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Rûm, departed this life. As none of his sons had arrived at puberty, the army elected his brother 'Alao'ddin Kaykobâd Ebn Kaykhusrû, who had been confined in the castle of Al Menshâr near the Euphrates, at a small distance from Malatiya, to succeed him. Being, therefore, brought out of the prison wherein for some time he had been incarcerated, he was inaugurated in form, and his subjects took the oath of allegiance to him. This prince has been represented as an excellent ruler, though strict and rigid in his deportment, as a person of uncommon gravity, magnanimity, and resolution, by Abu'l Faraj. The same year, if Ebn Shohnab merits any regard, died also Al Malec Al Mansûr Mohammed Ebn Al Malec Al Modbaffer Takîo'ddin Omar Ebn Shâhînschâh Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Hamah, in his castle there. He was a valiant and learned prince, supported at his own expence 200 grammarians and Fakîhs, and wrote a considerable number of books. One of these is intituled, Al Midhmâr, that is, the space of forty days, or, as other manuscripts have it, Al Dhamâr, or what is uncertain in chronology; and another bears the title of the classes of the poets. He had a taste for poetry, and is said to have been the author of several poems of some note. Al Mâlec Al Sâleb Mahmûd Ebn Karâ Arslân Ebn Samkîn Ebn Artak, or Artok, the Sâheb of Amed, paid likewise the common tribute to nature, in 616. He was succeeded by Al Malec Al Mas'ûd, his son; who reigned at Amed, till he was dispossessed of his territories by Al Malec Al Câmel, the Sâheb of Egypt. This year,
- f Kitâda, or Katâdab, Ebn Edrîs Al 'alawi Al Hasani, the Emîr of Mecca, sent an army, under the command of his brother and his son Al Hasan Ebn Katâdab, to reduce Medina. But this expedition did not meet with the desired success. For Al Hasan found means to assassinate his uncle, whilst they were upon their march; after which, he returned to Mecca, and hanged his father Katâdab. Not content with the perpetration of two such horrid facts, he decoyed his brother, then absent from that city, to Mecca, and barbarously put him to death. Katâdab lived about ninety years, and left behind him the character of a good poet. One of his poems was an answer to a reprehension he met with for his refusal to wait upon the Emîr of the Hadji's of Irâk. The Franks made themselves masters of Dimiyât, or Damiata in Egypt, in the month of Shaabân; to which place they laid siege, in the former Rabî, the preceding year. The citizens of Al Kâbirab were struck with such terror on this occasion, that they once proposed, after they had received advice of the devastation of the maritime towns, to have aban-

done that capital. Nay, Al Malec Al 'Adel himself, who, in his wars with the Christians, a through the whole course of his life, had met with almost an uninterrupted success, was so affected by this invasion of the Franks, that he fell into a distemper, through grief, which carried him off in about three months time. Before the surrender of Dimiyât, a body of about 10,000 Moslems, an undisciplined rabble, that plundered all the Christian churches they came to in their march, advanced to the camp of the Franks, and attacked it with incredible fury; but they were entirely defeated in this battle, and most of them put to the sword. This excited the Egyptian Moslems to treat the Christians settled amongst them, and particularly the Melchites, whom they utterly abhorred, in the most cruel manner; either forcing even the priests into the service, that they might be constrained to act with the Moslem troops against the Franks, or extorting large sums of money from them. Nay, the fine church of St. Mark in the sub- b urbs of Alexandria, denominated Kamsba, was, by Al Câmel's order, soon after the above-mentioned defeat, laid level with the ground; lest, as it was an exceeding high edifice, the Franks should use it as a tower, and from thence make a formal attack upon that city. In fine, all, both Christians and Jews, who could not buy themselves off with money, were compelled to take on in the service, and the tribute now exacted of them was much higher than it had formerly been. At this time, Al Malec Ad Moadbdehem Isa, the Sâheb of Damascus, being alarmed at the progress of the Franks, commanded the walls of Jerusalem to be demolished, that they might not take post there. Nor was Al Malec Al Câmel less solicitous at this juncture for the security of his subjects. He rebuilt and fortified the city of Al Mansûrah, c seated upon the Nile, on a spot where that river divided itself into two principal branches, in order to cover all the neighbouring country from the invasion of the Franks. One of the aforesaid branches took its course towards Dimiyât, and the other towards Ashmûn, Soltân Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh having been overthrown with prodigious loss, the last year, by the Moguls; Jenghîz Khân arrived (F), about the middle of this, with his numerous forces, in the plains of Bokhâra, and incamped before that city, after he had reduced Zarnuk and Nâr. Nay, Ebn Shohnab relates, that the Tartars, or Moguls, penetrated as far as Nisâbûr, in Khorasân, and cut to pieces Al Sbeikh Nodhâmô'ddin Ahmed Ebn Mahmûd Al Hadhîri, a person of considerable learning and worth, there, in the year that we are now upon ^e.

THE following year, being the 617th of the Hejra, beginning Mar. 8th, 1220, the per- d secution of the Christians and the Jews still continued in Egypt; large sums of money being extorted from them, and the tribute levied on them, in order to carry on the war against the Franks, being extremely high. As corn was likewise exceeding dear, they found themselves so grievously oppressed, that a considerable number of them undertook for sustenance the most servile offices, many out of desperation destroyed themselves, and not a few of them turned Mohammedans. The merchants were not only deprived of the corn and provisions they had laid up for their own use, but had likewise their houses thoroughly plundered by the soldiery. Nor could a stop be put to these licentious proceedings, before a peace was concluded between the Moslems and the Franks; which happened, the following year. Towards the beginning of Al Moharram, Jenghîz Khân, with his army of Moguls, besieged in form the city of Bokhâra, then defended by a garrison of 20,000 men, reduced it, and e afterwards laid it in ashes. A little before the reduction of Bokhâra, which gave much satisfaction to Jenghîz Khân, that prince's sons Jogatâi and Awcatâi, or Ogatâi, had made themselves masters of Otrâr, with a body of Tartar or Mogul troops. In the former Rabî, Jenghîz Khân invested Samarkand, into which Soltân Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh had thrown a body of 110,000 horse, according to Abu'l Faraj. Having obliged that city to surrender to him, he gave it up to his soldiers to be plundered, notwithstanding its brave defence, to make them some amends for the great fatigues they had sustained. His troops also took Saganâk, Uškend, Urkend, or Uzkant, Al Shâsh, Jund, Tonkât, Kbojand, and Zâveh. As for Nisâbûr, it thought fit to submit, at the approach of some of the Mogul generals. The Grand Khân likewise sent a detachment of 30,000 men to pursue Soltân Mohammed, who, according f to the advices he had received, was fled by way of the Amû to the country of Termed; and

(F) Al Soltân 'Amado'ddin relates, that the Moslems never sustained so great losses, nor were deprived of so many cities, as at this time; when they were harrassed on one side by the Tartars, and on the other by the Franks. Ebn Shohnab represents them as struck with the utmost terror and consternation, principally on account of the dreadful massacres and devastations of Jenghîz Khân, whom he styles the Sâheb of Sîn, or Chîna; intimating, that he wrested this delightful region, by force of arms, out of the hands of Altûn Khân. He farther observes, that this conqueror entered Al 'Ajem, or Persia, that is, the Persian Irâk, put all that opposed him to the sword, and at last made himself master of Marwarâ'nabr (1).

a pushed on his conquests further in that prince's territories, with surprizing rapidity, this glorious campaignⁱ.

THE next year, being the 618th of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 25th, 1221, Jenghîz Khân, ^{What happened of note in 618.} having passed the Jihûn with his numerous forces, advanced to the city of Balkh. The principal inhabitants were no sooner informed of his approach, than they hastened to meet him, with many valuable presents, and all kinds of refreshments for his troops; notwithstanding which, he cruelly massacred them all, on account of their attachment to Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn, the son of Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh. From Balkh he marched to Talakân in Tokhârestân, possessed himself of that fortress, slew most of the garrison and the people he found therein, and carried many of them away with him into captivity. He then moved to Al Bâmîyân, formed the siege of that place, b and at last took it by storm. As his favourite grandson, one of Jogatâi's sons, was killed with an arrow, during the operations of the siege, which was extremely sharp; he put all the people he found in the town, without distinction of age or sex, to the sword. Nay, he did not spare so much as the cattle and beasts of burden, belonging to the place, nor even the very infants, whom he had caused to be cut out of their mothers wombs. After which, he entirely destroyed the city, and laid waste the whole territory appertaining to it. Some authors relate, that the Moguls reduced and ruined Corcânj, the capital of Khowârazm, after they had butchered either 100,000 or 200,000 persons there before the close of the present campaign; though the reduction of that metropolis, and the district belonging to it, has been placed in the preceding year by Abu'l Faraj. Be that as it will, after Corcânj had been carried by assault, Kât Farabr, c Darkân, or Dargân, Zamakhshâr, and other places of note in Khowârazm, surrendered without making any resistance to the Moguls. Termed, Nesâ, or Nisâ, the citadel of Kaendar, Dâmagân, Ray, Kom, Dinawar, Sîrvân, Holwân, Nahawend, Kazwîn, Merû, Nisâbûr, which had returned to Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn, Tûs, and Herât, were also obliged to submit to the arms of Jenghîz Khân. It is computed, that above two millions of the Moslems lost their lives before the end of this bloody campaign; which was concluded by the battle at the Indus, fought in the month of Rajeb, wherein Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn was overthrown by Jenghîz Khân. But, for the particulars of all the great actions barely mentioned here, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to a subsequent part of this work. This year, Al Malec Al Moadhdbem, Al Malec Al Ashraf, Al Malec Al Nâser, the Sâheb of Hamab, Al Malec Al Mojâbed, the Sâheb of Hems, d together with the Sâhebs of Mâredîn and Haleb, or Aleppo, assembled all their forces, and joined Al Malec Al Câmél, the Sâheb of Mesr, or Egypt, in order to recover Dimiyât, or Damiata, from the Franks. After this junction, those princes led the Moslem troops against the common enemy; whom they at last reduced to such straits, that they found themselves constrained to sign a treaty of peace with them upon the following terms: I. The Franks shall restore Dimiyât, with its dependencies, to the Sâheb of Egypt. II. They shall release all the Moslem captives in their hands. III. The Moslems shall on their part deliver up all the Christian prisoners they have taken. The pope's nuncio, the king of 'Accâ, the masters of the Hospitalers and Templars, and other princes of the Franks, attended at the signing of this treaty; in consequence of which, Al Malec Al Câmél took possession of Dimiyât, on Wednesday the 19th of Rajeb, the present year. The cession of that important place, after the Franks had remained masters of it near two years, is attributed by some writers to the dissensions which prevailed amongst the commanders of the Christian troops; who, by acting with unanimity and vigour, at this juncture, might have conquered the kingdom of Egypt, with inconsiderable loss^k.

THE 619th year of the Hejra, which began February 15th, 1222, proved favourable to the Moguls; who, after they had subdued Great Bukhâria, Khowârazm, Khorasân, and the Persian Irâk, entered the province of Adherbijân, took Ardebîl, Tauris, and Marâgha, and obliged Hamadân, whose governor, Jamâlo'ddîn, or Jemalo'ddîn, had thought fit to revolt, to submit to the Grand Khân. They also reduced Kûi, or Koy, and Salmâs, in the most western part of Adherbijân, as well as Nakhshiwân, or Nakhjimân, Pilkân, and Ganja, in the province of Arrân, f and defeated an army of Georgians that pretended to oppose them. After which, partly under the orders of Jenghîz Khân, and partly under those of his generals, they made themselves masters of Khandabâr, Mîltân, or Moltân, and Gazna. Jogatâi likewise subjugated Kermân, and the Khân of Tangût submitted, and became tributary to Jenghîz Khân. Al Malec Al Mas'ûd Yusef, the Sâheb of Al Yaman, dispossessed Al Hasan Ebn Kitâda, or Katâdab, according to Ebn Shohnab, of the city of Mecca, in 619. Al Sheik Yûnos Ebn Yusef Ebn Si'ad, the Sâbeb of Carâmât, and the reputed author of the Yunosiah, a very great and good man, also departed this life, if that writer may be credited, the same year ¹.

The most remarkable transactions of the year 620,

In the 620th year of the Hejra, which commenced Feb. 4th, 1223, the Mogul generals defeated the Tartars of Daghestân, and, having crossed the Wolga, by favour of the Kalmûks, entered Kipjâk, Kipchâk, or Kipshik. They also subdued Astrakhân, called Haji Tarkan by the Mohammedans, situated in an island of the Wolga, near the Caspian sea. The same year, died Al Mostanser, the king of Garb; who, leaving no son behind him, was succeeded by Abd' alwâhed Ebn Yusef Ebn Ad' almu'men, his father's uncle. Abd' alwâhed being a very corpulent person, and much attached to his pleasures, concerned himself but little with the affairs of government. His subjects, therefore, after he had sat upon the throne nine months, deposed him, and substituted Abd' allah Ebn Yakûb Al Mansûr Ebn Yusef Ebn Abd' almu'men, who assumed the surname of Al Adel, in his room ^m.

THE following year, being the 621st of the Hejra, beginning Jan. 24th, 1224, died Al Malec Al Afdal, the eldest son of Salâb' addin Yusef Ebn Ayûb, a prince of considerable learning and genius; but inconstant, regardless of the welfare of his people, indolent, and not a little deficient in point of judgment. He was dispossessed successively both of the kingdoms of Damascus, including that of Jerusalem, and Egypt; and was obliged to content himself with the city of Someisât, or Samosata, and the district appertaining to it. His father had given him rather a learned than a polite education. He, therefore, made a good progress in the knowledge of the Arabic tongue, and poetry; to the latter of which he applied himself, if an eminent Arab author may be credited, as much as it was proper for a person in his high station. He likewise wrote verses well, a specimen of which has been preserved by Ebn Shohnah; who asserts him to have been endued with several amiable virtues, to have discovered on many occasions marks of an excellent disposition, and to have expired suddenly, if Dr. Hunt's MS. copy may be depended upon, in the year of the Hejra, 622. We are told, that, about this time, the Nogays acknowledged Tûshi Khân for their sovereign, and Jenghîz Khân, his father, for their Grand Khân. The Mogul monarch held a dyet in the plains of Tonkat, with uncommon pomp and magnificence; after which, Tûshi Khân, to whom the grant of that kingdom had been confirmed by Jenghîz Khân, returned to Kipjâk. Sun, the emperor of the Kin, according to the Chinese historians, also departed this life, and was succeeded by his son Shew-su, before the close of 621. The new monarch of the Kin, continue those historians, concluded a peace with the Hya, soon after his accession to the crown. Al Soltân Jalâlo' ddin Ebn Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh having received advice that Jenghîz Khân had repassed the Jibûn with his Moguls, and taken the route of Tartary; he repassed the Indus likewise, with his troops. After which he re-entered 'Ajem, or Persia, by the southern provinces of Kitshe and Macrán. Upon his arrival in the Persian territories, he was welcomed by the principal lords, as well as the governors of Fârs, the Persian Irâk, and Adberbijân, who came to pay again their homage to him. The people also, in every place through which he passed, received him with all possible demonstrations of joy. Ebn Shohnah seems to intimate, if Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of that author merits our attention in this particular, that Gayâtho' ddin Ebn Mohammed Khowârazm Shâh, Jalâlo' ddin's brother, extended the conquests in Hind, or Hindustân, whilst Jalâlo' ddin himself was employed in the reduction of Fârs. He also relates, that Jalâlo' ddin drove from Shîráz, the capital of Fârs, the Atâbek Sa'id, or Saad, Ebn Daclâ, the Sâbeb of that city, and fixed his residence there ⁿ.

The Khalif Al Nâser Ledi-nillah dies.

THE next year, being the 622d of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 13th, 1225, the Khalif Al Nâser Ledi-nillah died at Baghdâd, in the night of the Id Al Fetr, i. e. The Feast of breaking the fast, which begins the first of Shawâl, immediately succeeding the fast of Ramadân. He was about seventy years old, at the time of his death; of which he reigned forty-seven; a term at which none of his predecessors arrived. This Khalif is said to have amassed immense riches, though he expended in buildings exceeding large sums. It has been farther remarked of him, that he was the first prince who appropriated to himself the succession of all the foreign merchants that died in his dominions; which was the only stain that tarnished the lustre of his reign. Notwithstanding which, he has been greatly celebrated by some of the eastern writers, for his grandeur and magnificence. It has not been observed, that he was a very considerable encourager of learned men; though several, who made no small figure, flourished (G), whilst

(G) The principal persons eminent for their erudition, in the Moslem world, whilst the Khalifs Al Nâser Ledi-nillah and Al Dhabir Bi'llah sat upon the throne of Baghdâd, were the following.

1. Abd'

- a whilst he sat upon the Moslem throne. Ebn Shohnab barely mentions Al Nâser Ledini'llab's demise, without descanting upon his character. From what will be related of him hereafter, when we come to the conclusion of the Khalifat of his grandson Al Mostanser Bi'llab, it will appear, that he was a prince of a very covetous and rapacious disposition °.

- THE Khalîf Al Nâser Ledini'llab's decease was no sooner publicly known, than his son Oddato'ddîn Abu Nasr Mohammed was saluted Khalîf. This prince, who assumed the title, or surname, of Al Dhâher Bi'llab, was inaugurated, in form, the 2d of Shawâl, according to Abu'l Faraj. The old Khalîf, in his life-time, had caused him to be acknowledged heir apparent of the crown of Baghdâd, and to be prayed for as such in the mosques, throughout

1. Abd'alsalâm Ebn Jinkidûst Al Jabali Al Baghdâdi, a famous physician, who made so great a progress in ancient literature, that he thereby excited the envy of several malevolent persons; who accused him to the Khalîf of being a Môattalite, or Môazzalite. That prince, therefore, sent a party of his guards to seize both him and his books; which they accordingly did. The books, many of which were written upon philosophical subjects, were burnt publicly, by the Khalîf's order, in a place called Al Rabbâ, at Baghdâd. Whilst this was doing, one Obeid'allah Al Taimi, commonly called Ebn Al Mârestâniya, ascended a sort of pulpit, erected there for that purpose; from whence he harangued the people, declaimed against the philosophers, loaded with invectives both Abd'alsalâm and his works, and then threw his books successively into the hands of those who were appointed to burn them. Amongst other pieces, committed to the flames on this occasion, an astronomical treatise of Ebn Al Haithem, after Ebn Al Mârestâniya had poured out his reproaches most copiously upon it, met with the same fate; who filled with indignation Yusef Al Sebtî, another physician, who observed, that astronomy ought by no means to be branded with infidelity, since it rather paved the way to faith, by displaying the infinite wisdom and power of the Great Creator of the universe. Abd'alsalâm himself was also sent to prison, by Al Nâser's express command; and remained there till the 589th year of the Moslem æra, according to Abu'l Faraj. Ahmed, his grand-son, a celebrated Fakîh, composed two pieces upon the Mohammedan law; the first of which is intitled, Abhajalâin, and the second, which is an explication of the first, has for its title Abia Al Mobhaje. He died, according to some of the eastern writers, in the year of the Hijra 647.

2. Yakya Ebn Sa'id Ebn Mâri, a Christian physician, and the author of sixty discourses, a very elegant composition, who was extremely well versed in all kinds of ancient literature. He also perfectly understood the Arabic language, was a good poet, and practised physic to the day of his death; which happened, according to Abu'l Faraj, who has preserved a specimen of his poetry, in the year 589.

3. Saad Ebn Hebatallah Ebn Al Mowammel Abu'l Hasan Al Hadiri, a Christian, whose brother Abu'l Khair was an arch-deacon, and his other brother Ebn Al Masîhi a catholic, or ecclesiastical officer next in dignity to the patriarch, who was physician in ordinary to the Khalîf Al Nâser Ledini'llab, and one of the greatest favourites of that prince. He acquired a vast reputation in his profession, and was master both of physic and logic. He composed a small piece, intitled, Al Sofava, that is, of health, or the most select part of physic; in which he has collected every thing material relative both to the theory and practice of physic, as it then prevailed, in the most concise manner. To this he added three sections concerning circumcision, an operation then performed by the physicians at Baghdâd. He wrote his physical treatises out with his own hand, and died towards the end of the year 591. His brother the arch-deacon was also an excellent physician, and practised with good success. He explained and abridged the Al Kanûn of Ebn Sinâ, at that time held in the highest esteem, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj.

4. Mohammed Ebn Abd'alsalam Al Kudsi, denominated likewise Al Mâredini, having been born at Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, and lived at Mâredin, of which place his father was the Kâdi, as his grand-father had been at Donaisar, who studied physic under Ebn Al Talmîd; and arrived at such skill in his profession, that he was sent for by kings reigning in different and remote parts of the world. He read much, and instructed others, in his more advanced years. Abu'l Khair and Ebn Al Masîhi entertained a very high opinion of him. He departed this life, as it should seem, at Mâredin, in the year 594.

5. The famous Moses Maimonides, called by the Arab writers Mûsa Ebn Maimûn, or Maimon, was a Spanish Jew, who applied himself to the study of ancient literature in Spain. For this he laid a solid foundation in the mathematics, and attained to a very considerable degree of knowledge in physic; though, being diffident of his own abilities in that art, he abstained from practice. He was compelled to embrace Islamism, but remained still in his heart a Jew. Travelling afterwards, with his family, in Egypt; he settled, amongst the Jews, at Al Fostat. Here he became a jeweller, and made open profession of his former religion. After the abolition of the Khalifat of the Fâtemites, Al Kâdi Al Fâdel Abd'alrahîm Ebn Ali Al Baisâni took him under his protection, and allowed him a salary. Upon which, he ranked himself amongst the physicians of Egypt; though, as he laboured under a want of experience, he would never depend upon his own opinion. He was extremely well versed in the Jewish law, and wrote a very remarkable book upon that subject; which some of the Jews speak well of, but others condemn it. His letter upon the resurrection of the body giving great offence to the Jewish elders, he caused it to be in a manner suppressed; permitting only a few, who were of the same sentiments with himself in this particular, to peruse it. Several of the Jews at Antioch and Tripoli, who repaired thither from the remoter territories of the Franks, says Abu'l Faraj, cursed him, and called him an infidel. He was the author likewise of some fine books in the mathematics, as well as in physic. Towards the end of his life, a Spanish Fakîh, named Abu'l Arab, coming into Egypt, reproached him with having deserted the Mohammedan faith; intending if possible, to bring him into trouble. But his friend and patron Al Kâdi Al Fâdel screened him, at this perillous juncture; saying, "If he professed Islamism by compulsion, his profession of it was not real."

out all the provinces under his jurisdiction; but, finding him bold, valiant, hasty, and of an enterprising genius, he was afterwards afraid of him, and therefore not only forbade the Khoiba to be made in his name, but likewise imprisoned him. This being done, Al Nâser cast his eyes upon his younger son Al Emîr Ali, as the most proper person to succeed him. That prince, however, dying before his father, and Abu Nafr Mohammed being now the only surviving son; Al Nâser declared him again his successor, and bequeathed the Khalifat to him. Upon that monarch's demise, he was therefore taken out of prison, and placed upon the throne.

A little before his death, he commanded his heirs to carry his body, after proper precautions had been taken to hinder it from being offensive, to the lake of Tiberias, and bury it there, because many pious men of his own nation were there interred; which was accordingly done. As he was born at Cordova, or Corduba, in Spain, he sometimes goes under the denomination of Abu Amrân Mûsa Ebn Maimon Al Kortobi Al Yebûdi amongst the Arab writers. He is said to have composed several pieces upon the Jewish law in Arabic, that were afterwards translated into Hebrew by Joseph Ben Tibbon; of which a catalogue has been exhibited by Buxtorf, in his Bibliotheca Hebraica, and other authors. But beside these, he left behind him several others, upon physical and mathematical subjects, which have never been translated from the original Arabic. The most famous of his works is the treatise intitled in Hebrew, Moreh Nevochim, and in Arabic, Al Delâhlah, i. e. The Guide of those that are out of the way, or The Index, The Directory, &c. which is the piece first mentioned here. M. D'Herbelot, enlarging upon the text of Abu'l Faraj, relates, that this book was condemned by the synagogues of the Frank Jews at Antisch and Tripoli; the Rabbins there looking upon it as the height of impiety, that he should pretend to apply the Aristotelian philosophy, in which he was a most profound adept, to the explication of the most essential points of their law. He finished one of his works in the year of the Hejra 595; and expired, according to Abu'l Faraj, in the year 605. For a more particular account of this celebrated doctor, and his works, our learned and curious readers may consult the authors referred to at the end of this note.

6. Al Imâm Al Fakhr Al Râzi Mohammed Ebn Omar, called at Al Ray, for the most part, Ebn Al Khattîb, who was a native of Al Ray; tho' he deduced his origin from Tabrestân, and had for that reason the surname of Al Tabrestânî assigned him by some of the Arab writers. To ancient learning he added a perfect knowledge of the Mohammedan law, was a most eloquent preacher both in Arabic and Persian, and very strenuously opposed the pernicious tenets of Ebn Sinâ. When he rode out on horse-back, he was armed with two drawn swords, and attended by a large multitude of slaves. His great qualities procured him the favour of several of the Shâhs of Khowârazm, as well as other powerful princes, particularly Gayâtho'ddin, Soltân of the dynasty of the Gaurids; who entertained so high an opinion of his merit, that he founded a college in Herât for him. He spent very considerable sums in chymical operations, without reaping any manner of advantage from them. His works, says Abu'l Faraj, are dispersed over the whole world, and studied with great attention by the learned. He undertook a journey into Marwarâ'nahr, in order to have a conference with the Banu Mârah at Bokhâra. But meeting with no success in this affair, he went from thence to Khorasân; where he became acquainted with Mohammed Ebn Tacaf, Khowârazm Shâh, who treated him with uncommon marks of distinction and esteem, and amply supplied him with every thing he stood in need of. At last he fixed his residence at Herât; where he acquired large possessions, married and got several children, and remained till the day of his death. He performed the journey to Bokhâra in 580; and was very hospitably received on the road by Abû'alrahmân Ebn Abd'alcarîm Al Sarkhâsi, a physician of considerable note. As an instance of his gratitude, therefore, he published an exposition of the Al Kânûn of Ebn Sinâ, explaining all the most difficult terms in that book, and inscribed it to him. He also prefixed to this piece, written solely to oblige his benefactor, a preface, wherein he made the most honourable mention of him. Al Imâm Al Râzi, who is named by some writers Al Imâm Fakhrô'ddin Mohammed Ebn Omar Ebn Khattîb Al Râzi Al Tamîni Al Bâri Al Tabrestânî, according to Ebn Al Athîr, was born in the year of the Hijra 543, and became in process of time one of the most eminent doctors of the sect of Al Shâfi'i. The principal of his works were Erfhad Al Nachar Ela Latâif Al Asrâr, An Introduction into the most sublime mysteries, for men of genius, in which the author endeavours to produce philosophical reasons, in order to prove, and explain, the principles of Mohammedism; Mohafel Al Asfâr, a book of metaphysics, and scholastic theology, which has been commented upon by several writers; Ofûl Addin, The Principles of Faith, divided into fifty questions, which equally regard philosophy and divinity; Ekkhtiarât Al Najûmi-yeh, A treatise of astronomical elections; and Arbâin fi Ofûl Addin, besides another piece, intitled, Mabsûl, which is likewise attributed to him. He died at Herât, according to both Ebn Shohnah and Abu'l Faraj, in the month of Dhu'lhajja, 606. As he was looked upon in some points as heterodox, his body was buried in his own house, lest it should be insulted by the populace, who entertained the most unfavourable sentiments of him. A MS. copy of the Mohafel Al Asfâr is in the French king's library, Numb. 932; and another of the Ofûl Addin in the same library, Num. 620. The first question of this piece is drawn up against the eternity of the world; from whence it appears, that Al Imâm Al Râzi was not so much an Aristotelian as his enemies, in order to discredit him, represented him to be.

7. Masîhi Ebn Abu'l Bakâ Al Nîli, an inhabitant of Baghdâd, surnamed Abu'l Khair, and commonly called Ebn Al 'Attâr, who was an excellent physician, very much in the good graces of Al Nâser Ledinî'llah, the Khalif of Baghdâd; whose ladies he used frequently to visit, according to Abu'l Faraj. He amassed great wealth, and left a son behind him, denominated Abu Ali by that historian; who likewise practised physic, but was not a person of much learning or note. This Abu Ali's intrigues with Setti Sharaf and Eshîâk, two Mohammedan courtezans, the latter of which was wife to Ebn Al Bobhâri, first lord of the treasury, being discovered; the women, by the Khalif's order, were immediately incarcerated in the prison appointed for common bawds, and he obliged to make up matters by paying down instantly 6000 dinârs. Ebn Al 'Attâr was by religion a Christian, and departed this life, in a very advanced age, in the year of the Hejra 608.

8. Ali Ebn Ahmed Abu'l Hasan, a physician of Baghdâd, generally going under the denomination of Ebn Habal, who was extremely well acquainted both with the principles of the art he professed and all kinds of polite literature. He was born and educated at Baghdâd; but travelled from thence first to Al Marwef, and afterwards into Adherbijân. At last he settled at Akhlût, and was made physician in ordinary to Shâh Armen. Here he instructed several young men, who pursued their studies under his direction; but being disgusted by a frivolous accident, of which we meet with an account in Abu'l Faraj, he returned to Al Marwef. Here he remained till the day of his death, after he had been blind, and incapable of stirring out of his house, about two years. He nevertheless continued to teach, and direct the studies of, young people to the last. He composed a most celebrated work in physic, intitled, Al Mokhtâr, a throne. At his inauguration he is reported to have said, "It is something absurd, that a person should open a shop in the evening. I am now above fifty years old, and shall I at this age be created Khalif?" It must be here observed, that, notwithstanding his father's displeasure, the people of Baghdād were always extremely well affected to him^p.

THE same year, if Ebn Shohnab, or rather Dr. Hunt's MS. of that author, may be depended upon, Al Soltān Jalālo'ddīn possessed himself of the Persian Irāk, and restored Shīrāz to Saad Ebn Daclā, the former Sāheb of that city. He also made himself master of Tabrīz, or Tauris, and put to flight Modbaffero'ddīn Azbec Ebn Albab'awān, the Sāheb of Adberbijān, who pretended to oppose him. After which, he married Azbec's wife; who had been divorced from her husband in form, by the Kādi of Tabrīz. That lady, according to Ebn Shohnab, was the daughter of Togrol Bek, the last of the princes of the house of Seljuk. In fine, Al Soltān Jalālo'ddīn had so aggrandized himself by the conquests he had made, that his power gave umbrage to the Khalīf of Baghdād himself, who was now afraid of him. About this time, Al Malec Al Nāser Salāb'addīn Dawd, the son of Al Malec Al Moadhbhem Isa, the Sāheb of Damascus, at the invitation of the inhabitants, took upon him the government of Hamab. The emperor Jengkīz Khān, having passed through Tartary, arrived at the river Tūla, if the Chinese historians may be depended upon, in the beginning of the year that we are now upon^q.

THE 623d year of the Hejra, which began Jan. 2d, 1226, proved fatal to the Khalīf Al Dhāher Bi'llah; who, before the close of it, died at Baghdād. He sat about nine months and sixteen days upon the throne, and left behind him the character of an excellent prince; being justly admired by all his people, for his love of justice. In consequence of which disposition, he ordered several of his subjects properties, of which they had been forcibly deprived, to be restored to them. He also remitted the tribute that had been lately imposed, and constructed a very large new bridge over the Tigris at Baghdād, at a vast expence. He ruled with much more lenity and moderation than his father, conciliated to himself the affections of all his people, and departed this life, the fourteenth of Rajeb, the present year^r.

Mokbtār, usually bound in four volumes; and died, after he had completed his ninety-fifth year, in the month of Al Mobarram, 610.

9. Abu'l Carm Sā ed Ebn Tūmā, a Christian physician of Baghdād, surnamed Amīno'ddawla, who was a person of uncommon humanity, and consummate skill, attended by an almost uninterrupted course of success in his practice. He was so highly esteemed by Al Nāser Ledin'liān, the Khalīf of Baghdād, that this prince committed to him intirely the custody of all his treasures; and for that reason gave him the title, or surname, of Amīno'ddawla. This person, who was in the highest credit with the Khalīf, lost his life through his own imprudence, for having discovered to the Wazīr, that Setti Nāsim, a woman of the seraglio, in concert with Tājō'ddīn Rasbīk, an eunuch belonging to the palace, taking advantage of the Khalīf's age and infirmities, especially as he was then almost blind, counterfeited his hand so well, that by this means they absolutely governed the state; Rasbīk, knowing that such a discovery could be made by no other person, hired two soldiers of Wāset, the sons of one Kamro'ddīn, to assassinate him. Those ruffians, therefore, in pursuance of the agreement between them and Rasbīk, murdered him one night, as he was returning from the Wazīr's palace to that of the Khalīf, at Bāb Al Galla, or The Corn Gate. He was first buried in his own house, where he expired, and nine months after removed to the church at Bāb Al Mohawal, where the members of his family were interred. As for the assassins, they were immediately taken, and brought the next morning to the place of execution; where their bellies were first ripped open, and their bodies afterwards affixed to a gibbet, erected for that purpose, near Bāb Al Medhbab, or The Shambles Gate, opposite to Bāb Al Galla, where the murder had been committed. That tragedy was acted on Thursday, the 28th of the former Jomāda, 620.

10. Yusef Ebn Yahya Ebn Ishak Al Sebtī Al Magrebi, a Jewish physician of Sebta, or Ceuta, in Africa, who was tolerably well acquainted with some branches of philosophy, and made a laudable progress in the mathematics. He travelled into Egypt, concealed his religion, and contracted an intimacy with the famous Mūsa Ebn Naïmon Al Kortobi, or Korthobi, of whom we have already given a short account. With that learned man, he applied himself to the correction and emendation of Ebn Aflab Al Andalusi's astronomy, a copy of which he brought with him from Sebta. He went afterwards to Aleppo, acquired possessions, or purchased an estate, in the neighbourhood of that place, married there, and became one of the physicians in ordinary to Al Malec Al Dhāher. He was a man of parts, and uncommon sagacity, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj; who informs us, that he paid the common tribute to nature in the year of the Hejra 623 (1).

His son Al
Mostanser Bi'llah is advanced to the Khalifat.

UPON the death of Al Dhâber Bi'llah, his son Abu Jaasar Al Mansûr was proclaimed Khalif. He was inaugurated the same day on which his father died, and assumed the title, or surname, of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj. As soon as the principal officers of state and of the army, together with the chief inhabitants of Baghdâd, had taken the oath of allegiance to him, he appeared in public on horse-back. And this he continued to do daily for a considerable time, in order to ingratiate himself with the people. All the eastern historians agree, that this Khalif surpassed all his predecessors in liberality; and that he far exceeded his father himself, though so highly celebrated for his excellency in that particular, in the distribution of justice. He caused several public edifices to be erected, for the conveniency of his subjects; and amongst others the famous college denominated from him Al Madrasah Al Mostanseriyah, which had not its equal in the Moslem world, whether we consider the large extent and elegance of its buildings, the materials of which they were composed, the number of students it contained, or the ample revenues assigned it by its founder. Here he settled a professor for each of the four orthodox Moslem sects, and seventy-five students in the Mohammedan law to be instructed by him in the principles he professed, amounting to 300 in all; for whom he appointed monthly salaries, and even more than a sufficient quantity of provisions. These students and professors had likewise a bath for their use within the college, a physician who visited them every day, an apothecary's shop wherein all kinds of medicines were prepared, and a kitchen to dress their meat in, provided for them by the Khalif. Some authors relate, that Al Mostanser Bi'llah had himself an apartment therein, as also a gallery which joined together the schools, where he came every day to learn what was done in the college, and from whence by means of lattice-windows he frequently heard the disputations both of the doctors and their disciples. He moreover kept a great number of good tables, extremely well served, principally during the nights of the month of Ramadân, the only time then in which the Moslems are allowed to eat and drink, by reason of the fast they are obliged to observe every day of that month, in the city of Baghdâd; at which every one of the citizens was well treated, and well received. As a farther instance of this prince's unparalleled liberality, we are told by Mirkbond and Kbondemir, that being one day on the highest gallery of his palace, he saw from thence most of the terraces of the houses of the city adorned with different sorts of habits. Upon which, he asked his Wazîr, what was the meaning of this? who thereupon replied, that the inhabitants of Baghdâd, having washed their cloaths, had placed them there to be dried by the sun, on account of the approach of one of their Beirâms, or principal annual feasts. Al Mostanser, hearing this, immediately answered; "I did not think, that the citizens of Baghdâd had been so poor, that they were forced to wash their old garments, for want of new ones, to celebrate the feast." At the same time, he ordered a vast sum of money to be converted into cross-bow bullets, and shot from the gallery of his palace upon all the terraces of the city where he had seen the habits exposed to the sun. This amazing instance of liberality induced the authors of this Khalif's life to remark, that in less than twenty years he distributed amongst the people the immense treasures which his predecessors had amassed during the space of five hundred years. With regard to the affairs of the Moguls, the Chinese writers inform us, that Ogatâi, or Oktay, Khân, penetrated into Ho-nan, and laid siege to Kay-fong Fû, the capital of that province, and residence of the emperor of the Kin, in 623. It likewise appears from those writers, that Jenghîz Khân himself invaded the territories of the king of Hya; and took Yetsina, a city of very good note. His troops also forced all the fortresses between that city, Ning-hya, Kya-yu-quan, and Kan-chew. Sû-chew, Kan-chew, and Si-lyang Fû also surrendered to them. The Khân moreover reduced Ling-chew, to the south of Ning-hya. These places, with the districts appertaining to them, fell into the hands of the Moguls, during the course of this campaign.

year 624.

In the 624th year of the Hejra, commencing Dec. 22d, 1226, Al Malec Al Moadhdhem Isa Ebn Al Malec Al' Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Damascus, departed this life, towards the close of Dbu'lkaada, in the castle there. He lived either forty-seven or forty-eight years, of which he reigned nine and some months at Damascus. He was a prince of an amiable disposition, of uncommon magnanimity, as well as great application, and extremely well-skilled in grammar. He professed the tenets of the sect of Abu Hanîsa, to which he adhered more strictly than any of his family. The person who instructed him therein was Shahâbo'ddin Al Hofri, a learned man of the same sect. His son Al Malec Al Nâser Salâba'd-din Dawd succeeded him in the sovereignty of Damascus, Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, and the

- a maritime part of Syria; whose uncles Al Malec Al 'Aziz and Al Malec Al Sileh, when he was settled upon the throne, carried the covering of his horse's harness before him. This year, according to the author of the Nighiaristân, the armies of Soltân Jalâlo'ddin and the Moguls, whom he calls Tartars, met in the neighbourhood of Esfahân; but without coming to blows, the Tartars retiring, as it were by agreement, into Khorasân, and Gayâtho'ddin, the Soltân's brother, flying with so much precipitation towards the borders of Laristân, without any apparent reason, that he abandoned his own equipage, and the baggage of his whole army. The inhabitants of Esfahân, seeing this deroute, immediately ran to pillage; but were prevented by Al Kâdi Saedi, who begged they would have a little patience, promising them, that if the Soltân did not appear within a short time, which he mentioned to them, they should be at liberty to do what they pleased. The Soltân, continues this writer, did not fail to return before the expiration of that term, marching with incredible celerity, in order to arrive at Esfahân; by which means he saved the baggage, that must otherwise have inevitably fallen into their hands. Some historians write, that the Moguls defeated Jalâlo'ddin in Adherbijân, and made themselves masters of Tauris, the preceding year; though they own, that afterwards rallying his forces, he had sometimes the better of them. They also relate, that he laid siege to Akblât, the capital of Armenia; whither the Khalif sent an ambassador, with presents, to him. From thence, according to them, he passed into Anatolia, to oblige the Seljukian Turks, occupying that country, to pay him the same respect they had done his father; but was overthrown by 'Alâo'ddin Kaykobâd, the Soltân of Koniya, and other princes of Al Rûm. After which, he was finally surprized by the Moguls; who, having entirely routed his forces, plundered his camp. But notwithstanding this and other great advantages gained by the troops of Jenghîz Khân, that conqueror thought fit to make the best of his way to Tartary, or Mogulestân; and, having put a period to the kingdom of Hya, or Tangût, after he had nominated for his successor his son Oktay Khân, expired, in a forest on the road to Ching, the fourth of Ramadân, 624¹.

- THE following year, being the 625th of the Hejra, beginning December 12th, 1227, a negotiation commenced between Al Malec Al Câmel and the Franks; the result of which was, that Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, should be ceded to the latter, together with several other places, seated in the maritime part of Syria. This cession was, however, made, if Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab, which places it in 626, merits any regard, only upon condition, that the Moslems should be admitted into the temples Affakbra and Al Akfa, that the city should remain dismantled, and that the court of judicature in the forum Al Rostak should be under the direction of a Moslem governor. It must here be remarked, that Al Malec Al Câmel had seized upon Jerusalem, which formerly belonged to his brother Al Malec Al Moadbdhem Isa, after that prince's death. The Franks had received such large supplies both of men and money from Europe, that he found himself not capable of coping with them; and was therefore afraid of losing his territories both in Syria and Egypt, if he did not prevent this by clapping up a peace with them. In consequence of the late convention, the Franks took possession of Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, if the aforesaid manuscript of Ebn Shohnab may be depended upon, in the latter Rabî, 626².

- THE same year, Jalâlo'ddin Ebn Mohammed Khowârazm Shâb, being delivered from the fear of the Tartars, or Moguls, undertook the conquest of Georgia, or Gurjestân. But the king of that country, who found himself in a condition to sustain this war, took the field with an army, composed of Georgian and Khozârian troops, much more formidable than that of Jalâlo'ddin Ebn Mohammed Khowârazm Shâb. The latter of these princes, in order the better to reconnoitre the enemy, posted himself on a height, from whence he could discover the position of their whole camp. Perceiving from this height that their van was formed of the Khozârs, a people seated on the northern coast of the Caspian sea, called by the Persians Desht-Kipjak, who still retained a grateful sense of the great favour he had formerly done them, when he procured them a pardon from his father Mohammed Khowârazm Shâb, after they had rebelled against him; he resolved, being willing to avail himself of their good disposition at this juncture, to attempt detaching them from their ally. For this purpose, he sent them bread (H) and salt, in order to put them in mind of the good office he had formerly done particular circumstance. They give those persons who entertain any suspicion of them something to drink, in order to assure them of their sincerity and good faith (i).

(H) It may not be amiss here by the way to remark, that the ceremony of presenting bread and salt, as a mark of friendship, alliance, and hospitality, is still used in the East. To which the Arabs add another

them, and the alliance he had contracted with them. This produced the desired effect. For a the Khozárs, ashamed of being engaged in a war against their benefactor, abandoned the Georgians, and immediately returned home. After their departure, the Soltán gave the king of Georgia to understand, that, notwithstanding the defection of the Khozárs, he would grant him a cessation of arms for one day, to treat of an accommodation. During this short interval, in which several feats of arms were performed, Jalálo'ddin dismounted successively a valiant Georgian and three of his sons, and afterwards killed in a single combat another of the same nation of a gigantic size and strength; which struck the Georgian army, in whose fight the combat was fought, with terror. Whereupon the Soltán, taking advantage of the panic into which the enemy were thrown, fell upon them with such bravery, that he gained a complete victory, and reduced to his obedience the whole kingdom of Gurjestán, without striking b another stroke. However, having entered Tessís, the capital of that kingdom, he received advice that Borák, governor of the province of Kermán, who had formerly been one of his door-keepers, accustomed to live in a state of independency during the war of the Tartars, did not obey his orders there. He, therefore, took a resolution to march directly to Kermán with only a detachment of 300 horse; hoping by this means to be able to chastise him for his disobedience, before it broke out into open rebellion, and before he had put himself in a proper posture of defence. Having accordingly left Tessís, he reached that province with his detachment before Borák was apprized of his departure, in seventeen days; surprized the disaffected governor, before he was in a condition to oppose him; and, according to the historian now before us, inflicted upon him the punishment due to his temerity and presumption. We c must not forget to remark, that the Kin, commanded by a prince of the blood, about this time, overthrew the Moguls, with the loss of 8000 men; nor that Awcatái, Ogatái, Ogtái, or Oktay, Khán succeeded his father Jenghíz Khán, in the empire of the Moguls, towards the beginning of the present year^w.

THE next year, being the 626th of the Hejra, which commenced November 30th, 1228, Al Malec Al Ashraf and Al Malec Al Cámel formed the siege of Damascus; which, after a vigorous defence, surrendered to them. However, Al Malec Al Náser Saláb'addin Dawd, the Sáheb of that place, had in lieu thereof assigned him the cities of Al Carac, Al Belká', or Al Belkáa, Al Shawbec, and some other places, with the districts belonging to them. The Belúd Al Sharkia was given to Al Malec Al Cámel, the Sáheb of Egypt; and Al Malec Al Ashraf, d by the consent of all parties, remained in possession of Damascus. This year, according to Ebn Shohnab, died Al Malec Al Mas'úd Ebn Al Malec Al Cámel, the Sáheb of Al Yaman, at Mecca; which, with the sacred territory appertaining to it, was now under his jurisdiction. His corpse having been carried to Al 'Ala, and there interred; his son Yusef was saluted Sáheb of Al Yaman, and without any difficulty, or obstruction, ascended the throne. About the same time, as this writer likewise informs us, Al Malec Al Modhaffer Takio'ddin Al Amjad, or Amjed, Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel, the Sáheb of Baalbec, after he had been dispossessed of his capital by Al Malec Al Ashraf, was assassinated by one of his slaves, whom he had formerly imprisoned in a chamber; who having made his escape to the top of the palace, threw himself headlong from thence, and was killed. Al Malec Al Amjad, who is said by Ebn Shohnab e to have been one of the most famous of the descendants of Ayúb, reigned many years at Baalbec, and was buried in his father's college, erected on a very high eminence, in the city of Damascus. We must not forget to remark, that the authority of Awcatái, Ogatái, or Oktay, Khán, as Grand Khán of the Moguls, was unanimously recognized, at a general assembly of the great lords and princes of that nation, held at Karákorom, or Ardúbálik, the metropolis of the empire of Jenghíz Khán, in the year that we are now upon^x.

THE 627th year of the Hejra, which began November 20th, 1229, produced several remarkable events; the principal of which, as related by the Arab authors, we shall here beg leave to touch upon. Soltán Jalálo'ddin Khowárazm Sháb having shut up Takio'ddin Al 'Abbás and Mojiro'ddin Takúb, Al Malec Al Ashraf's brothers, together with Al Emír Hofámo'ddin Al Kaymari, and Azzo'ddin Aybec, one of Al Malec Al Ashraf's Mamlúks, or purchased slaves, in the city of Akblát; he played upon that part facing the sea, with twenty of his military machines, and at last, after the inhabitants had for some time fed upon dogs, and a Damascene pound of bread had been sold for an Egyptian dinár, obliged it to surrender to him. Al Emír Hofámo'ddin Al Kaymari, however, found means to escape on horse-back to the castle of Kaymar. As for 'Azzo'ddin Aybec, Takio'ddin, and Mojiro'ddin, Jalálo'ddin made them prisoners of war, and carried them about every-where with him. Of which Al Malec Al Ashraf, who had lately reduced to his obedience Al Rakka, upon the Euphrates, having been informed; he immediately advanced at the head of a body of horse to Abolostain, and was joined by 'Aláo'ddin Kaykobád, with the forces of Al Rám, a few parasangs g a from that place. Soon after this junction, the combined army came up with the Khowârazmian forces, consisting of 40,000 men, that had marched from Akhlât, with an intention to give them battle. Both armies one Friday coming in sight of each other, a bloody engagement immediately ensued; but the night intervening, nothing decisive happened that day, though the Khowârazmian troops were upon the point of being put to the rout. The following night the soldiers on both sides lay under arms. On Saturday morning, by day-break, the fight was renewed with the utmost fury, and ended in the intire defeat of the Khowârazmians; who, as we learn from Abu'l Faraj, lost a very considerable number of men. Many of the fugitives fled as far as the mountains of Trabezond; from the summits of which 1500 precipitated themselves, and were killed. The Soltân himself escaped first to Khartabert, and afterwards b into Persia; having before sent Takio'ddîn, Al Malec Al Asbraf's brother, bound, as a present, to the Khalîf at Baghdâd, who honourably released him, and sent him back to Al Malec Al Asbraf. After the end of the action, Al Malec Al Asbraf marched to Akhlât, and re-possessed himself of that place. From thence he dispatched an ambassador to Jalâlo'ddîn, to treat with him about an exchange of prisoners, and to beg he would use with humanity those he had taken. The ambassador had no sooner opened the purport of his commission to the Soltân, than the latter replied, "I have amongst my prisoners some of your master's relations, whereas he c "has only a few of my slaves; nevertheless if he is desirous of peace, I am ready to conclude "one with him." Being afterwards upbraided by Al Malec Al Asbraf with the ravages and devastations he had committed in his dominions, and the blood he had spilt there; that prince d said to his minister, "Jalâlo'ddîn has only my brother Mojiro'ddîn in his hands, who may now "be probably dead; and if this should be the case, I have other brothers, and many more "relations, the members of the house of Ayûb, together with all their domestics, at this time "amounting to 2000 souls; whereas the Shâh of Khowârazm is destitute of children, and has "a multitude of enemies behind him. If he is desirous of peace, let him abandon all the towns "of which he has so unjustly deprived us." The Soltân not relishing this answer, the negotiation vanished into smoke; upon which, he first commanded 'Azzo'ddîn Aybec, who had been confined in the castle of Aktamâr, to be brought before him, and afterwards put him to death. Receiving, however, advice, not long after, that the Tartars, under the conduct of Jûrmâgûn Nowayn, had passed the Ammawaib, and were arrived at Tauris, in their intended expedition e against him; he dispatched an ambassador to the Khalîf at Baghdâd, another to Al Malec Al Asbraf, and a third to 'Alâo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Al Rûm, in order to solicit the assistance of these princes against the numerous forces of Oktay Khân. That they might execute their commissions with the greater success, they represented, in pursuance of their instructions, to the courts to which they repaired, that if the Tartars could once overwhelm the Shâh of Khowârazm, as the only barrier against them on that side would be thereby destroyed, they would easily subjugate all the neighbouring powers; who were therefore obliged, by their common interest, to support him, to act against them with all their forces, and to oblige them to return home, before they had made any farther progress in those parts of the world. But this representation not producing the desired effect, he fixed his winter-quarters at Armîah, and continued there till f the following spring. It may not be improper to observe, that Oktay Khân, the emperor of the Tartars, or Moguls, sent the above-mentioned Jûrmâgûn Nowayn, with a body of 30,000 horse, to penetrate into Khorasân, Sontây Babâder with the same number of troops towards the frontiers of Kipjâk, and another army, under the orders of Saksîn and Aylgâr, to Al Tobbat; whilst he himself moved against Katay, or Kbatay, according to Abu'l Faraj, the preceding year^y.

In the 628th year of the Hejra, commencing November 9th, 1230, Al Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn Khowârazm Shâh retired to the province of Diyâr Becr, where he gave himself up intirely to wine, gaming, and all kinds of pleasures, as if, says Abu'l Faraj, he intended to take his final leave of the world, and the transitory government of it. But whilst he was immersed in this
g voluptuous course of life, Bâymas Nowayn, with an army of Moguls, penetrated into Diyâr Becr, and surprized him, though Al Emîr Awrkhân, by facing the enemy with a body of Khowârazmian troops, gave him an opportunity of making his escape. The next morning the Khowârazmians were put to the rout, and pursued for some time by the Moguls, who imagined that the Soltân himself was amongst them. But as soon as they were informed of their mistake, they left off the pursuit. In the mean time, Jalâlo'ddîn fled, with only three servants, to a mountain near Amed, where he was set upon by a party of Curds; who, taking him and his servants to be Khowârazmian soldiers, that had escaped the fury of the Moguls, for the sake of their horses, cloaths, and arms, put them all to the sword. This was discovered by a Curd, who appeared afterwards, with Jalâlo'ddîn's arms, at Amed; and was executed there, for the part he had acted in the tragedy mentioned here. Others nevertheless relate, that it was not Jalâlo'ddîn himself, but his armour-bearer, that was killed near Amed; he and his companions having disguised themselves, in order to avoid the Moguls, in the habits of Súfis. These writers pretend, that he wandered about from one place to another, till the 652d year of the Hejra; when passing the Jibún, with a caravan of merchants, he was seized, as a spy, by the Al Kará-gúl, or guards posted on the roads, put by them to the torture, though he confessed himself to be the Sháh of Khowárazm, and under it expired. According to Ebn Shobnab, Jalálo'ddín was so extremely affected with the death of a favourite slave, which happened this year, that his ideas were confused, and the use of his reason almost intirely lost. Nay, if this writer may be credited, he was so desperately enamoured with this slave, that he caused her body to be kept a long time, sent her provisions, after she was dead, every day, and commanded the persons who brought them to ask her, as if she had been alive, how she did, and whether she was better than she had been the day before. This author adds, that Jalálo'ddín was the eldest of Soltán Mohammed Ebn Tacash's sons; that he had at first assigned him for his share of the succession the kingdom of Gazna, and its dependencies, as far as Hind; that Mohammed bequeathed his second son Kotbo'ddín Iblágh Sháh the kingdom of Khowárazm, together with the province of Khorasán; that he left to his third son Gayátho'ddín the kingdom of Kermán, Macrán, and other territories of a considerable extent; and lastly that he bestowed on his fourth son Rocno'ddín Awr Sháh the kingdom of Al Irák, that is, the Persian Irák. But, continues he, Jalálo'ddín in process of time grew as powerful as his father Mohammed, and consequently made himself master of all those countries of which Mohammed had been possessed. Ebn Shobnab farther relates, that Jalálo'ddín was defeated this year in a pitched battle by the Moguls; that he escaped out of the hands of the Tartars, or Moguls, who took him prisoner, and was at last dispatched by a Curd, that had imbrued his hands in the blood of his brother, as soon as he knew him; that, after this prince's death, a certain poet wrote some verses upon that tragical event, a specimen of which has been preserved by the same historian; that the consequence of Jalálo'ddín's defeat was the absolute reduction of Al 'Ajem, or Persia, by the Moguls; and that those barbarians exercised greater cruelties upon the poor inhabitants, at this juncture, than they had ever done before. With regard to Jalálo'ddín's grandeur and magnificence, it may not be amiss to remark, that the march of Dhi'l-karnaim, or Alexander the Great, was beat on twenty-seven drums, set with jewels, before him, twice a day, viz. at the rising and setting of the sun, after the manner of the Seljúkian Soltáns. The day on which this pompous ceremony commenced, according to Ebn Shobnab, twenty-seven sovereign princes beat the march of Dhi'l-karnaim, at his palace; the principal of which were Togrol Bek Ebn Arslán, of the family of Seljúk, Al Malec 'Aláo'ddín, the Sáheb of Yámanán, Al Malec Tájo'ddín, the Sáheb of Balkh, his son Al Malec 'Adhem, or 'Adham, the Sáheb of Termed, and Al Malec Sinjár, the Sáheb of Bokhára. All his utensils were also covered with precious stones. His brothers had likewise marches beat on five drums each in honour of them, constantly at the stated times of public prayer. That Jalálo'ddín (I) was a general of invincible courage, as well as most excellent conduct, is asserted by Ebn Shobnab, and from an account of his exploits in a subsequent part of this work will more clearly appear. Besides other effects of almost inestimable value, Jenghiz Khán is reported to have plundered him of ten chests, full of precious stones; two of which, says Ebn Shobnab, were equivalent to the revenues of the whole earth. When he wrote to the Sáhebs of Al Rúm, Mesr, and Al Shám, the first of which was of the house of Seljúk, and the others descended from Saláb'addín Yusef Ebn Ayúb, as he enjoyed the sovereignty of all his father's vast dominions, and was of course a most puissant monarch, to the end of his letter he added his name, without subjoining either YOUR BROTHER, or YOUR SERVANT; when to the Khalif of Baghdád, he subscribed himself, YOUR SERVANT; but when to the Sáheb of Al Mawfel, and other such princes, he only affixed his seal; the inscription of which was, HELP IS FROM GOD ALONE. His troops he harangued with such persuasive eloquence, as made the deepest impression upon them. He assumed, after his father, the title of King of the world. His passage of the Sind, or Indus, by swimming over it on horse-back in the month of Rajeb, was looked upon as so wonderful an event, that it produced amongst the orientals the following proverb, "Live till Rajeb, and you shall see wonders." The Sáheb of Al Túríkh, which is the correction of the Arab and Persian kalendar, called also Túríkh Al Neiran, that it is to say, the calculation of the course of the sun and the moon, has by some been attributed to him. His mother Tarcán Khátún, a lady of consummate wisdom and prudence, who put her whole trust in God, was surnamed, the strength of the world and of religion, and the queen of the women of

^a both worlds. This year, died, at Al Kâbirah, Abu'l Hasan Yahya Ebn Abd'alimoti Ebn Al Nâr Al Zawâwi, a famous grammarian, of the sect of Abu Hanîfa, and the author of a book, intituled, Al Alafiab. His tribe inhabited a tract on the confines of Nabâna, where he was born, according to one of the Arab writers, in 552. The arms of Oktay Khân did not only make a great progress on the side of Al'Ajem, but likewise in China, reducing the most considerable part of Sben-si, and even penetrating into Ho-nan, before the close of the campaign².

THE following year, being the 629th of the Hejra, beginning October 28th, 1231, Al Malec Al Cîmel, the Sâheb of Egypt, took Amed and Hisp Caifâ, in Mesopotamia, from Al Malec Al Mas'ûd Ebn Al Malec Al Sâleb Mahmûd, of the house of Artak, on account of his dissolute and immoral life; he having debauched, as we learn from Ebn Shohnab, several of the female part of his subjects. However, Al Cîmel elevated Al Malec Al Sâleb, probably another prince of the same family, to the throne there. This affair has nevertheless been something differently related by Abu'l Faraj, who places it in the following year. He observes, that Al Malec Al Cîmel took Amed only then from its proper Sâheb, and bestowed upon him in lieu thereof several cities in Syria. Some writers pretend, that Al Malec Al Cîmel received the ambassadors of the emperor Frederic II. in Syria, this year, where that monarch himself then arrived; by whose intervention a treaty of peace was concluded between the Christians and the Mohammedans. By virtue of which treaty, Jerusalem, though intirely demolished, except The Church of the Resurrection, and a few buildings adjoining to it, as it had been left by Al Malec Al Moadhahem Isa, the Sâheb of Damascus, with the territory appertaining to it, Bethlehem, Lydda, Al Ramla, and the whole tract extending as far as Nîffâ and 'Accâ, were ceded to the former. This memorable event has, however, been referred by Ebn Shohnab to the year 626. Oktay, the Grand Khân of the Moguls, reduced to great distress the emperor of the Kin, and entered into a negotiation, which terminated in a treaty, with the Song emperor, then reigning in the southern parts of China, the present year³.

IN the 630th of the Hejra, which commenced October 18th, 1232, Al Soltân 'Alâo'ddîn, the Sâheb of Al Rûm, sent an embassy to Oktay Khân, to tender his submission to him; which so pleased the Grand Khân, that he offered him a considerable post at his court. This, says Abu'l Faraj, clearly demonstrated to the people of Al Rûm the unparalleled haughtiness of the emperor of the Moguls. The same year, 'Alâo'ddîn deprived Al Malec Al Ashraf of Akhlât and Sarra Manrây, and Al Ashraf himself attacked the city of Hisp Al Mansûr. Modhaffero'ddîn Cîcbari Ebn Zîno'ddîn Ali Cûkboc, the Sâheb of Arbel, departed this life in the month of Ramâdân, was carried to Mecca, and buried there; being succeeded in the government of that city by a certain nobleman, named Abu'l Mûâli Mohammed Ebn Nasr Ebn Salâyâ, who took possession of the place, in the name of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, the Khalîf of Baghdâd. This year, likewise died, at Al Mawfel, Al Sheikh Abu'l Hasan 'Azzo'ddîn Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Mohammed Ebn Abd'alcarîm Ebn Abd'akwâhed Al Shaibânî, known by the name of Ebn Al Athîr Al Jazari, a native of Jazîrat Ebn Omar, the isle of Omar, a city upon the Tigris, a little above Al Mawfel; where he was born, the 4th of the former Jomâda, 555. He also received his education there. He is said to have composed three histories. The first was intituled, Al Cîmel, or a general history, to which we have frequently referred in this work, beginning at the fall of Adam, and ending with the year of the Hejra 628; the second bore the title of Ebrât Uli Al Absar, examples for sages; the third was the history of the dynasty of the Atâbeks. The pieces intituled, Nebaiat, and Affad Al Gabab, are likewise attributed to him; but whether or no he was the real author of them, we have not been certainly informed. Ebn Shohnab farther relates, that Abd'alazîz Ebn Omar, an inhabitant of Rak'id in the territory of Al Mawfel, built a school, or college, and called it after his name. The Grand Khân of the Moguls met still with success in the war he carried on against the emperor of the Kin, this campaign⁴.

THE next year, being the 631st of the Hejra, which began October 7th, 1233, did not produce many actions of éclat. In it, however, died Nâféro'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Al Kâber Ebn Nîro'ddîn, the Sâheb of Al Mawfel; and was succeeded by Bedro'ddîn Lûlû, to whom the Khalîf sent the patent of Soltân, and the Khotba was made throughout the district of Al Mawfel in his name. The same year, according to Ebn Shohnab, Al Sheikh Saifo'ddîn Al Amedi, generally denominated Ali Ebn Ali Ebn Mohammed Ebn Sâlem Al Tha'lebi, a native of Amed in Mesopotamia, and a doctor of the sect of Al Shâfeî, likewise departed this life. He first professed the Tenets of Ahmed Abn Hanbal, and is said to have introduced several innovations into the Moslem theology; upon which, the Al Fakîh of Egypt, and the doctors of Al Kâbirah, most vigorously opposed him, and attacked him upon the point of his faith. But his principles having been found, upon a strict examination of them, to be conformable to the doctrines of Islâm, and he having adopted the sentiments of Al Shâfeï, his adversaries desired to be reconciled to him. Al Tba'lebi nevertheless having been extremely ill used by them, particularly by a certain Fakîb, who wrote satyrical verses upon him, a specimen of which Ebn Shohnab has handed down to us; he quitted Al Kâbirab, and retired to Hamah in Syria. From thence he went afterwards to Damascus, where he continued to the day of his death. He has been represented by Ebn Shohnab as eminent for his skill in the sciences, and his knowledge of antient literature. He was born, if the last mentioned author may be depended upon, in the year of the Hejra 551. At this time, Al Malec Al Câmél permitted both the Christians and the Jews in Egypt to ride upon horses and mules, to adorn, repair, and even build as many churches and synagogues as they pleased, to have all their disputes determined in a judicial way by magistrates professing the same faith, and to enjoy the free exercise of their respective religions, and all the other privileges they could desire, in their utmost extent. Nor is this the only instance of that prince's equity and moderation, to be met with in history. About the 623d year of the Hejra, Ebn Sirûn, one of the Egyptian Emîrs, having visited the monastery of the valley of Habib, the monks of which had been wrongfully accused by a renegado, formerly a member of their convent, of defrauding the Soltân of the tribute due to him; that Emîr caused those religious to be whipped and tortured in a most cruel manner, without making the least inquiry into the affair, and extorted from them no less than 600 dinârs. Al Malec Al Câmél (K), however, disapproving of this iniquitous conduct, would not receive the money, when it was brought him by the Emîr; but ordered him to restore it to the monks, who had been so unjustly deprived of it. Nor would the same upright prince take a sum of money, offered him, as a bribe, by the friends of one Dawd, an Egyptian priest, to prevail upon him to command the Jacobites to ordain that priest their patriarch. He also refused an equal sum, when brought him, on the same account, by the adherents of another person who then aspired at the Jacobite patriarchate of Alexandria. He declared his intention never to concern himself in the ordination and election of a Jacobite patriarch, but to leave that matter intirely to those to whom it properly belonged; recommending at the same time, in the strongest terms, peace and unity to them. But neither the favourable disposition nor salutary advice of the Soltân could inspire the Jacobites, who were rent by parties and divisions, with more moderate sentiments, nor induce them to concur amicably in the election of a new patriarch; though Al Câmél had given his consent, in compliance with their request, that Yahya Ebn Mûtmen, a deacon in the church of Al Moallaka might be their patriarch, if unanimously elected by them. The Mogul arms being now employed against the emperor of the Kin, the Moslem provinces bordering upon the Grand Khân's frontiers enjoyed some repose. The emperors Shew-su and Chang-lin being killed, the generals of Oktay Khân and the emperor of the Song put an end to the dynasty of the Kin, the present year^c.

The most memorable occurrences of the year 632,

THE 632d year of the Hejra, commencing September 26th, 1234, was distinguished by some occurrences of note. Al Soltân 'Alâ'ddîn, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Râm, took the city of Al Robâ, or Edeffa, by storm; and for three days together butchered the inhabitants, both Christians and Mohammedans, without mercy. He also gave the city up to his troops to

(K) Several other instances of this prince's mild, equitable, and generous disposition are handed down to us by the Egyptian writers; one of which, being very remarkable, we shall take the liberty to insert here. Al Malec Al Câmél, in his return from Alexandria, passed through the valley of Habib, and was, with the whole body of his guards attending him, very hospitably entertained by the monks residing in the monastery seated there. The Soltân, not to be behind-hand with them in point of generosity, made them a present of 500 artaba's of wheat, 300 of meal, 100 of beans, and as many of pease. He likewise removed an officer, employed in collecting the tribute paid by the monks to the Soltân, who had before usually lived in the monastery; and consequently been no small restraint upon the religious residing there. He farther granted them an instrument, or patent, by virtue of which all who entered upon the monastic state were thenceforth to be exempted from tribute, together with this additional privilege, that the substance and effects of the monks, after their decease, should belong to the monasteries, and not to him. The Soltân also, at this time, gave them leave to chuse whom they pleased for their patriarch; promising to confirm their election, and support in his new dignity the person their unanimous suffrages should fall upon. They excusing themselves from setting about that affair at present, on account of their poverty, as they wanted money to pay for a license, which would be previously requisite, for that purpose; he bad them only be unanimous in their choice of a proper person to fill the vacant patriarchal see, and leave the rest to him, as not a farthing should be exacted of them on that occasion. But neither this obliging condescension and generosity of the Soltân, nor any thing else, could inspire them with sentiments of concord and unanimity, so that the patriarchal see remained vacant some years longer. This adventure is said to have happened in, or near, the year of the Hejra 630 (1).

- a be plundered, during that term; so that they stripped the remainder of the people, who survived the carnage, of every thing they had. The Rûmean soldiers even plundered the churches; carrying away the books, crucifixes, gold and silver vessels, and every thing of any value that they found therein. Hereupon the citizens of Harrân brought the keys of their citadel to him. After this, he made himself master of Al Rakka and Al Bîra upon the Euphrates, which were obliged to surrender to him. But, as soon as his forces were withdrawn, Al Malec Al Câmél, the Sâheb of Egypt, marched to Al Robâ, laid siege to that city, and at the end of four months possessed himself of it. The Rûmean troops that he found therein, being prisoners of war, he sent in chains upon camels into Egypt; after he had demolished a large tower, belonging to the castle of that place. At length being pressed on one side by the Moguls, and on the other by the princes of the house of Ayûb; he was obliged, after he had acquired an immense quantity of spoil, to abandon the territories of other princes, in order to preserve his own. This year, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab, died Al Malec Al Zâbed Dawd, the Sâheb of Al Bîra, upon the Euphrates, probably after that city had fallen into 'Alâo'ddîn's hands; as did likewise a prince of the family of Ayûb, son to Al Malec Al Dhâber Al Gâzi, of whom we have spoken frequently above, and Al Kâdi Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, the biographer, who wrote the life of Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, in a very advanced age. The last of these, Al Kâdi Bobâo'ddîn Ebn Sheddâd, who was one of Salâb'addîn's greatest favourites, seems to have ended his days at Aleppo; as he had appointments there, under Al Malec Al Azîz, Al Malec Al Dhâber Al Gâzi's son, if the above-mentioned MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab may be depended upon, that amounted annually to 100,000 dinârs. The same year, Oktay Khân marched an army into Korea; and having levied more than 1,500,000 good troops, he sent Sûpûtay, one of his most famous generals, with 300,000 men, to ravage the countries to the west, north, and north-east of the Caspian sea. His sons Kotovan and Kuchû, attended by several Mogul and Kitan princes, and two or three renowned generals, he ordered to attack the emperor of the Song, in different places at once. Wang-shi-hyen surrendered the city of Kong-chang-fû, in Shen-si, to Kotovan, and offered to join him with a body of troops he commanded there, in the year that we are now upon^d.

- In the 633d year of the Hejra, beginning September 16th, 1235, the Tartars (L) over-^{and of the year} ran the district of Arbel, penetrated into that of Niniveh, and incamped upon the river of⁶³³.
d Tarjaiah and Carmalis. Hereupon the inhabitants of the latter of those towns retired into their church, where they were surrounded by the Moguls; two of whose principal officers posted themselves at the doors, on each side, and gave verbal leave to the people to return to their respective habitations. Notwithstanding which, all those that went out of one of the doors were put to the sword, whilst those that passed out of the other were saved alive. At this extraordinary conduct, the reason of which could never be known, every body was surprized. About this time, a great number of young men, in the towns and villages near the monasteries of chief note in Egypt, put on the monastic habit, in order to avoid paying the usual tribute that would otherwise have been demanded of them. This fraud being discovered, the collectors of the tribute treated the monks themselves with extreme severity; particularly Ebn Farme-sini, who filled a considerable post in the state at Alexandria, not a little harrassed the monks in the neighbourhood of that city, and exacted of them above 1000 dinârs. To prevent such frauds for the future, an edict was also issued by the Soltân, confining the privileges of monks to those who received the habit regularly in some monastery, resided there, and had their names inserted in the register of the Dîwân. This year, Dawd, or David, Ebn Laklak, an ambitious Egyptian priest, by whose intrigues the Jacobite church had been imbroiled no less than twenty years, was elected patriarch of the Jacobites at Alexandria. He had, ever since the death of John, the last patriarch, that is to say, during the space of twenty years, aspired at that dignity; and at last, by the influence of bribery, and the assistance of every wicked art, obtained it. In conformity to a custom which then prevailed, when a monk was vested with the supreme ecclesiastical authority, he assumed the name, or rather surname, of Cyril; and left behind him, after his decease, which happened in 640, according to Al Makrîzi, a most infamous character. The Moguls, under the command of prince Kotovan, overthrew the forces

'Alâo'ddîn Kaykobâd, the Sâheb of Al Rûm, dies.

THE following year, being the 634th of the Hejra, which commenced September 4th, 1236, Al Soltân 'Alâo'ddîn Kaykobâd, the Sâheb of Al Rûm, died suddenly in his capital. For, at a feast which he had made for his chief lords and officers, just as he was in the height of his jollity, and boasting of the extent of his dominions, he felt a pain in his bowels; and, being taken at the same time with a flux, discharged such a quantity of bloody excrements, that he died two days after, having reigned eighteen years. He was prudent, temperate, and brave; but kept in great awe his nobles and dependents. He restored the high reputation of the Seljuks, which the sons of Kilij Arslân had impaired by their divisions, enlarged the empire to its former limits, and re-established order in the state. He was endued with great firmness of mind, and feared by the neighbouring princes; who readily submitting to him, he for that reason assumed the title of king of the world. Alâo'ddîn being dead, the Rûmean princes took the oath of fidelity to his son Gayâtbo'ddîn Kaykbofrû; who, says Abu'lfeda, in the year 641, was broke to pieces by the Tartars. Soon after his accession to the crown, he seized Gâyer Khân, the chief Emîr of the Khowârazmians; upon which, the other Emîrs of that nation fled with their troops. Those fugitives, taking their route through Malatîa, or Malatiya, Câkbtîn, and Kbartabert, made Saifo'ddîn Al Sûbâshi (M) prisoner, and put Babarmîr, or Tabarmîr, Al Sûb. shi, to the sword, at Kbartabert. They also ravaged the county of Someisât, and continued their route to Al Sowaidî; pillaging the whole tract through which they moved, in a dreadful manner. But having the cities of Al Rohâ, or Edeffa, Harrân, and others on that side, assigned them by Al Malec Al Nâser, the Sâheb of Aleppo, for their habitations; they desisted from farther ravages, and were incorporated with the other inhabitants of those towns, who enjoyed his protection^f.

Al Malec Al
'Azîz, the Sâheb of Aleppo, departs this life.

THE same year, Al Malec Al 'Azîz Mohammed Ebn Al Malec Al Dhâber Ebn Salâh'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Aleppo, likewise departed this life, in the castle there. He was succeeded by his son Al Malec Al Nâser Salâh'addîn Yusef, the last prince of the house of Ayûb who reigned in that city. Al Malec Al 'Azîz Mohammed Ebn Al Malec Al Dhâber, according to Ebn Shohnab, was a good ruler, and ended his days in the former Rabî. Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of this author seems to intimate, that Al Malec Al 'Azîz Mohammed was only twenty-three years and one month old, at the time of his death; that Al Malec Al Nâser Salâh'addîn was about seven years of age, when that event happened; and that Saifa Khâtûn, the daughter of Al Malec Al 'Adel, his father's mother, acted as regent, whilst he was incapable of holding the reins of government. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, that Al Malec Al Nâser Salâh'addîn, the last Soltân of Aleppo of the house of Ayûb, was killed by Holagu, or Hûlâcû, the Tartar, in 658, two years after the taking of Baghdâd by the Tartars^e.

Other transactions of the
year 634.

THE city of Arbel having been besieged by the Tartars, in the month of Shawâl, this year, the garrison and inhabitants retired into the castle, where they defended themselves with great bravery for forty days; at the end of which term, the Tartars were prevailed upon, for a sum of money, to abandon the siege. The Tartars, or Moguls, on the side of Cbina, likewise attacked ineffectually Wbang-Chew, a pretty large city of Hu-quang, this campaign; having been obliged to draw off from before it, after they had sustained a very considerable loss^h.

The most memorable events of the year

THE next year, being the 635th of the Hejra, which began August 24th, 1237, Al Malec Al Asbraf Modbaffero'ddîn Mûsa Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb paid the common tribute to nature at Damascus, after he had reigned a little above eight years there. He left the kingdom he governed to Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael, his brother; and was sixty years old, at the time of his demise. Al Malec Al Asbraf was strongly attached to his pleasures; and denied himself no kind of gratifications; though he is said to have been a very gracious, affable, and munificent prince. His arms were every-where attended with such success, that "his standard, as Ebn Shohnab expresses it, was never broken," by his enemies. The news of his death no sooner arrived in Egypt, than Al Malec Al Câmél, his brother, marched with a powerful army to Damascus, shut up Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael in that city, and obliged the

(M) The word Sûbâshi, or Sûbâsha, here seems to have been taken by Dr. Pocock for the name of an officer next in rank to a Basba, or Bashaw, and must therefore be considered as a sort of Turkish term. Nor are we to be surprized at meeting with such a word in Abu'l Faraj, as he was a native of the Belâd Al Rûm, then occupied by the Seljukian Turks (1).

- a new Sabab to surrender it to him. After which, he made his public entry into that capital; and gave Al Malec Al Saleb Ismael in lieu thereof Baalbec, Al Bokâ, or Al Bekâ (N), the adjacent plain from whence the city of Baalbec derived its present name, and Bosra. Ebn Shobnah seems to intimate, that Al Malec Al Câmél affixed fifty of Al Mojâbed Shairacûb's men, sent by him with an ill design to Damascus, to certain gibbets, erected for that purpose, in the gardens of the palace. He had no sooner made himself master of Damascus, then he detached a body of his troops to drive Al Malec Al Mojâbed Shairacûb from the city of Hems: but whilst he was pursuing his conquest of Syria, and forming great designs against the Franks, the Tartars, and the Seljuks, who on all sides surrounded his dominions, he died, at Damascus, after he had lived seventy years, and reigned twenty, in Syria and Egypt. His death happened, according to Ebn Shobnah, towards the close of Rajeb. It has been remarked, that as Mo'awiyah, the first Khalif of the house of Ommiyah, presided twenty years over the people of Damascus, in quality of governor, and reigned there twenty years more with the dignity and authority of Khalif; so this Soltân governed that metropolis twenty years in a state of dependency on other princes, and the same number of years afterwards as absolute sovereign of the provinces appertaining to it. He left behind him the reputation of a wise and learned prince. Egypt received many benefits and advantages from him, whilst he sat upon the throne. Men of letters in particular owed vast obligations to him. For he frequently held conferences with them, and attended their disputations in his palace; when he proposed several difficulties to them, on subjects both relative to the belles lettres and the jurisprudence of the Mohammedans. Nor did he ever dismiss them without some considerable presents. Ebn Shobnah writes, that he examined them in the several branches of literature to which they had chiefly applied themselves; offering objections and proposing curious questions to them, in order to try their abilities, and see what progress they had made. In drawing up these questions, which were for the most part deduced from juridical and grammatical topics, he was assisted by Ebn Moti. He is said to have been a person of consummate gravity and prudence, a lover of learned men, and extremely well versed in the art of government. 'Tis no wonder, therefore, that his councils were generally crowned with success. So exceedingly prone was he to favour persons of erudition, that he founded for a certain number of them the college, or school, from him denominated Câmeliya, of which we may perhaps hereafter give our readers some account. The famous Sharif Al Edrisi, as he himself informs us in his geography, dedicated to Al Malec Al Câmél his book upon the pyramids of Egypt. As soon as his death was known, the Emîrs of Egypt saluted his younger son Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Al Malec Al Câmél, without any regard to his elder brother Nojmo'ddin, Soltân, and took the oath of allegiance to him; he residing at Al Kâbirah, and being the governor of Egypt, when his father expired. With regard to the kingdom of Damascus, Al Malec Al Câmél was succeeded there, if Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shobnah may be depended upon, by Al Malec Al Jawâd Yûnes Ebn Dawd Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb. This year, the patriarch Cyril was upbraided, in the severest terms, by the leading men amongst the Jacobites, with simony; which he endeavoured to excuse, by saying, that without this he could not raise the money he had engaged to pay to the Soltân. But so far were they from being satisfied with this excuse, that it incensed them still more against him. They farther urged, that they had no hand in his election; and that, after he had been guilty of the vilest practices, in order to carry his point, he had bought the patriarchate of Alexandria of the Soltân. After much altercation, he at last bound himself by oath to abstain from simony, as soon as he had paid the remainder of the money due to the Soltân, amounting to 300 dinârs; though he scrupled not afterwards to violate this oath, in a

(N) Al Bokâ, in the singular number, properly denotes the vale, or valley, and Al Bekâ, or Al Bikâ, in the plural, the vallies, or flat countries, as we learn from Golius. Here the word must undoubtedly be taken for the plain of Baalbec, of which the following description has been given us by Dr. Pococke. "The plain of Baalbec is about eight miles broad, extends a considerable way to the south, and much farther northwards, where it opens into a plain; to the north east of which are the deserts that extend eastward to Palmyra; and northwards to Hems, the ancient Emesa. Towards the north part of this plain the river Asi rises, which is the Orontes of the ancients; it is a barren red soil, very little improved, and the crops it produces are so poor, that it hardly answers the expence of tilling and watering; and they cannot sow it two years together, this part having no water but what is brought from a stream that

"rises plentifully half a mile south-east of Baalbec, which runs thro' the city, and is lost in the fields and gardens." Hence it appears, that as Baal, or the sun, was worshipped there, he might have been denominated Baal Bokâ, or Baal Bekâ, i. e. Baal of the valley, or the plain; which appellation the people of the country might possibly afterwards have pronounced Baalbec, or Baalbek, and applied to the city where that deity was principally adored itself. But as the word Baalbec, according to this interpretation of it, seems not sufficiently to answer to the Greek name Heliopolis, and another explication of it has been offered by the learned Schultens, different enough from that proposed here; we shall not take upon us to determine what degree of credit the foregoing etymon, especially as Baal was rather a Syrian and Phœnician than an Arabian false deity, may justly claim (1).

shameful manner. About the same time, a large part of the gardens belonging to the church in the island of Mesr was overflowed by an inundation of the Nile; which induced the Soltân, to prevent any farther damages that might happen, to command the mounds there to be repaired. On this occasion *Cyri*l found means to rebuild the church, which was become by the injuries of time little better than a heap of ruins. Not long after, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch ordained and sent to Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, a new metropolitan; which vastly disgusted many people, as the ordination of such a metropolitan properly appertained to the province of the Jacobite patriarch of Antioch. This usurpation was attended with some remarkable consequences, for an account of which we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to some of the authors cited here. The same year, the Tartars made an irruption into Irâk, and penetrated almost to the very gates of Baghdâd; but were attacked at Zancâbâd and Sûmanrây, or Sarmanrây, by Mojâbedo'ddîn Al Dowaidâr and Sbarfo'ddîn Akbâl, with the Khalif's forces, and overthrown with incredible slaughter. However, the Khalif, fearing their return, ordered a sufficient number of military engines to be planted upon the walls of Baghdâd. Nor was this precaution unnecessary, as the Moguls, before the end of the year, advanced to Kbânekîn, defeated the troops of Baghdâd sent against them, killed a multitude of them, and then returned into their own territories, loaded with spoil. A considerable part of the city of Baghdâd was, this year, laid under water by a dreadful inundation of the Tigris; during which, two vessels then on the river were lost, with fifty men on board. Chaban, the Mogul general in China, who acted against the Song, was obliged to raise the siege of Lu-chew, a strong city of Kyangnan, into which Tû-kew, a Song officer, had previously thrown himself, with a body of troops, and pursued above three miles, by the Song, before the close of the present year¹.

year 636.

THE 636th year of the Hejra, commencing August 13th, 1238, produced at least two or three remarkable events, that are not to be passed over in silence here. Al Malec Al Sâleh Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb, in the room of Al Malec Al Jawâd Yûnes Ebn Dawd, of the house of Ayûb, mounted the throne of Damascus. As Al Malec Al Jawâd, who was the grand-son of Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb, voluntarily resigned the sovereignty of Damascus to Al Malec Al Sâleh Ayûb Ebn Al Mâlec Al Câmél; he received in lieu thereof the cities of Sinjâr, Al Rakka, and 'Ana, with the territories belonging to them. The patriarch *Cyri*l was accused this year, before the Diwân, of having exacted of the bishops and priests that he had ordained, or scraped together out of the revenues of the churches and monasteries, under the pretext of paying the Soltân, no less than 9000 dinârs; upon which, he was fined first 1000 dinârs, and afterwards 500, his principal accuser being a monk, formerly his friend, who had not a little forwarded his promotion to the patriarchate of Alexandria. A fresh accusation was soon after brought against him; in which one Hamad, or Hamed, a monk, who had actually been employed by him in making a bargain with the Soltân for the Jacobite patriarchate of Alexandria, was chiefly concerned. Being found guilty of what was alleged against him, the new Soltân sent an order to the governor of Alexandria to deliver him up into the hands of Hamad; at whose instigation he was first imprisoned at Alexandria, and afterwards in Al Kâbirah. At last, however, by the intercession of friends, he was released, and admitted to an audience of the Soltân. As he brought some valuable presents with him, he was well received, and taken under that prince's protection. Nor could Hamad, who had been incarcerated at the instance of *Cyri*l's friends, obtain his liberty, before he had engaged himself to pay the sum of 4800 dinârs. The war between the Moguls and the Song in China was carried on at this time with various success. In Hû-quang, Meng-kong, the Song general, during the former part of the year, every-where worsted the Moguls, and retook Syang-yang. After which, the Song, taking advantage of Kotovan's retreat out of Se-chwen, repossessed themselves of Ching-tû-fû, the capital of that province, and assembled there a large body of troops. Tabay Mongu, commander in chief of the Moguls, hereupon re-entered Se-chwen, defeated in a pitched battle the army of the Song near Ching-tû-fû, seized that metropolis, and advanced towards the frontiers of Hû-quang, in the latter part of the year that we are now upon².

the year 637.

THE following year, being the 637th of the Hejra, beginning August 3d, 1239, the Moguls seemed to meditate an irruption into the Belâd Al Rûm; but were hindered from carrying their design into execution by a body of troops, which Al Soltân Gayâtho'ddîn had sent into Armenia, to observe their motions. Al Malec Al Sâleh Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb, having settled himself upon the throne of Damascus, marched with an army into Egypt, to take upon himself the government of that kingdom. Soon after his departure, Al Malec Al Sâleh Ismael, the Sâheb

- a of Baalbec, and Al Malec Al Mojâbed Shairacûb, the Sâheb of Hems, advanced with their united forces to Damascus, laid siege to that capital, and forced it to surrender to them. When the news of this unexpected event reached the ears of Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddin Ayûb, he was at some distance from his army, then incamped in Gaur. However, he soon put himself at the head of his troops; took Al Malec Al Nâser Dawd, the Sâheb of Al Carac, prisoner; and afterwards released him, on condition that he should march with him to Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, in order to reduce that city, and demolish the new fortifications raised there by the Franks. They had no sooner occupied Al Kuds, than they concluded a treaty of alliance, in the temple of Affakbra; by the principal article of which, Al Malec Al Nâser Dawd had assigned him the Belâd Al Sharkia and Damascus, and Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddin Ayûb the kingdom of Egypt. They then moved together, at the head of the combined army of Damascus and Al Carac, towards the frontiers of Egypt; and, according to Dr. Hunt's copy of Ebn Shohnab, received advice, on their march, that Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr had been seized by his own servants, and, as other writers seem to intimate, been by them put to death. Upon which, they pursued their march with the utmost expedition, and in a short time entered Egypt. Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddin Ayûb possessed himself of Kal'at Al Jebel, or the castle of the mountain, and was received every-where by the Egyptians with all possible demonstrations of joy. The same year, if we may depend upon some of the Egyptian authors, fresh complaints were brought against the patriarch Cyri; who, at last, however, by agreeing to sign and subscribe certain regulations, or necessary heads of reformation, drawn up by fourteen bishops, and proposed by them to him in the church of Haret Zoûilet at Mesr, restored for the present some repose to the Jacobite church. But being afterwards accused of simony and other heinous crimes by Al Makin, an Alexandrian priest, surnamed Ebn Albiba, who had formerly been one of his most intimate friends, and collected in the maritime tract his simoniacal exactions, but by his obstinacy and avarice was now alienated from him; and this accusation being supported by the evidence of eleven bishops, which was exceeding strong against him; the principal Emîr, or Wazîr, ordered him to be taken again into custody. However, having subscribed an instrument, for a particular account of which we must refer our readers to some of the writers cited here, containing a Jacobite confession of faith, or a summary of the Jacobite doctrines, in opposition to those of other sects, an express declaration against the council of Chalcedon, an explicit condemnation of simony in every shape, besides other material points, and promised to regulate according to it his future conduct, he was immediately discharged. At this time civil dissensions reigning amongst the Moslems in Egypt, the principal Emîrs being imbroiled amongst themselves, the affairs of the Christians there were in a very bad situation. They were insulted by the populace on all occasions, especially if they appeared in public without those infamous marks of distinction which they had formerly been obliged to wear, but were excused from carrying them through the whole mild reign of Al Malec Al Cîmel. Nor were they only insulted, but likewise beaten, and used with uncommon cruelty; which induced some of them, in order to avoid such barbarous treatment, to renounce the Christian faith. The Moslems also, this very year, plundered the Jacobite church of Al Moal-laka; part of one of the walls of which, without the least appearance of truth, they asserted to belong to a neighbouring mosque. Amongst the principal events of the present year, Ebn Shohnab ranks the death of Al Malec Al Mojâbed Shairacûb, the Sâheb of Hems, and that of Nâsero'ddin Al Mansûr Artak, or Artok, Ebn Aylgâzi, of the house of Artok, the Sâheb of Mâredîn. The former of those princes was succeeded by Al Mansûr Ibrahim, his son; and the latter, who ruled Mâredîn after his brother Lûlû Arslân, by Artak Ebn Al Malec Al Sa'id Nojmo'ddin Gâzi, who died in 653. After him his son Shamso'ddin Dawd reigned seven years, and some months; and then his brother Al Mansûr Nojmo'ddin Gâzi, who swayed the scepter to the day of his death. We must not forget to observe, that Meng-kong, general of the Song, gained great honour by the reduction of Quey-chew, and obtained many other very considerable advantages over the Moguls, on the side of China, in 637¹.

THE next year, being the 638th of the Hejra, which commenced July 23d, 1240, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch was accused of appropriating to himself 3,000 dinârs, that belonged to the Soltân; upon which the Wazîr, or Emîr, before whom he appeared, set upon him and his relations a fine of 1,500 dinârs. The bishop of Sendasa, having been guilty of fornication, was excommunicated by the patriarch; and having afterwards entertained in his house a common prostitute, who was a Moslem, he found himself obliged, in order to save his life, to turn Mohammedan. The same year, according to Ebn Shohnab, Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael, the Sâheb of Damascus, to the great regret of the Moslems, delivered up Safad and Al Shakîf to the Franks, lest those places should fall into his nephew Al Malec Al Sâleb

Avûb's hands. Nor was it long before a general peace was concluded, after some slight a skirmishes and velitations, between the Moslems and the Franks. By one article of this treaty, Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, Betblehem, 'Askalân, with their respective territories, Beit Gabriel, Gaza, without the districts appertaining to them, Tabariya, or Tiberias, Majdel Yûsâ, Al Ramla, Carwacab, Tyre, Tebnîn, and all the other towns and fortresses seated in the maritime part of Syria, were ceded by the former to the latter. The prisoners on both sides, by another article of the same treaty, were to be released; and the Franks in the citadel of Al Kâbirah, by a third article, had the church of St. Mercury assigned them by the Soltân for an hospital. This was an exceeding great mortification to the Jacobites there; who were rendered incapable of performing divine service in the church of Moallaka, by the daily insults of the Mohammedans, b and the other churches were either demolished, or not so much as formerly under the patriarch's jurisdiction. This year, a Turkmân impostor, named Bâbâ, who pretended to act the prophet, appeared at Amâsiâ, in Natolia; and, by his wonderful feats, seduced a multitude of people of the tribe of Al Gâga there. He had a disciple called Isbak, whom he sent in a doctor's gown through the other parts of Natolia, or the Belâd Al Rûm, to invite the Turkmâns to join him. Isbak accordingly, coming into the territory of Someisât, published his commission, and prevailed on so many, especially amongst the Turkmâns, to embrace his master's sect, that he had at last 6000 horse at his heels, besides a considerable body of foot. With these Bâbâ and his disciples made open war on all who would not cry out with them, There is no God but God, Bâbâ is the apostle of God; and put a vast number of the inhabitants of Hisn Al Mansûr, Cûkbtîn, Carcar, Someisât, and the country about Malatiya, c who refused to follow them, both Moslems and Christians, to the sword. They also defeated the troops sent to oppose them, and obstruct their march to Amâsiâ; but were at length overthrown by a body of Franks, in the pay of the Sâheb of Al Rûm, when that prince's Moslem forces durst not engage them. The action was so bloody, that they were all killed upon the spot, except the two doctors, Bâbâ and Isbak, themselves; who, being taken prisoners by the Franks, had their heads struck off by the executioner, after they had ravaged and pillaged a very considerable part of the Belâd Al Rûm. About this time, according to Dr. Hunt's copy of Ebn Shohnab, Altasbîb 'Azzo'ddin Abd'alazîz Ebn Al Salâm was made the supreme judge, or chancellor, of Egypt; and Al Sheikh Jamâlo'ddin (or Jamâlo'ddin) Abu'l Amrû Ebn Al Hâjeb appointed, by Al Malec Al Nâser Dawd, the Sâheb of that city, commander in chief d of the forces of Al Carac. It may not be amiss to remark, that Oktay Khân, emperor of the Moguls, put a period to his days by a debauch, if we may depend upon the Chinese historians, either this or the following year ^m.

What happened, in some of the Moslem territories, the following year.

In the 639th year of the Hejra, which began July 12th, 1241, Jarmâgûn Nowayn penetrated into the Greater Armenia, as far as Arzen Al Rûm, the Arzerum, or Erzerum, of the moderns, laid siege to that city, and took it. The Moguls behaved with their usual barbarity on this occasion; putting Senân, the Sub-Basba, with many of the inhabitants, to the sword, carrying away their children into captivity, and ravaging all the adjacent tract. This year, as we are informed by Ebn Shohnab, died Al Sheikh Al 'Alîmah Kemâlo'ddin Musa Ebn Yûnes Ebn Mohammed Ebn Malec, a celebrated Moslem doctor; who first professed the principles of Al Shâfeî, and afterwards those laid down by the founders of the other orthodox sects, all which he refuted by turns. Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab seems, however, to intimate, that at the time of his death he was most closely attached to the tenets of Al Shâfeî. He applied himself to the mathematics, and wrote a commentary upon the books of Euclid and Ptolemy, particularly the Almagest. He attained to some knowledge of the Jewish and Christian doctrines, contained in the scriptures of the Old and New Testament. In fine, he was a prodigy of learning; for which reason he was honoured with the title, or appellation, of Al Sheikh Al 'Alîmah, that is, the doctor of doctors, as justly due to his superior merit. His chief instructors, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shohnab, were Sibûiyah, Al Sheikh Albîro'ddin Al Abhari, and Al Sheikh Takio'ddin Othmân Ebn Abd'alrahmân, generally known by the surname of Ebn Al Salâh. Al Kâdi Shamsô'ddin Ebn Khalecân sometimes likewise read to him the Almagest, if in this point that author may be depended upon ⁿ.

The Moguls make an irruption into the Belâd Al Rûm, and grant the Sâheb of that country a peace.

THE 640th year of the Hejra, commencing July 1st, 1242, produced several remarkable events; the most memorable of which, taken notice of by the Arab writers, we shall beg leave just to touch upon. The Moguls made an irruption into the Belâd Al Rûm, put Soltân Gayâtbo'ddin to flight, took Sîwâs, or Seiwâs, and Kaisariya, and seemed to indicate an intention to advance to Malatiya. This struck Rashîdo'ddin Al Khawaini, the Emîr of the place, with such terror, that he fled with the utmost precipitation to Aleppo, and was followed

- a by as many of the principal inhabitants of Malatiya as could conveniently retire. Amongst others the father of Abu'l Faraj having made the proper dispositions for his departure, and endeavouring to put the best of his moveables and effects upon the back of a mule appointed for that purpose; the beast ran away, and could not be brought back before a rumour was spread over all the city, that certain young men, posted at the gates, pillaged all those that went out of the town. Upon which, the father of Abu'l Faraj, who was himself then there, had a conference with Dionysius, the metropolitan of Malatiya; who having convoked the leading men both of the Moslems and the Christians, in the great church, to deliberate upon the present critical situation of affairs, they all unanimously bound themselves by mutual oaths to be true to one another, to obey the orders of the metropolitan in every thing relative either to
- b a pacification with the Tartars or the defence of the place, and to post guards upon the walls to prevent evil-minded people from committing any disorders. But the alarm was soon over, as the Moguls, instead of marching to Malatiya, took the route of Arzancân, carried that city by assault, and forced Soltân Gayâtho'ddin to sue for peace; which they granted him, on condition that he should annually pay a certain tribute then imposed upon him. But for a particular and circumstantial account of this expedition, and the peace consequent thereupon, we must refer our readers to a subsequent part of this work, to which it will more properly belong.

THE same year, died Al Mostanser Bi'llah Abu Jaafar Al Mansûr, the Khalif of Baghdâd, after he had almost completed the seventeenth year of his reign. He was prudent, just, munificent, an encourager of learned (O) men, and distributed vast sums of money amongst the poor. A large number of mosques, schools, and hospitals, in his dominions, were fallen down;

(O) The most celebrated learned men, in the Moslem territories, during the Khalifat of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, seem to have been the following.

1. Hafûn, a Christian physician, and a native of Al Robâ, or Edeffa, who excelled both in the theory and practice of physic. He was highly esteemed by his patients, as his prescriptions generally met with the desired success. Hafûn was a very considerable traveller, and gave an exceeding good account of the regions he had traversed. He served in quality of physician Saifo'ddin, Akhtiyâro'ddin Hasan, and others of the principal officers of Kilij Arslân's court. As these recovered their health under his care, and Saifo'ddin was a person of great distinction, being Kilij Arslân's master of the horse; he acquired a high reputation in the Belâd Al Rûm. From thence he went to Diyâr Beer, where he attended in the same capacity the families of Shâh Armen and Al Hazârdinârî; as he did afterwards the princes of the house of Ayûb, settled in those parts. Being returned to Al Robâ, he was informed, that Togrol, an eunuch, with whom he had been acquainted in the family of Akhtiyâro'ddin Hasan, was the prime minister at Aleppo; upon which, he immediately repaired to that city. But, being a Christian, he was very coldly received by him. This induced him to think of retiring from thence; which before he could do, he was attacked, and carried off, by a fever, attended by a diarrhœa and dysentery, that affected his liver, in the year of the Hejra 625. He was buried in the church of the Jacobites, at Aleppo; which seems to indicate, that, in his life-time, he had professed the tenets of that sect.

2. Yakûb Ebn Saklân, a Christian physician, born at Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, who acquired much experience in the hospital there; which enabled him, tho' no great scholar, to practise with good success, when he was appointed physician in ordinary to Al Malec Al Moadhdhem Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel Ebn Ayûb. He went with that prince to Damascus, and was loaded by him there with riches and honours. He was so afflicted with the gout, that he could neither stir nor move; insomuch that when Al Malec Al Moadhdhem wanted his assistance, he was carried in a couch, or litter, to him. He studied philosophy under Theodorus, a philosopher of Antioch; was surnamed Al Makdesfi, as being a native of Jerusalem, or Beit Al Makdes; and died of the terrible distemper above-mentioned, soon after his patron and benefactor Al Moadhdhem, in the year of the Hejra 626.

3. Abu Sâlem, a Christian, of the Jacobite persuasion, born at Malatiya, and generally called Ebn Carâlâ, or Ebn
MOD. HIST. VOL. II.

Carâyâ, who was physician in ordinary to 'Alâo'ddin Kaykobâd, the Sâheb of Al Rûm. That prince, for some time had such an exceeding great value for him, that he could not be an hour without him. But, in the year 636, when 'Alâo'ddin marched from Malatiya to Khartabert, in order to possess himself of that place, Abu Sâlem staid behind, and did not appear in the retinue of the Soltân. This so incensed 'Alâo'ddin, who then encamped near the Euphrates, that he commanded the officer presiding over the fleet of transports attending him, not to give Abu Sâlem a passage over the river, unless he came up with them early the next morning. The doctor not appearing till noon, he was not permitted to pass the Euphrates; which so chagrined him, as he plainly saw that he had irrecoverably lost the Soltân's favour, that he returned to Malatiya, and poisoned himself there. He was not so famed for his skill in physic, as for the fluency and elegance with which he spoke the Rûmean (Greek) tongue, and his knowledge in antient history, according to Abu'l Faraj.

4. Shime'ûn Al Khartaberti, or Simcon of Khartabert, another physician, who was not very eminent for his skill in his profession; but esteemed as a religious good man, much addicted to fasting and prayer. He had a son, admired by all for the beautiful Arabic character he wrote, for his fine parts, and for his studious disposition, who died in his youth; which so grievously afflicted his father, that it probably shortened his days, though the year in which his death happened has not been pointed out to us by Abu'l Faraj.

5. At this time flourished a great number of Al Imâm Fakhr'o'ddin Al Râzi's scholars, very famous men, and the authors of many excellent books, both in logic and philosophy: such were Zino'ddin Al Casbi and Kotbo'ddin Al Mesri, in Khorasân; Afdalo'ddin Al Kho-wanji, in Egypt; Shams'o'ddin Al Khozrawshâi, at Damascus; Atliro'ddin Al Ebhari, in Al Rûm; and Tâjo'ddin Al Armûi and Serâjo'ddin Al Armûi, at Koniya. Al Najib, an Egyptian monk, settled at Damascus, relates, that Shams'o'ddin Al Khozrawshâi was frequently visited by Al Malec Al Nâser Dawd Ebn Al Malec Al Moadhdhem Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adl Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Al Carac; who treated him as his equal, and read Ebn Sînâ's book, intituled, 'Ayûn al Hecmat, with him.

6. Kemâlo'ddin Ismael Ebn Kemâlo'ddin Mohammed Abd'alrazzak Al Esfahâni, a Persian poet of a good family in Esfahân, who both lived and died in the Khalifat of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, and consequently merits our attention in this place. His brother Mûyno'ddin Abd'alkârim applied himself to jurisprudence, whilst he gave himself up intirely to the Persian poetry; in down; all which he caused to be repaired, at his own expence. Adjoining to his college, of which we have spoken above, he had a delightful garden; in which, according to Abu'l Faraj, he used daily to divert himself. To what has been already observed of his liberality we may add, from the author of the Tarikh Al Abbās, the following remarkable story. This Khalif visiting one day his treasures, with a particular friend, found a cistern full of gold and silver; upon which he said immediately, to the person then with him, "Would to God I could live long enough to spend all this money." The other, hearing these words, presently fell a laughing; of which when the Khalif asked him the reason, he answered in terms to this effect. "I remember, Sir, that accompanying the Khalif Al Nāser, your grandfather, to the same place, this cistern wanted two fadoms, or twelve feet, of being full; which Al Nāser having perceived, he said, Would to God I could live to fill this. 'Tis this diversity of sentiments, Sir, that has excited the laughter in me which has just now escaped me; when I consider that Al Nāser thought of nothing but filling it, and you of nothing but emptying it." This Khalif caused his face, or effigies, to be imprest on some of his coins (P), which was not suffered to be done by the earlier Khalifs. Ebn Shohnab relates, that he lived a pious and good life, and mentions his college erected on the eastern bank of the Tigris, as a monument of his excellent disposition ^P.

which he so excelled, that he justly acquired the title of Malec Al Shóarra, or king of the poets of his time. The grand personages of the house of Sáed so loaded him with honours, and distinguished him in such a manner, that this brought upon him the envy of his fellow-citizens; who treated him afterwards so extremely ill, that he resolved to leave them, and abandon his native country. This he did, with many imprecations, which he put into verse, that had soon after the desired effect. The sense of these verses may be expressed in the following terms. "O LORD, who art the master of the seven planets, that shed their influences on the births of princes, and communicate to them such inclinations as you please; give to this people a king cruel and bloody, who may make the whole tract from their city to the desert a frightful solitude, who may cause a torrent of its citizens blood to flow over the walls, and who may finally multiply its inhabitants in a frightful manner, by cutting every one of them to pieces." The desolation of the city of Esfabân soon followed this prognostic. For the Tartar army, sent to besiege Esfabân by Oktay Khân, reduced it to such a condition, as excited the compassion of even that very person who had wished it so much ill. In truth, this poet found himself more than fully revenged by the barbarity of the Moguls, and was himself obliged to deplore the ruin of his native country; which he did, in verses to the following effect. "Not a single person is to be met with in this poor city, to bewail either his own misery or the public calamity. A few days ago there were an hundred persons to lament one that was dead, but to-day there is no one left to bemoan the death of an hundred of his friends." Nevertheless Kemálo'ddin was himself involved in the common ruin, owing to the horrible tempest raised by the Tartars. For having retired, in the habit of a Derwîsh, to an hermitage, at a small distance from the city; several of the inhabitants saved as much as they could of their money and effects from the hands of the Tartars, and brought them to him there. Which was no sooner done, than he threw them into a dry well, that they might the more easily escape the sight of the Tartars, who over-ran the country. But nothing is concealed from the eyes of Providence, that governs the whole world and every part of it. A Tartar horseman letting fly an arrow at a bird, that perched on the top of the cell; the ivory ring, which archers make use of in bending their bows, fell out of his hand, and rolled to the mouth of the well where the treasure above-mentioned was deposited. This being discovered by the Tartars, who on the foregoing occasion thoroughly examined the well; they could not forbear supposing, that he who had concealed so considerable a sum of money there, might likewise have other large sums in different places, and therefore put him to the rack, to force him to declare where the remainder of his treasure was laid. Kemálo'ddin, however, who had as much of the philosopher in him as the poet, bore the tortures he then underwent with an amazing constancy. He has also left us a fine example of his virtue, and a great motive of consolation for those struggling with afflictions, in the verses which he composed on this subject; the sense whereof may be deemed equivalent, or at least nearly so, to that contained in the following terms. "My heart is pierced with grief whilst my body suffers. But such is the condition with which we are to pass through life. In effect, all these afflictions, considered in the presence of God, are only the sport of his Providence. I take care, therefore, not to complain of my unhappy fate; since what I suffer now may possibly be nothing more than such an instance of God's kindness to me, as he frequently vouchsafes his most faithful servants." Kemálo'ddin did not long survive the ruin of his country; as he died in the very same year, that is, in the year of the Hejra 635. He left behind him a Diwân, or collection, of poems, in the Persian tongue. That which he wrote upon Soltán Jalálo'ddin's return to his dominions, after the retreat of Jenghîz Khân, is much esteemed. He was also the author of an allegorical poem upon horses, according to some of the writers here referred to; the sense of which is so obscure, that it could not be penetrated either by Selmân, or any of the other poets who were his contemporaries (1).

- a THE same day that Al Mostanser Bi'llah expired, his son Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah, called Al Mosta'sem Mosta'dhem and Mostazem by M. D'Herbelot, was inaugurated at Baghdád. He was ^{Eliah is sá-luted Khalif.} attached to his pleasures, fond of birds, and intirely under the dominion of women. He was also deficient in point of judgment, had little firmness of mind, and altogether neglected the affairs of government. When he was told, that he ought either to pacify the Tartars, by submitting to them, or to meet them with an army in Khorasán, and not suffer them to make themselves masters of the province of Irák; he replied, "Baghdád is sufficient for me; the Tartars will not envy me that city with its district, if I cede to them all the other provinces, nor will they attack me there, as it is my residence." By such chimerical notions as these, infused into him by noxious persons, says Abu'l Faraj, did he impose upon himself, till those dreadful misfortunes befel him which he never so much as dreamed of. This Khalif is reckoned the 37th of those of the house of Al Abbás, tho' he was only the 24th or 25th in a lineal descent from the founder of that house. For several collateral members of the family of Al Abbás enjoyed the Khalifat. As for Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah, he was looked upon as the only lawful Khalif and Imám, and the sole sovereign pontif of the Moslems. For though some princes in the west, that is to say, in Africa and Spain, had assumed the title of Khalif, yet this was done only with regard to their own immediate subjects. The whole body of the eastern Moslems, as well as those of Egypt, acknowledged him alone for the rightful successor of Mohammed. He is said to have been the richest, the most powerful, the most respected, and at the same time the most unfortunate prince of his race.
- c THE same year, died at Aleppo Saifa Khâtún, the daughter of Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayúb, born in 581; who had been espoused to Al Malec Al Dháher, the Sáheb of Aleppo, in 609, and directed the whole system of affairs there for several years. She was ^{Other eminent persons die this year.} buried in the castle of that capital. Cyril, the Jacobite Alexandrian patriarch, likewise departed this life, the present year. Al Makrízi has handed down to future ages a very indifferent character of him, on account of his avarice and simoniacal extortions; though he praises him for his skill in theological matters; which commendation M. Renaudot says he did not deserve. The patriarch of the Melchites, and the Æchmalotarcha (Q) of the Jews in Egypt, also paid the common tribute to nature, before the close of this year. The former of these died so poor, that he did not leave money enough behind him to defray the expence of his funeral.
- d After the death of the latter, two competitors aspired at the dignity he enjoyed; one of whom, for mounting a pulpit in a synagogue on the Jewish sabbath, as was pretended, without a license from the Soltán, was fined 1000 dinárs.

THE following year, being the 641st of the Hejra, beginning June 21st, 1243, Yasáwer ^{The most memorabe transactions of the year 641,} Nowayn, with a detachment of the Mogul troops, made an incursion into Syria, or Al Shám, and advanced as far as a place called Hailán, almost to the very gates of Aleppo; but, his horses not being shod in a proper manner for that country, he was obliged to retire. Taking

(Q) The Æchmalotarcha, called Rosh Jalut by the Jews, and Ras Al Jalut by the Arabs, that is, the head, or prince, of the captivity, had formerly much the same power amongst the Jews, as the Jacobite and Melchite patriarchs had amongst the Christians over whom they presided. This imaginary prince, of whom the Jews so ridiculously boasted, as though by the existence of such a magistrate the sceptre still remained in Judah, and a lawgiver between his feet, was elected by the principal men amongst the Jews and the people together, as the Jacobite and Melchite patriarchs were by the clergy and the chief of the laity; though the election of the Æchmalotarcha was confirmed by the rulers of the synagogues and the Sanhedrim, and afterwards by the Moslem princes to whom the Jews were subject. They had one Æchmalotarcha at Baghdád, another in Persia, or Fárs, another in Khorasán, and another in Egypt. The last of these, who resided at Alexandria, was denominated, according to some authors, Alabarcha, but the term Æchmalotarcha is likewise applied to him by M. Renaudot. Such an officer as this the Jews had over them in England under the first Norman kings, who was licensed by them for this post by the name of Episcopus Judæorum. To the Æchmalotarcha the Jews submitted of their own accord to be judged and governed by the rules and precepts of their own law; and consequently, as he had no power of coercion, or authority of jurisdiction, but what he had by the voluntary submission of the Jews, nothing can be more absurd than to pretend, as some of them do, that in this magistrate is still preserved both the sceptre and the shadow of authority these pretended princes enjoyed, the ceremony of their inauguration, and the manner of introducing them at court, whilst the Khalif of the house of Al Abbás reigned at Baghdád; these points have been all amply treated by R. Abraham Salmanticensis, in his piece intituled, Sefer Juchasin. For a farther account of the other particulars relating to them, our learned readers may, at their leisure, consult the other authors referred to here (1).

then the route of Malatiya, as he passed by that city, he ravaged all the district appertaining a to it, and pillaged the inhabitants in a dreadful manner. His troops did not only consume all the corn and fruits of the earth, but likewise stript all the people they met with, not excepting the women themselves, of every thing valuable belonging to them. They did not even spare the churches in that tract; but carried away the gold and silver vessels, set apart for sacred uses, they found therein. Yasîwer Nowayn himself, being at this time ill of a dysentery, was obliged to apply to the father of Abu'l Faraj, a physician of Malatiya, for his assistance; and, for that purpose, took him with him to Kbartabert. Having cured him, that physician returned to Malatiya; but soon after settled, with his family, at Antioch. The retreat of the Tartars was followed by a famine and a plague, which swept away an infinite number of people; insomuch that several were forced to sell their children for small b pieces of bread. This year, according to Ebn Shohnah, the Tartars likewise over-ran a great part of the Belâd Al Rûm, possessed themselves of Akblât and Aimed, and obliged Soltân Gayâthbo'ddin Al Seljûki to acknowledge himself one of the vassals of their Khân. About the same time, if that writer may be depended upon, Al Malec Al Sâleh Ismael, the Sâheb of Damascus, ceded Beit Al Makdes, or Jerusalem, Askalâm, or 'Askelon, and Tabariya, or Tiberias, to the Franks, in order to procure their assistance against the Sâheb of Egypt; though that cession seems to have been made, if other authors referred to above merit any regard, three years before. It may not be improper to remark here, that the patriarch Cyri'l's enemies, who had pursued him with so much violence, whilst alive, did not spare him after his death. Some of them signified to the Soltân, that he had amassed vast sums of money in an illicit manner, c besides a very large quantity of rich furniture, that ought to be confiscated; upon which, Al Malec Al Sâleh Ayûb, then the Sâheb, or Soltân, of Egypt, ordered Cyri'l's house, or palace, to be sealed up, and afterwards seized upon all the money, books, church-plate, and every thing valuable, whether the property of the patriarch, or belonging to the churches over which he presided, they found therein. His two nephews were sent to prison, and put to the torture, to force them to discover where the rest of his treasure was hid. Two purses, one containing 1000 dinârs in gold, and the other the same sum in silver, in consequence of that discovery, were dug up, and carried to the Soltân; as were also many costly garments, more plate, some tapestry of great price, all which were publicly sold, and the money applied to the Soltân's use, insomuch that there scarce remained of this patriarch's ill-acquired substance enough to bury him. Cyri'l Ebn Laklak, d represented as such a monster of iniquity both by the Christian and Moslem writers of Egypt, sat in the Jacobite patriarchal see of Alexandria something above seven years.

THE next year, being the 642d of the Hejra, which commenced June 9th, 1244, the Tartars invaded the territory of Baghdâd, but were not able to form the siege of that capital. The Rûmean troops before Tarsus received the news of Soltân Gayâthbo'ddin's death, when that city was upon the point of surrendering to them; which obliged them, with some precipitation, to retire. But the roads being rendered so slippery by the continual rains, which for some time had fallen, that the horses of their cavalry could not stand on their feet; several of them, together with their baggage were picked up by a body of Armenian foot that harraressed them in their retreat. The same year, the Khowârazmians, having assembled in a e body, passed the Euphrates, in order to enter into the service of Al Malec Al Sâleh Nojmo'ddin Ayûb, the Sâheb of Egypt. In their march, through Hems and Baalbec, to Al Kuds, they ravaged the country thro' which they moved in a dreadful manner, and put a vast number of people to the sword. Being arrived at Jerusalem, or Al Kuds, they burnt a great multitude of Christians in the church of the resurrection; after which, they continued their route to Gaza, where they found themselves obliged to halt, Al Malec Al Sâleh Nojmo'ddin Ayûb having forbidden them to approach nearer to the frontiers of Egypt. In the mean time, Al Malec Al Sâleh Ismael, the Sâheb of Damascus, and Al Malec Al Mansûr, the Sâheb of Hems, having formed a design to invade Egypt, and engaged the Franks to assist them with all their forces, by promising to cede to them the maritime districts of f Al Mâ and Al Magreb, if their enterprize was attended with success; Al Malec Al Mansûr, who was appointed to command the combined army in this expedition, whilst Al Malec Al Sâleh Ismael staid at Damascus, advanced to 'Accâ, where he was received with open arms. Having been joined by the Knights Templars and Hospitalers, he marched into the neighbourhood of Gaza, where the Egyptians and Khowârazmians waited for him. The two armies had not long faced each other, before a general action ensued; in which the Syrians, with their allies, were put to flight. However, the Knights Templars and Hospitalers rallied, and stood their ground with the utmost firmness, till they were all either killed or taken prisoners. The Egyptians and Khowârazmians possessed themselves of the enemy's tents,

a baggage, and military chest. As for Al Malec Al Mansûr himself, he escaped, with a few of his shattered troops, to Damascus; but Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael, being probably irritated at his defeat, did not come out to meet him, as he had heretofore usually done. This Al Malec Al Mansûr took extremely ill, and resolved to retire immediately to Hems; but was persuaded by his friends to remain at Damascus, and set on foot a private negotiation with the Sâheb of Egypt. After which, the latter of those princes sent a numerous army, under the conduct of Maïno'ddîn, the generalissimo of his forces, whom he commanded to represent him, and to sit at the head of the Somât, or Orders, according to the custom of the eastern kings, to form the siege of Damascus. Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Egypt, appointed Al Tawâshi Rashîdo'ddîn Ebn Sheikh, the eunuch, and master of his household, to wait on Maïno'ddîn at the Somât, and attend him in this expedition. The Egyptian forces having sat down before Damascus, Al Malec Al Mansûr, the Sâheb of Hems, in resentment of the affront that had been offered him by Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael, entertained thoughts of letting in the Khowârazmians at the eastern gate, and betraying the city to them; but he afterwards laid aside that design, for fear of the Moslems amongst the Khowârazmian troops. Nevertheless, that capital being attacked with the utmost fury, it was at last unanimously agreed to deliver it up into Maïno'ddîn's hands, on condition that the garrison and inhabitants should be permitted to retire in safety with their effects; and that Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael should have his former possessions restored to him, viz. Baalbec and Bosra, with their respective districts, and the country of Al Sawâd, containing Hems, Al Badam, and Al Rahaba upon the Euphrates. The capitulation being signed, Maïno'ddîn took possession of Damascus, the 12th of the former Jomâda, 643, but would not suffer the Khowârazmians to enter the town; and Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael departed for Baalbec, as Al Malec Al Mansûr did for Hems. Every thing being thus settled, Maïno'ddîn, who presided over the territories and fortresses of Damascus, with the character of an excellent governor, assigned the Khowârazmians and their Emîrs, for the service they had done the Sâheb of Egypt, the most considerable part of Syria and the maritime coast. Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Egypt, having been informed of Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael's retreat; he wrote to Shahâbo'ddîn Rashîd Al Cabîr, and the Egyptian Emîrs, greatly blaming them for permitting him to retire to Baalbec. In the letter, he said, "Maïno'ddîn had taken an oath to him, but you never took any; you ought, therefore, to have laid hold of him, and stopped him." Maïno'ddîn having, by Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddîn Ayûb's express command, sent Al Hijâwi, and Amin Al Dawla Al Sâmari, the Sâheb of Baalbec's Wazîr, under a strong escorte to Egypt; that prince caused them to be thrown into irons, and confined in Kal'at Al Jebal, or the castle of the mountain, as we learn both from Ebn Shohnah and Al Makîn. The former of those writers seems farther to intimate, that the Egyptian and Khowârazmian forces also reduced Baalbec, seized Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael's children, and treated them in the same manner they did his Wazîr. But as this article has been wholly omitted by Al Makîn, who lived at the very time when the transaction therein mentioned is said to have happened, we shall not pretend to ascertain the degree of credit it may deserve. This year, Nâsero'ddîn Ebn Nâfedh, Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah's Wazîr, who had served his father Al Mostanser Bi'llah in the same capacity, being dead, that Khalîf gave his charge to Mowayyao'ddîn Ebn Al 'Alkami; substituting in the room of one of his most faithful servants the most perfidious of ministers, who proved the total ruin both of his master and the Khalifat. But of the base and infamous conduct of this Wazîr our readers will soon meet with a particular account. Before the close of the present year, Al Malec Al Modbaffer Takîo'ddîn Mahmûd Ebn Al Malec Al Mansûr Mohammed, grandson of Al Malec Al Modbaffer Takîo'ddîn Omar Ebn Shâhînsbâb Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Hamah, departed this life. He reigned, according to Ebn Shohnah, fifteen years, seven months, and ten days; and was forty-three years old, at the time of his death. He was a person of quick parts, uncommon bravery, and much beloved by all virtuous and learned men. He was no sooner dead, than his son Al Mansûr Mohammed Ebn Mahmûd ascended the throne. Al Malec Al Modbaffer Shahâbo'ddîn Gâzi Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb, the Sâheb of Mayyâfârakîn, likewise died, and was succeeded by his son Al Malec Al Câmel Mohammed, in 642. Al Malec Mogayâtbo'ddîn Fatabo'ddîn Omar, the son of Al Malec Al Sâleb Ayûb, the Sâheb of Egypt, also paid the common tribute to nature, in the year that we are now upon.^c

In the 643d year of the Hejra, which began May 29th, 1245, Oktay Khân, or Kâân, the emperor of the Moguls, departed this life, according to Abu'l Faraj. This event has, however, been placed either in the 638th or the 639th year of the Hejra by the Chinese historians, as we have already observed. When the Kâân found his distemper to increase upon him, he sent for his son Cayûc; who, being met on the road by a courier, as he was posting away with the utmost celerity to court, with the news of his father's death, did not proceed to Karâ- korom, then the residence of the Great Khân. In the mean time, Türâkinâ Khâtûn, Cayûc's a mother, a lady of uncommon sagacity and penetration, by the consent of Jogâtâi, and all the other members of the imperial family, caused herself to be acknowledged for regent of the empire, till the Al Kûriltâi, or grand assembly of the Mogul princes, was convoked. Soltân 'Azzo'ddin, the Sâheb of Al Rûm, gained so much time by amusing the emperor of the Moguls ambassadors with presents, money, and good words, that he avoided both coming to a rupture with that prince, and paying him homage at Karâkorom, as he was required to do, the present year ^u.

THE 644th year of the Hejra, commencing May 9th, 1246, seems not to have produced any very considerable number of remarkable events in the Moslem world. However, the Kûriltâi, or general assembly of the great lords and princes of the Mogul empire, met in it, b at Karâkorom, and unanimously recognized the authority of Cayûc, eldest son of the late emperor, as Great Khân of the Moguls. Amongst the grand personages assembled on this occasion, in the spring, the following have been mentioned by Abu'l Faraj. From Turkeştân and Mawarâ'nabr, came Al Emîr Mas'ûd Bek; from Khorasân, Al Emîr Argûn Agâ, and with him the grandees of Irâk, Al Lûr, Adherbijân, and Shirwân; from Al Rûm, or Natolia, Al Soltân Rocno'ddin; from Armenia, Al Condestabl, the brother of Al Tacfûr Hâtem; from Corjeştân, or Gorjeştân, the two Dawds, Al Cabîr and Al Sagbîr, from Syria, or Al Shâm, the brother of Al Malec Al Nâser Salâh'addin, the Sâheb of Aleppo; from Baghdâd, Fakbro'ddin, the Kâdi of Kâdis, or chancellor there; and from 'Alâo'ddin, the Sâheb of Al Almût, or Amcût, the principal lords of Kubestân. c Besides these, all the princes and leading men of the Moguls likewise then appeared. The illustrious members of this august assembly, the most numerous and brilliant that had ever met on a similar, or indeed any other, occasion, by their unanimous suffrages, pitched upon Cayûc Khân to succeed his father in the empire of the Moguls; which his great and amiable qualities, as well as his primogeniture, justly intitled him to. In consequence of which, they placed him upon the imperial throne, and paid him homage after the usual manner. As the foregoing list of the foreign princes and grandees, forming part of the Kûriltâi of the Moguls, is a clear demonstration of the prodigious extent of the empire erected by that potent nation, or at least shews what a progress they had made in the reduction of the western parts of Asia, formerly either under the dominion of the Khalîf of Baghdâd, or those Mohammedan princes who acknowledged in spirituals at least the supreme authority d of that prince, and therefore may, with sufficient propriety, claim a place in this part of our work; we thought our curious readers, who have a taste for oriental history, would not be displeased with finding an insertion of it here. It must be remembered, that Al Malec Al Mansûr Ibrahim, the son of Al Malec Al Mojâhed Shairacûb, the Sâheb of Hems, was killed, the present year, at Damascus; being then on the road to Al Kâhirah, whither he had undertaken a journey, in order to put himself under the protection of Al Malec Al Sâleb Ayûb, the Sâheb, or Soltân, of Egypt. He was carried back to Hems, and buried there; after which, Al Malec Al Asbraf Modhaffero'ddin Mûsa assumed the sovereignty of that city. For an account of the military operations of the Moguls this year, in which none of the Arab, or Moslem, princes were concerned, we must beg leave to refer our readers to a subsequent part e of this work, to which it will more properly belong ^w.

the year 645,

THE following year, being the 645th of the Hejra, beginning May 8th, 1247, the Khalîf Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah sent an ambassador to Karâkorom, perhaps in order to congratulate Cayûc Khân on his accession to the crown. Be that as it will, the Great Khân treated this minister in a very lofty manner; intermixing menaces with promises, and pretending to give counsel and advice to the Khalîf himself, though the sovereign pontiff and spiritual director of all the Moslems. As for the ambassadors that came to him from the Al Molâbedab, that is, the Impious, or the Ismaelians, commonly called Assassins, he treated them with the utmost contempt. He also appointed Nowayn Ayljîetâi to preside over the Belâd Al Rûm, Al Mawfel, Al Shâm, and Al Corj; Al Sâheb Takwîj over the vast region of Katay; Al Emîr Mas'ûd over Turkeştân and Mâwarâ'nabr; and Al Emîr Argûn Agâ over Khorasân, Irâk, Adherbijân, Shirwân, Al Lûr, Kermân, Fârs, and part of Al Hind. At the same time, he granted the government of the Belâd Al Rûm, under Nowayn Ayljîetâi, to Soltân Rocno'ddin, and commanded Soltân 'Azzo'ddin to be removed. Dawd also, commonly called Ebn Kaiz, he placed under Dawd, the Sâheb of Teflis. He farther wrote friendly letters, containing his promise of security and protection, to Al Tacfûr and Al Malec Al Nâser Salâh'addin, the Sâheb of Aleppo. Cayûc Khân likewise treated as Atâbek one Kadâk, a certain great Emîr who had been baptized, and believed in CHRIST; to whom he joined, in the same office, another Emîr, named Jinkâi: whence it came to pass, that the metropolitans, bishops, monks, and in fine the Christians of f

- a all ranks and denominations, subject to Cayûc Khân, were looked upon by the emperor himself, his mother Tûrâkinâ Khâtûn, and the whole imperial family, with a favourable eye. We are not, therefore, to be surprized, that the Franks, Russians, Syrians, Armenians, and other Christian nations, were held in such esteem at the Mogul court; nor even that the empire itself, to use the expression of Abu'l Faraj, should have become Christian, one of the Syrian forms of salutation (Barec Mor, or Mar, Bless me, Lord), being at this time in vogue both amongst the Moguls and the other nations intermixed with them. This year, the Moslems took 'Asfalîn and Tabariya, if Ebn Shohnab may be credited, by storm; and before the close of it, according to the same author, Ali Omar Ebn Mohammed Abd'allah, dignified with the title of Imâm Al Nabû, the prince of grammarians, and generally going under the name of Al Shalûbînî (R), departed this life in Spain. Al Kâdi Shamsoddin Ebn Khalecân observes, that the words, Al Shalûbînî, in the language of Andalusia, denote tanned, or sun-burnt; but Al Soltân Amâdoddin affirms, that this is by no means the true etymon, the word Shalûbîn being a derivative from Shalûbîn, or Al Shalûbîn, the name of a castle in Spain. This, as he informs us, he learned from Ebn Sa'id Al Mogrebi, or Magrebi; who, in the fifteenth volume of his great book, intituled, the history of the people of Al Mogreb, or Al Magreb, after he had mentioned Granata, or Granada, and described the castle of Shalûbîn, says, "Hence came originally Al Sheikh Abu Ali Al Shalûbînî, a grammarian of uncommon note." To which he adds, that this Sheikh, who was his master, learned grammar himself of Abu Ali Al Fârîsî, or Fâresî; of whom he has not given us, at least in that part of the above-mentioned work referred to here, any particular account*.

THE next year, being the 646th of the Hejra, which commenced April 26th, 1248, Al and of the year Malec Al Nâser, the Sâheb of Aleppo, made himself master of Hems, expelled from thence Al 646. Malec Al Ashraf Mûsa, the Sâheb of that city, and gave him in lieu thereof Tel Bâshar, or Tel Bâsher, as an addition to Rahaba and Tadmor, which he possessed before. We must not forget to remark, that Al Sheikh Jamâlo'ddin, or, Jamâlo'ddin, Abu Omar Oihmân Ebn Omar Ebn Abu Becr Ebn Yûnes, known by the name, or surname, of Ebn Hâjeb, whose father had been Hâjeb, or chamberlain, to Al Emîr 'Azzoddin Mûsac Al Sâlebi Al Cordi, died at Alexandria, about seventy-five years old, in some part of the present year†.

- d IN the 647th year of the Hejra, which began April 16th, 1249, died Tûrâkinâ Khâtûn, The most material trans- the mother of Cayûc Khân, emperor of the Moguls; as did likewise that prince himself, at a actions of the place called Komesteki, in Al Belâd Al Gorbiya, or the western part of his dominions, about five year 647, stations from Bîsh Bâleg, the 9th of the former Râbî, according to Abu'l Faraj. The Grand Khân was no sooner dead, than his wife Ogûl Gânmish dispatched a courier to Bâtû, the son of Tûshi, the eldest of the sons of Jenghîz Khân, to acquaint him with that prince's death. Bâtû was then coming to court, in order to pay a visit to Cayûc Khân; but being met by the courier at Al Akmak, a village about eight stations from the city of Kayâlik, he thought fit to halt. From thence he sent back the courier to Ogûl Gânmish, with a permission to that princess to take upon her the government of the Mogul empire, till the election of a new Khân. He also called a general diet, for that purpose; at which all the Mogul and Tartar lords, as well as the princes of the imperial family, were summoned to attend. The same year, Lewis IX. king of France, frequently called St. Lewis by the French writers, landed with a formidable army at 'Accâ; and, after he had refreshed his troops, set sail for Dimiyât, or Damiata, in Egypt, which the garrison, formed of the Banu Kenânab, abandoned at his approach. This happened on Sunday, the 23d of Safar, according to Al Makin. The news of this misfortune reached the ears of Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddin Ayûb Ebn Al Malec Al Câmel, the Sâheb of Egypt, in his camp before Hems; upon which, he immediately raised the siege of that city, and began his march for Egypt. But at Al Mansûrah he was attacked by a gangrene in his thigh; which, ending in a Isphacelus, or perfect mortification of the affected part, put a period to his days. However, his life being a little prolonged by the amputation of his thigh, the fugitives who had fled from Dimiyât appeared before him; and, after they had given an unsatisfactory account of their conduct, were ordered to be affixed to gibbets by him. Fifty-four of the Emîrs, or officers who commanded the garrison of Dimiyât, were hung up for their cowardice, with their cloaths, belts, &c. on, just as they were brought before him; and the day following, being the fourteenth of Shaabân, or rather the night of that day, he expired.

He reigned, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shobnab, nine years, eight months, and twenty days; and was about forty-four years old, at the time of his demise. He is said by the last mentioned author to have been innocent and inoffensive in his discourse, incapable of thinking intensely, and of so majestic a deportment, that none of his subjects durst speak to him but by way of answer. He had three sons, two of whom died before him. Al Malec Al Moadbdebem Tûran Shâb, his third son, was at Hish Caifâ, when his father expired. Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddin Ayûb founded the city of Sâlebiyah, for the conveniency of hunting, and also built Al Kabîb, between Mesr and Al Kâbirab. He formed his army for the most part of Mamlûks, or Turkish slaves; which was exceeding bad policy, as he was himself by descent a Curd, and proved fatal to his family. His favourite concubine Shajr Al Dor (S), a Turkish lady of uncommon sagacity, surpassing all the rest of her own sex in beauty, and all those of the other in firmness of mind and resolution, for some time concealed his death; and, by the advice of Al Emîr 'Azzo'ddin Al Turkomâni, the chief of the Turkish or Turkmân Mamlûks, then at the head of the administration, who frequently conferred with her, convened all the principal Emîrs and officers of state, obliging them, as she pretended, by the Soltân's order, to take the oath of allegiance to Al Malec Al Moadbdebem Tûran Shâb. After which, she continued to govern the kingdom of Egypt till the arrival of the new Sâleb or Soltân at Al Mansûrah, and then resigned her authority to him. Al Malec Al Moadbdebem Tûran Shâb, being thus settled upon the throne, made the necessary dispositions for driving the Franks out of Egypt; which were attended with the desired success, the following year. We must not forget to remark, that Al Nâser Dawd, the Sâleb of Al Carac, finding himself in a declining condition, retired to Aleppo, in order to solicit succours of the Sâleb of that place. He carried with him jewels, to the value of 1,000,000 dinârs; which he afterwards sent to Al Mosta'fem, the Khalîf of Baghdâd, putting them as a deposit into his hands. But the Moslem pontiff never thought fit afterwards to deliver them up to him. His eldest son Al Moadbdebem Isa, whom he left at Al Carac, being seized by his brothers Al Amjed Hasan and Al Dbâber Shâdi, who envied him; Al Amjed Hasan, the former of those princes, went to Egypt, surrendered Al Carac to Al Malec Al Sâleb Nojmo'ddin Ayûb, and, to the inexpressible joy of the Soltân, introduced an Egyptian garrison into that city, near two months before his decease. It may not be improper to observe, that Gayûc, emperor of the Moguls, departed this life, according to the Chinese history of that nation, wherein he is named Quey-yew, in the country of Hong-syang-i-eul, not far from Karâ-korom, the preceding year².

THE 648th year of the Hejra, commencing April 5th, 1250, was memorable for the defeat of the Franks, as well as for a surprizing revolution in Egypt. The king of France sent a detachment of 2000 horse towards Al Mansûrah, in order to reconnoitre the enemy; which fell in with part of the Moslem army, attacked and routed it, and afterwards entered Al Mansûrah sword in hand. Here they found Fakbro'ddâin Otbmân, commonly called Ebn Saif, the Moslem general, and one of the principal Egyptian Emîrs; whom they cut to pieces, in a very advanced age, as he was painting his beard in a bath. However, the streets of Al Mansûrah being so narrow, that they could not form therein, and the gates so small that their largest horses could not get through them; the people within annoyed them in such a manner with stones, brick-bats, and gravel, that they forced them to abandon the town. Being returned to the Christian camp, they gave the king of France a particular and distinct account of the advantage they had gained over the Moslem troops; which so animated the French monarch, that he resolved to attack the Egyptian army, not doubting but he should defeat it, if he could engage it in a plain, where all his forces would be at liberty to act. The Egyptians, having been apprized of his resolution, seemed to be afraid of him, till he had passed the Ashîmûn, or Ashmûn, a branch of the Nile, running between Al Mansûrah and Dimiyât; but then looking upon his retreat as cut off, if any misfortune should attend him, by that river, they boldly made head against him, and, after an obstinate engagement, overthrew him with very great slaughter. Of the Franks, besides those that fell upon the field of battle, many were pushed into the Ashîmûn, and drowned. As for the king of France himself, being shut up by that river, he was taken prisoner in the action, together with a considerable number of his officers and grandees. Ebn Shobnab writes,

- a that he was thrown into irons, imprisoned in a house built by Fakbro'ddin Ebn Lokmán, and committed to the custody of Al Tawáshi, one of Al Malec Al Moadbhem's attendants. Al Malec Al Moadbhem was no sooner master of his person, than he was persuaded by some of the young Mamlúks about him, of the same age with himself, to release him, and conclude a temporary peace with him, as well as the other princes of the Franks, on condition that Dimiyát should be restored to him, together with all the money and jewels the French king had in that city. In order to carry their point, on the present occasion, they insinuated to the young Soltán, "that he was in reality only a nominal prince; that Shajr Al Dor, and the Emírs in her interest, governed Egypt with an absolute sway; that the war he was engaged in with the Franks only rendered the assistance of these Emírs, who lorded it over his subjects, necessary;
- b "that it would be better for him to be in the situation of a private person, than to be the Sáheb of Egypt, and at the same time stript of all power and authority; and that if he could happily extricate himself out of the difficulties in which the war with the Franks had involved him, he might act as he pleased, as he would then have no enemies to contend with." The principal Emírs, or rather leaders of the Mamlúks, having been informed of Al Malec Al Moadbhem's conduct in this affair, which soon transpired, and thinking themselves slighted at least, if not hated by the Soltán, as in it they had not been consulted by him; they unanimously rushed in a body upon him, and, after he had been wounded by Rocno'ddin Abu'l Fatab Bibars, one of them, who was afterwards Soltán, drove him to a wooden tower in that neighbourhood, where he found himself obliged to seek for refuge. Not content with this insult, they set fire to the tower, and forced him to throw himself from thence into the Nile; where, after he had received several grievous wounds from a shower of arrows they discharged at him, he miserably perished. Ebn Shohnab relates, that Al Malec Al Moadbhem Túran Sháb, after the late battle, in which the Franks lost 30,000 men, besides a considerable sum of money, and a large quantity of very valuable effects, marched from Al Mansírah to Fáres Cár; where he incamped, threatened the body of Mamlúks his father had so highly esteemed, and met with from them the above-mentioned fate. After his death, the Mamlúk Emírs vested with the supreme authority Shajr Al Dor; upon which, the Khoiba was performed, and money coined, in her name. From the time of her elevation to the throne, according to the same author, she was generally denominated Omm Kháled; as she had a son, by Al Malec Al Sáleh Nojmo'ddin Ayúb, called
- d Kháled, who died in his tender years. Al Malec Al Moadbhem Túran Sháb, the late Sáheb of Egypt, upon his first arrival in that country, seized Mogayátbo'ddin Fatabo'ddin Omar, of the house of Ayúb, and sent him prisoner to Al Shawbec; but that prince was no sooner dispatched, than he was set at liberty. Al Shawbec and Al Carac were then likewise restored to their proper master. The Turkish Mamlúks, looking upon it as a reproach to them to be ruled by a woman, placed Al Malec Al Moezz 'Azzo'ddin Aybec Al Turkománi Al Jáshekír, their principal Emír, upon the throne of Egypt, towards the close of the former Rabí, the present year. However, some time after repenting of what they had done, and being desirous of having a Soltán of the family of Ayúb; they deposed Al Malec Al Moezz 'Azzo'ddin Aybec, as they had before done Omm Kháled, and conferred the Soltánat upon Al Malec Al Ashraf Músa Ebn Al Náser Yusef Ebn Mas'úd Ebn Al Malec Al Cámel, inaugurating him in form, the 5th of the former Jomáda. The Khalíf Al Mosta'sem having confirmed their election of him, they appointed 'Azzo'ddin Aybec his tutor, or Atábek; which post, notwithstanding his late deposition, transferred to that prince the absolute sovereignty of Egypt. Hence it comes to pass, that some writers have not considered him as deposed; but made his reign to commence on Saturday, the last day of the latter Rabí, this year. As Al Malec Al Ashraf Músa was only six years old, 'Azzo'ddin Aybec exercised the supreme power, without any fear of a competitor; married Omm Kháled, to insure to himself the continuation of that power; assigned the government of Alexandria to Fáres Aktái, one of his favourite Emírs; and ratified the treaty that Al Malec Al Moadbhem Túran Sháb had concluded with the king of France, upon that monarch's cession of Dimiyát, which
- f was occupied by the Egyptian troops the 8th of Safar, and his payment of 1,000,000 dinárs. King Lewis, having resided a little while at 'Accá, repaired the city of Cæsarea, and left some of his people as a colony there, returned home. Ebn Shohnab remarks, that he has been celebrated by a Moslem poet, named Jemálo'ddin, or Jamálo'ddin, Ebn Matrúb; several of whose verses, written in praise of this Christian monarch, have been handed down to us by that author. Lewis's brother, according to Al Makín, remained in a state of confinement with him, whilst he was incarcerated in Fakro'ddin Ebn Lokmán's house. The same historian adds, that in the aforesaid action, the Egyptians killed 10,000 of the Franks upon the spot, and took a much larger number of them prisoners; that the latter were for the most part destroyed, 300 of them being butchered and thrown every night, during a certain term, into the Nile, and others put to different kinds of death; that Dimiyát was intirely demolished, lest the Franks should in some future period of time again possess themselves of it; and that the Moslems built another town near it, which, from the newness of it they denominated Al Mansbíá, though it was called in

Abu'lfeda's days Dimiyât, and still retains that name. Omm Kbâled, or Shajr Al Dor, endeavouring to exclude her husband 'Azzo'ddîn Aybec from a share in the administration; he formed a design to destroy her, and take another wife. Of which being apprized, she resolved to be beforehand with him; and accordingly hired some of the younger Mamlûks to assassinate him. This they did with knives, in 665, as he was washing his head in a bath; though others say that they drowned him there. This so incensed the Turkish, or Mamlûk Emîrs, that they killed her, and cast her body into a ditch, where it was devoured by dogs. Whilst Egypt was thus harassed by civil dissensions, Al Malec Al Nâser Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Al Malec Al 'Azîz, the Sâheb of Aleppo, marched with a body of horse to Damascus; which opened its gates to him, at his approach. That city he entered the 8th of the latter Rabî, and made it the royal seat of his kingdom. Being invited by some of the Mamlûks to Egypt, he moved with a powerful army towards the frontiers of that region, after he had confined Al Nâser Dawd in chains at Hems, in the beginning of Sbaabân. He was attended in this expedition by ten princes of the house of Ayûb, as well as several other persons of the first distinction, and penetrated into Egypt, about the middle of Ramadân. Having advanced to Al Carâ, near Al Khashbi, in the sands; he attacked the Egyptian forces posted there, routed them, and drove them out of the field. Many of the fugitives fled with the utmost precipitation to Al Kâbirab, and Mesr; nay some of them, more terrified than the rest, even as far as Al Sa'd. But Al Malec Al Nâser was soon after deserted by a very considerable number of his Emîrs, who went over to Al Moezz 'Azzo'ddîn Aybec Al Turkomâni, and prevailed upon him to venture a second battle with that prince. Whereupon he re-assembled his scattered troops, engaged Al Malec Al Nâser again, and gave him a total defeat. In this action, which happened in the neighbourhood of Gaza, according to Abu'l Faraj, Hosâmo'ddîn Al Kaymari, Dbâao'ddîn Al Kaymari, Tâj Al Molûc, Ebn Al Moadbhem Tûran Shâb Ebn Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, Saifo'ddîn Al Hamîdi, Nûro'ddîn Al Zorzâni, and many others of Al Malec Al Sâleb's principal Emîrs, were killed upon the spot. Amongst the prisoners of note may be ranked Shams'o'ddîn Lûlû, Al Moadbhem Tûran Shâb Ebn Salâb'addîn Yusef Ebn Ayûb, his brother, Nasro'ddîn, Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael Ebn Al Malec Al 'Adel, Al Malec Al Asbraf Mûsa, who had been Sâheb of Hems, Shabâbo'ddîn Al Kaymari, and Hosâmo'ddîn Torantâi Al 'Azîzi, besides a large number of the Azîzite Emîrs, who were volunteers. Al Moezz, being returned to the palace, was informed, that Al Emîr Saifo'ddîn Al Kaymari, then a prisoner in the castle, had caused Al Malec Al Nâser to be publicly prayed for, on a Friday, in Kal'at Al Jebal; and that several persons of distinction, confined there with him, had been privy to it. Whereupon Al Moezz ordered Nâsero'ddîn Ismael Yagmûr, one of the ministers of Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael, and Amîn Al Dawla Al Sâmari (T), his Wazîr, two of them, to be hung up before the gates of Kal'at Al Jebal, or the castle of the mountain, for being concerned in advising the Khotba. He also intended, after his triumphant entry into Al Kâbirab, that the same punishment should have been inflicted upon the ringleader Saifo'ddîn Al Kaymari; but changing his resolution, he thought fit to respite him, and sent him into Syria. Both Dr. Hunt's and the two Bodleian manuscripts of Ebn Shohnab plainly intimate, that the last engagement between the Mamlûks and the Syrians happened at Al 'Abbâsiâ, and not at Gaza, in opposition to Abu'l Faraj. Those manuscripts likewise insinuate, that Al Malec Al Nâser's name was mentioned in the Khotba at Mesr, as well as at Kal'at Al Jebal; the Khotba having not been settled at Al Kâbira, before Al Moezz had driven the Syrians out of Egypt. From them we also learn, that Al Moezz 'Azzo'ddîn Aybec, the first Mamlûk Sâheb of Egypt, who met with his tragical exit in the year of the Hejra 655, commanded Shams'o'ddîn Lûlû, and Dbâao'ddîn Al Kaymari, called by them Dbâao'ddîn Ebn Kaymari, to be put to death before his face; and cut off Al Malec Al Sâleb Ismael himself, some time after the execution of his Wazîr, being then about fifty years of age. His forces having been utterly dispersed, Al Malec Al Nâser, found himself obliged to return with shame to Damascus. The same year, Bedro'ddîn Lûlû reduced to his obedience the island of Ebn Omar; Al Malec Al Mas'ûd Ebn Al Malec Al Moadbhem, of the house of Zenki, the Sâheb thereof, being thrown into the Tigris, by an officer who was conducting him in a small vessel to Al Mawfel, and drowned. This is said to have been done by Bedro'ddîn Lûlû's order; though it was given out, that the unfortunate prince cast himself into the river, in the night, when the people that escorted him were asleep. Mûn-

(T) The surname Al Sâmari may perhaps intimate him to have been a Samaritan, as it seems not to have been deduced from the name of any particular place. Al Morvaffek Yakûb Al Dimshki, a Samaritan, and a learned

a cacá, or Mangú Khán, at a general meeting of the states of Mogulestán, was elected, by the influence of Bátú, emperor of the Moguls, before the close of the present year^a.

THE following year being the 649th of the Hejra, beginning March 26th, 1251, Barca The most memorable events of the year 649, Ogúl, Baká Tímúr, his brother, Al Jattái Al Cabir, their uncle, and all the other principal Emírs, or chiefs, of the Orda, or hord, of Jenghíz Khán, who had not appeared the preceding year, met, in pursuance of what had been determined at the election of Múncacá, or Mangú, Khán; and with their heads bare, and their belts upon their shoulders, the 9th of the latter Rabí, by nine genuflexions, according to the custom of the Moguls, did homage to that prince. The new emperor was then sitting upon a throne, on which he had been placed by several Kháns, with his seven brothers, Koblá, Húlácú, Aríg Búacá, Múacá, Bújac, Sabacá, and Súntái, on his right hand, and the princesses of the blood on his left. Before they bowed their knees nine times, in token of obedience, before him, they proclaimed him emperor, with the title of Káán (U), Kháán, or Grand Khán. This ceremony was followed by seven days of public festivity and rejoicing; during which, Kadgán Ogúl, his nephew Malec Ogúl, and Kará Húlácú, coming to court, made their compliments of congratulation, and paid their duty to Múncacá Khán. But neither Ogúl Gánmish, Cayúc Khán's widow, nor her son Khawájah, nor any of the princes or Emírs, dependent on them, at that time there appeared. Jemálo'ddín Ebn Matríb, a learned man of transcendent merit, and a very good poet, a few of whose verses Ebn Shoknab has preserved, died in some part of the year that we are now upon^b.

c THE next year, being the 650th of the Hejra, which commenced March 14th, 1252, a conspiracy having been formed by the partizans of Ogúl Gánmish against the emperor of the Moguls, Sírámán and Nákúá, two generals in her interest, marched privately with a detachment, and some waggons loaded with arms, towards the residence of that prince, in order to assassinate him. But one of his domestics, who was the keeper of the wild beasts belonging to the princes of the blood, being then in search of a lion that had made his escape, happened to pass by a place where Sírámán's and Nákúá's troops stopped in the evening, and to meet with a boy, sitting by his waggon, that was broken; who desired his assistance, and discovered to him the whole affair. Upon which, he immediately posted away to court, and communicated the intelligence he had received to Múncacá Khán; who instantly detached Man- d casár, the commander in chief of his forces, in quest of the rebels, with a body of 2,000 horse. That general coming up with them, they were struck with terror, and submitted, without resistance, to the Khán. The ringleaders and most guilty were punished with death, but the others Múncacá Khán thought fit to incorporate with his troops. This rebellion being extinguished, that prince applied himself intirely to the disciplining of the army, and the settling of the repose of his dominions upon a lasting foundation. The vast tract of Katay, extending from Al Míri to Salicáy, Tangút, and the kingdom of Tibet, he assigned to Koblá, or Coblúy, his brother; Húlácú, another of his brothers, he appointed to preside over the most western part of his empire; Al Sáheb Al Moadhdbem Talwáj, and his son Mas'úd Bek, in order to enrich them, he constituted governors of all the eastern provinces, situated between the Jibún, and the boundaries of Katay; and Argún, Acá, or Argún Agá, he made the vice-roy, or Emír, of Khorazán, Múzanderán, Hindostán, Irák, Fárs, Kermán, Lúr, Arrán, Adkerbiján, Corjéstán, Gorjéstán, or Georgia, Al Maswef, and Al Skám. Every rich subject in Katay paid Múncacá Khán annually fifteen dinárs, and those in lower circumstances one only. The more opulent people in Khorazán paid the Mogul monarch every year ten dinárs a piece, and the poorer sort one, as in Katay. Of each grazier possessing an hundred head of the cattle called Koyjúr the Khán exacted one, but of those who had a lesser number none at all. As for the priests and religious within his empire, whether Christian, Pagan, or Mohammedan, they were exempt from all tribute, taxes, duties, and imposts whatsoever. The same year, Hátem, king of Armenia, set out on Good Friday, having received the sacrament the day before, from the city of Sis, for the Orda of Múncacá Khán, or Múncacá Khán, in order to pay homage to that prince. As he was afraid of the king of the Belád Al Rúm, he travelled incognito, in the habit of a servant; leading a horse in his hand after his ambassador, who attended him in this

(U) The word Káán answers exactly to the antient Persic title Padisháb, of which we have given an ample account above, according to the author of the Persic lexicon; intituled, Farhang Surúr; a copy of which, for-

journey. The ambassador every where gave out, after they had entered the Belád Al Rám, a that he was sent by the king of Armenia to Múncacá Kâân, to procure a pass from him for his master; who had promised him, as he said, to visit his court. By this means, Hâtem passed through Kaisâriya and Sîwâs without being known; but when he came to Arzencân, or Arzengân, as he told Abu'l Faraj, who was acquainted with him, two years after his return from Orda of Múncacá Khân, a certain huckster, who had formerly lived in his capital, knew him, and said, "If I see with my own eyes, this is the king of Sîs." Upon which, his ambassador gave him a box on the ear; saying, "Sirrah, how came such a rascal as you to be "so like a king?" Which Hâtem was obliged to bear patiently, to prevent his person from being too narrowly viewed. This year, a great dispute arose between the Sunnites, or Traditionists, and the Shiites, or the followers of Ali, at Baghdâd; which occasioned a tumult, and commotion, in that capital. Abu Becr, the Khalif's son, protected the Sunnites; and Mowayyado'ddîn, that prince's Wazîr, was closely connected with the Shiites. It happened that Abu Becr, not being able to bear any longer the frequent seditions excited by the Shiites, went one day with an armed force to seize the chiefs of that sect, and filled all the prisons with them. This action so displeased Mowayyado'ddîn, that he resolved to revenge those persons, whom he took to be unjustly persecuted, and at the same time formed the cruel design of destroying the house of Al Abbâs; the members of which he looked upon as the authors of, or at least as accessory to, this persecution. How the Wazîr carried his wicked design into execution, and effected not only the ruin of that family, but likewise the abolition of the Khalifat, will in a short time fully appear^c.

the year 651,

IN the 651st year of the Hejra, which began March 3d, 1253, Hâlicû, brother of the emperor of the Moguls, moved with a most formidable army from the neighbourhood of Karâkorom towards the western provinces. Before he began his march, he was joined by a body of troops, sent him by Múncacá Kâân, under the command of his younger brother Sontâi, or Sînitâi, Ogûl; by a reinforcement from Bâtû, under the orders of Igâi Ebn Sabkân, Kûltâr Ogûl, and Kûli; by the forces of Jogatâi Tacûdâr Ogûl, the son of Bûkbi Ogûl; by those of Jibacân Biki Bûkâ Tîmâr, consisting of Al Awirâte troops; and by 1000 artificers, with their families, from the interior parts of Katay, who were extremely well versed in fabricating arms and military machines. The general of the Turks that joined him was Kabad Bûkâ Al Bâwarji. His son Jûmagâr, whose mother was the noblest of his wives, Hûlâcû Il Khân sent as his ambassador to the Orda of Múncacá Kâân; and took his eldest son Abâka along with him, as well as another named Yasîmûn. Dûkûz Khâtûn, a Christian lady, and Al Jâi Khâtûn, two of his wives, likewise attended him in this expedition. We are told, that Hûlâcû at first intended to push his conquests towards the west and the north, and to attack Thrace, Russia, and Poland; but that he was diverted from this resolution, and persuaded to lay siege to the city of Baghdâd, by the famous oriental mathematician Nassîro'ddîn, who had quitted the Khalif's court in disgust, gone over to the Tartar, and assured him, that this prince's capital was incapable of making any defence. Ebn Shohnab relates, that a luminous appearance in the air, extremely bright and resplendent by night, emitting a smoke in the day, for a considerable space of time, greatly terrified the people of 'Aden, in Al Yaman, and the neighbouring district, the present year^d.

THE 652d year of the Hejra, commencing Feb. 21st, 1254, was not distinguished by many actions of éclat. Hûlâcû persisted in his intention of attacking the Khalif, but took care for the present to conceal his design. Al Moezz 'Azzo'ddîn Aybec killed Khoshdâshob Aktâi Al Jîmdâr, and deposed Al Malec Al Asbraf Mûsa, a child about ten years old; after which, according to Ebn Shohnab, none of the princes of the house of Ayûb had any power or influence in Egypt^e.

The most remarkable
the year 653.

THE following year, being the 653d of the Hejra, beginning Feb. 10th, 1255, Hâtem, king of Armenia, returned to Sîs, in the Syrian month Eilâl, or Aylûl, from the Orda of the Grand Khân. The same year, before the close of Sbaabân, Hûlâcû Il Khân incamped with his numerous forces in the plains of Samarkand, and remained in that position forty days; during which term, his brother Sontâi Ogûl departed this life, and he received advice of another brother's death, that happened in the district of Balâdor. These melancholy accidents greatly afflicted him. Al Emîr Argûn and many of the grandees of Khorasân, who notwithstanding the severity of the season had passed the Jibûn, soon after joined him. As the winter was extremely cold, and the ground in those parts covered with snow till the following spring, he found himself obliged to continue in a state of inaction for several months. However, he a ordered some of his generals, with the forces under their command, to advance against Rocno'ddîn Khûz Shâb Ebn 'Alâo'ddîn, prince of the Ismaelians, or Affassins, who had already demolished five of his castles, which he did not think capable of sustaining a siege, as soon as the season would permit. Nevertheless the reduction of all the fortresses occupied by these murderers was not intirely effected in one campaign^f.

THE next year, being the 654th of the Hejra, which commenced Jan. 30th, 1256, was ^{and of the} not destitute of memorable events. Cayd Bûkâ, or Cabad Bûkâ, Al Bâwarjî, one of Hûlâcû's ^{year 654.} generals, having taken the castle of Sbâbedîz, and three others, from Rocno'ddîn Khûz Shâb, prince of the Ismaelians, justly termed Al Molâbedab, that is, The Impious, on account of their enormous crimes; Hûlâcû himself advanced to Kasrân, in order to begin the operations of the campaign. From thence he marched to 'Abâsîbâd, or 'Abbâsîbâd; where he received a boy, b seven or eight years old, dispatched to him by Rocno'ddîn, seemingly to intimate his submission to him, whom that prince gave out to be his son. Hûlâcû treated the child with marks of affection and honour, though he did not take him to be Rocno'ddîn's son, and then ordered him to return to his pretended father. After this, Rocno'ddîn sent his brother Shîrân Shab, with a train of 300 attendants, to the Mogul camp. Hûlâcû, upon their arrival, commanded the men that attended Shîrân Shâb to be conducted under an escorte to Jemâlâbâd, or Jamâlâbâd, in the territory of Kazwîn; but dismissed Shîrân Shâb himself, ordering him to let his brother know, that if he did not in person pay him homage, in five days time, he would immediately attack him. Hereupon Rocno'ddîn dispatched an ambassador to Hûlâcû, to inform c him, that his own troops would not suffer him then to leave them; but that, when a proper opportunity offered, he would most certainly wait upon him. Upon which, Hûlâcû, finding that he sought only to gain time, moved from Bîshcâm to a spot of ground opposite to Al Maimûn Dara, the 14th of Shawâl, and there incamped. He also gave private orders, that the 300 Al Molâbedab at Jamâlâbâd should be put to death; whence it came to pass, that the inhabitants of Kazwîn said, by way of proverb, when any person was executed, or killed; "He was sent to Jamâlâbâd." When Rocno'ddîn perceived, that Hûlâcû Il Khân actually d approached him, he assured him, by another ambassador, that he would not fail to make his submission to him in person, either that or the following day. The most resolute, however, of the Al Molâbedab, or Ismaelians, who acted under him, would not permit him to retire to the Moguls, as he intended to do; of which Hûlâcû being apprized, he commanded him to endeavour first to mollify them by fair words, and to leave them even in disguise, if no other method could render his escape practicable. In the mean time, the Mogul general invested the fortress wherein Rocno'ddîn was shut up, with his troops, and planted his military machines round it in such a manner as plainly indicated an intention of carrying it by storm. The siege of the place being formed, the Ismaelians sallied out vigorously upon the Moguls; which enabled Rocno'ddîn Khûz Shâb, who probably headed them in this action, to go over, with his family and friends, to Hûlâcû, and acknowledge himself one of the vassals of the Grand Khân. At their first interview, Rocno'ddîn expressed the most unfeigned sorrow and concern for the enormous crimes he had been guilty of, and met with a very favourable reception e from Hûlâcû; which being observed by the Ismaelian garrison of the aforesaid fortress, they surrendered it to the Moguls, in hopes of being treated after the same manner. Hûlâcû's detachments likewise possessed themselves of all the other places of strength in that part of the Ismaelian territories, without sustaining any considerable loss. Having demolished all the castles and fortresses that had been occupied his troops, Hûlâcû summoned the commandant of Al Mât, who seemed determined to defend that strong hold to the last drop of blood; but upon the approach of Balgâi Ogûl, with a large body of Moguls, he thought fit to deliver it up into his hands, towards the close of Dbu'lkaada, the present year. This and the other fortresses of Kabestân, amounting to above fifty in number, which the Moguls had reduced, Shamso'ddîn, the governor of Kabestân, with a detachment of the Ismaelian troops, at Hûlâcû's command, f laid level with the ground. Nevertheless Cazdbacûb and Camshîr held out till the year 656. The Moguls granted the noblesse of Deylam a peace, upon condition that all their castles and fortresses should be demolished; after which, Hûlâcû put his men into winter-quarters in the territory of Hamadân, about the middle of Dbu'lhajja, and ordered Rocno'ddîn, with his family, to be conducted to Kazwîn. The same year, according to Dr. Hunt's MS. copy of Ebn Shobnah, and not before, died Kaykhusrû, the Sâheb of the Belâd Al Rûm, and was succeeded by 'Azzo'ddîn Kaykâwas and Rocno'ddîn Kilij Arslân, his sons; but this we are by no means disposed to admit, as it apparently runs counter to what has been already observed, both from Abu'lfeza and Abu'l Faraj. Ebn Shobnah likewise relates, if the aforesaid MS. copy of his history may be depended upon, that Al Malec Al Nâser Salâb'addîn Yusef, the g Sâheb of Haleb, or Aleppo, and Al Shîm, sent Al Câmel Ebn Al 'Adîm, with a splendid

Al Moezz
'Azzo'ddîn
Aybec is af-faffinated.

IN the 655th year of the Hejra, which began Jan. 19th, 1257, Al Malec Al Moezz
'Azzo'ddîn Aybec Al Turkomâni Al Jâsbenkîr, the first Turkish Mamlûk Soltân of Egypt, was affaffinated by certain Mamlûks, hired by his wife Shajr Al Dor, as has been already observed, to perpetrate that horrid fact. He began his reign, according to some writers of good repute, on Saturday, the 29th of the latter Rabî, 648; and was cut off, by the villainous intrigues of Shajr Al Dor, on Tuesday, the 23d of the former Rabî, 655. As Omm Khâled, or Shajr Al b Dor, who was of a very despotic and tyrannical disposition, would not allow Al Moezz any share in the government; he resolved to divorce her, and to take another wife. Of which Omm Khâled having been apprized, in order to prevent this, and to rule the more absolutely, she caused him to be precipitated from the throne by a violent death. However, she did not long enjoy the fruits of her wickedness; the principal Mamlûk Emîrs having, at the instigation of Al Malec Al Mansûr, Al Moezz's son, and his mother, soon after slain her, and thrown her body to the dogs. Before her tragical exit, she pounded all her most valuable jewels in a mortar, till she had reduced them to powder, that they might not fall into her enemies hands.
Al Malec Al Mansûr Nûro'ddîn Ali, then only fifteen years old, who succeeded his father Al Moezz, was proclaimed Sâbeb, or Soltân, of Egypt, the 25th of the former Rabî, 655; and was deposed, according to Al Makrizi and the author of Al Rawda, the 24th of Dbu'lkaada, c 657. This year, according to Ebn Shobnah, a fire broke out in the Al Harâm, or great temple, at Medina, through the negligence of the people there; which for some time raged with great violence, and consumed the roof, together with several of the pulpits, before it was possible to extinguish the flames. As this disaster happened in the night, the blaze occasioned by it was seen at a vast distance from the palace; which struck the Arab Moslems with terror, they imagining that some signal calamity to Islamism was portended by so doleful and unexpected an event^h.

Hûlâcû extirpates the whole race of the Ismaelians, or Assassins.

THE same year, Hûlâcû sent Rocno'ddîn Khûz Shâh, prince of the Ismaelians, or Assassins, at his own request, to Karâkorom; whither he proposed to go, in order to pay homage to Mûncacâ Kâân, emperor of the Moguls. But he no sooner arrived at the city of Bokbâra, with d nine of his subjects, and the ambassadors dispatched by Hûlâcû to Mûncacâ Kâân, who in this journey attended him, than he quarrelled with the latter, and gave them very opprobrious language; which so incensed them, that they placed his conduct to the Grand Khân in a very bad light. Upon his arrival, therefore, at Karâkorom, he was refused an audience by Mûncacâ Kâân; who commanded him to return home, to demolish the castles of Cazdbakûb, and Cam- shîr, which were still garrisoned by his troops, and to visit a second time the Mogul court.
Upon his compliance with this command, he was promised a more favourable reception. In pursuance of the order he had received, Rocno'ddîn set out for Kazwîn; but was put to death, together with the Ismaelians that accompanied him, upon the road. Karâkây Al Tabtahtaji, a Mogul general sent by Hûlâcû for that purpose to Kazwîn, also cut off his sons, daughters, e brothers, sisters, and in fine his whole family. All the Ismaelian forces, and particularly a body (W) of 12,000 of them, drawn up as it were to be reviewed before Awtcîhanâ Nowayn, another of the principal Mogul officers, were likewise put to the sword. But as the history of the Ismaelians, or Assassins, will have a place assigned in the supplement to this large and extensive work, it would be altogether superfluous to expatiate farther upon the extirpation of that most profligate and abandoned nation hereⁱ.

a Mesopotamia; 'Azzo'ddîn appointed one Ali Babâder to preside over the people of Malatiya, in the room of Ebn Belâs, to whom he had before assigned the government of that city. Ali Babâder had not been long at Malatiya, before he was driven from thence by Bâyejû Nowayn, one of the generals of the Moguls. But that commander having afterwards received a sum of money from the citizens of Malatiya, and passed the frontiers of the Belâd Al Rûm, on his route to the borders of Irâk; Ali Babâder returned, and laid siege to Malatiya; the people there, for fear of Bâyejû Nowayn, refusing to admit him, and his Turkmân troops, into the town. Having at last in a manner starved them to a surrender, the weavers, and others of the lower sort of people, opened a gate in the night, by which Ali and the Turkmâns under his conduct entered the place. After which, he caused a proclamation to be made, that the citizens, both Christians and Mohammedans, might again apply themselves to their respective callings and professions, as he would take them all under his protection. The next morning, however, he imprisoned Fakbro'ddîn Ayyaz, Soltân Rocno'ddîn's governor; and put to death Shabâbo'ddîn Al 'Ared, after he had caused him to be led on a sorry horse, by way of derision, thro' all the most public streets of the city. Al Mo'ayyen Al Aycad Bashâfi had by his order his neck tied to that of a dog, and was constrained to walk in that attitude through the most noted parts of the town; after which the executioner struck off his head. A similar punishment he inflicted upon three Emîrs, the sons of Al Emîr Shabâbo'ddîn Aysûl, the Curd, and some few others of the leading men, who had the most vigorously opposed him. The famine occasioned by the siege was most dreadful, and such as was perhaps never before known in that part of the world. During the time of this terrible calamity, as an intimate friend assured Abu'l Faraj, a company of women at Bâ'bdûn, a village in the district of Jûbâs, one of the dependencies of Malatiya, fed upon the flesh of a corpse; and another woman having baked her own child, and her neighbours being upon the point of pulling her to pieces for so execrable an action, she swore that she had not killed him, but only baked him after he was dead, imagining him then to be much fitter food for her than for worms. But of the most remarkable events that happened at this time in the Belâd Al Rûm, which we have barely touched upon here, our readers may expect a full and ample account in a subsequent part of this work^k.

HULACU had, for some time past, resolved to besiege the city of Baghdâd; but he had endeavoured, with all the art a great captain is master of, to conceal the point he had in view. He had by marches and counter-marches, and other military falsifications, rendered it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to judge on what side the storm, with which he had long threatened some of the neighbouring powers, would fall. Whilst his forces were reducing the castles occupied by the Ismaelians, he had sent an ambassador to Al Mosta'sem at Baghdâd, to desire his assistance against those murderers; which the Khalif, not aware of the snare the crafty Tartar intended to lay for him by this demand, seemed inclinable enough to grant. But the most faithful of his ministers, who plainly perceived the pernicious tendency of Hûlâcû's request, would by no means give their consent to a compliance with it. They represented to Al Mosta'sem, that the Mogul general did not stand in need of his assistance; but only wanted to drain the city of Baghdâd of its troops, that it might the more easily fall a prey to him. After Hûlâcû had dispossessed the Ismaelians of their fortresses, he talked to the Khalif, by the mouth of another ambassador, in a loftier strain. He even upbraided him with not contributing to the extirpation of the Assassins, who were now become a common pest. As for Mowayyado'ddîn, the Wazîr, having penetrated Hûlâcû's real design, by means of some emissaries he had in the Tartar camp; he resolved to avail himself of the present opportunity to ruin without resource his master and his whole family, and completely to revenge the outrages suffered by the sect he had always favoured. In order to which he advised Al Mosta'sem forthwith to disband his troops, as they were altogether useless at a time when he was feared and respected by all the kings and princes professing Islamism. He added, that with regard to the Tartars, nothing was to be apprehended from them; they seeming, by all their motions, determined to turn their arms towards the north, which would be more advantageous to them than any southern expedition. The Khalif, who loved money, listened to the advice with pleasure; and, instead of augmenting the troops he had on foot, amounting to 70,000 men, which he ought to have done, he issued an order for a reform, laid aside all thoughts of making the proper dispositions for his defence, and intirely abandoned himself to those pleasures to which he was so much attached. In the mean time, the Wazîr, with whom the Khalif had trusted the absolute government of his estates, that his treason might be crowned with success, dispersed all the best officers of the forces in places remote from Baghdâd; and dispatched an express to Hûlâcû, to inform him of the facility with which he might make himself master of the capital, and the Khalif's person, if he would immediately march his army that way. Upon this advice, the Tartar left the environs of Hamadân, in the month of Skawâl, without imparting to any person the route he intended to take, and broke all at once unexpectedly into the Babylonian Irák, the province in which Baghdád stood. On the arrival of this melancholy news, the principal lords of the court repaired directly to the Khalif, and laid before him in the most lively colours the necessity he then was under of quitting his debaucheries, and thinking seriously of his affairs. But the Wazir rendered ineffectual all their laudable endeavours, by still amusing that prince, to his destruction, and telling him that he ran no manner of risk from the Tartars and Moguls; nay, that if they should enter the city, the very women and children alone would be able to knock them on the head with stones from the terraces of their houses. Being consulted, however, by the noblesse, at this critical juncture, he said, that Húlcú would not be satisfied with any thing less than all their treasures, jewels, sumptuous garments, slaves, mules, camels, and in fine every thing valuable belonging to them; by which they plainly perceived, that he had procured from Húlcú good terms for himself, by betraying his sovereign and fellow subjects to the Tartars. Nevertheless the Khalif still, in some measure, listened to him; and sent several presents to the Mogul general, as an intimation that he was willing to come to an accommodation with him. But these not being of sufficient value, Húlcú returned them with indignation; and insisted that either the Wazir, the Dowaidár, or Solimán Sháb, should be instantly dispatched to his camp. None of them, however, though commanded by the Khalif, would stir out of the town; so that Al Mosta'sem found himself obliged to send Ebn Al Jawzi and Ebn Mohaio'ddín, as his plenipotentiaries to Húlcú, who were incapable of executing the commission with which they were charged. All hopes of peace thus vanishing into smoke, Húlcú detached a strong body of his troops, under the orders of Báyejú Nowayn and Súnják Nowayn, to move through Arbel towards Baghdád; whilst he himself, with the gross of his army, advanced by the way of Holwán to the gates of that capital. The Khalif, who had been so long imposed upon by the Wazir, began now to be sensible of the fatal mistake he had been guilty of, in listening to the pernicious counsel of that wicked minister; and having received advice, that Báyejú Nowayn had already passed the Tigris, and was incamped on the western bank of that river; he commanded the Dowaidár, with all the forces that could be assembled, to observe the motions of the Moguls. Whilst things were in this situation, Aybec Al Halebi, one of the Khalif's Emirs, was taken by one of the enemy's parties, and carried to Húlcú; who spared his life, on condition that he should give him a true account of the state of affairs in Baghdád. Having conducted the Mogul army to the walls of that city, he wrote to his friends there; telling them, that, "as they were utterly unable to resist the mighty power of Húlcú, he could not forbear intreating them to surrender to him." They answered the Emir's letter in the following terms. "Who is Húlcú, and what is his power, that he should presume to make war upon the house of Al Abbas? Their empire is derived from God alone, and therefore no prince can meet with success, who endeavours to overturn it. If Húlcú had been a friend to peace, he would never have entered and ravaged the Khalif's territories. Nevertheless if he should now be sincerely desirous of it, let him return to Hamadán, and we will intercede with the Dowaidár to prevail upon the commander of the faithful to forgive the enormous crime he has committed." Which answer being shewn by Al Emir Aybec to Húlcú, that conqueror laughed at their weakness and simplicity; knowing that the dispute between him and Al Mosta'sem, who had been reduced almost to the last extremity by the infidelity of his Wazir, would be brought to a speedy decision by the sword¹.

The Khalif's forces are overthrown by the Moguls.

THE Dowaidár, finding the city upon the point of being invested by the Moguls, posted himself at Yáakúbá; but, in order to watch more narrowly their motions, he removed from thence to a spot of ground opposite to Báyejú Nowayn's camp. Having received afterwards advice that a body of the Tartars, under the command of Súnják Nowayn, was arrived at Al Anbár; he led his forces against them, attacked them, and put them to flight. But Báyejú Nowayn coming up with his men, in the nick of time, forced the fugitives to return to the charge; and, after an obstinate and bloody engagement, by dint of numbers, gave the Khalif's army a total defeat. Most of the Moslems were killed in the action and the pursuit, a few of them only escaping with the Dowaidár to Baghdád. This we learn from Abu'l Faraj. But of the preceding operations the following particulars have been handed down to us by Khondemir, the Persian historian. Húlcú having detached from his army Súnják and Mangú, with a considerable corps, who had traversed the desert, in order to approach nearer the city of Baghdád; the Khalif sent two of his general officers, named Fatbo'ddín and Mojábo'ddín, with a body of 10,000 men, to reconnoitre the Moguls. Those generals found the enemy incamped along an arm of the Dijlat, or the Tigris, and immediately gave them battle. The two armies engaged near that river a whole day, without any apparent advantage on either side. But the Moguls having cut through one of the mounds of the Euphrates, near the spot on which the Moslem troops were posted, the following night; they were all either drowned by an inundation a of that river, or put to the sword by the Tartars, Mojibah'ddin only with great difficulty making his escape to Baghdād. The Khalif being informed of his arrival, and knowing nothing of the defeat of his army, cried out three times, "God be praised, Mojibah'ddin is in good health." ^m

THE 656th year of the Hejra, commencing Jan. 8th, 1258, has been rendered memorable to all succeeding ages by the great revolution that happened in it. A revolution which, however, was brought about not so much by the power of a foreign enemy, though extremely formidable, as by the wicked intrigues of a domestic foe. Whilst the Khalif's troops were advancing to meet the Tartars who had taken their route towards Baghdād through the desert, Hülacü himself arrived with his numerous forces by the way of Holwân before the gates of that city. b About the middle of Al Moharram, having been joined by all his detachments, he invested the place; the inhabitants of all ranks and denominations, at that time, thinking of nothing less than a siege. As for the Khalif himself, he still continued in his debaucheries; and had so little knowledge of his affairs, that he was scarce sensible of the enemies being before the walls when his capital had been near two (X) months besieged. The Persians, in order to express the present state of Baghdād, and the security in which its citizens now lived, say, "The oven" was heated every night and morning as usual." Hülacü having erected a Sibâ, or high wall, and strengthened it with a deep trench on the eastern side of the city, as Bûkâr Tîmûr, Sûnjâk Nowayn, and Bâyêjû Noweyn, had done on the western, and thereby formed a complete line of contravallation; the Moguls planted their She-pau and Ho-pau, or stone-engines and fire-engines, c as well as all their other military machines, in a proper manner, round the place, and began to play with them upon the walls the 22d of Al Moharram, on which day the siege commenced. The Khalif hereupon, however ignorant he might be of the deplorable situation he was in, by the advice of his principal courtiers, sent the prefect of his Dîwân and Ebn Darnûs, with some presents, to Hülacü, to make his submission to him. But as these presents were of little value, Al Mosta'sem imagining that richer would have been interpreted as a sign of fear, they met with but a cold reception; Hülacü demanding, in an authoritative tone, why the Dowaidâr and Solîmân Shâh had not been ordered to attend him? In the mean time, Hülacü carried on his attacks against that part of the town where the tower Al 'Ajemi, or the Persian tower, stood; Bûkâr Tîmûr his on the western side, near the herb-garden; and Sûnjâk Nowayn, who was sustained by d Bâyêjû Nowayn, his against the quarter occupied by the hospital Al 'Adadi. The prefect, or Sâheb, of the Dîwan and Ebn Darnûs being returned, with an account of the indifferent treatment they had received from Hülacü; the Khalif dispatched the Wazîr Al 'Alkami himself, accompanied by his two sons, and several of his friends, to the Mogul camp. Upon his arrival there, the Tartar general told him, that when he was at Hamadân he would have been satisfied with the attendance of either the Wazîr, the Dowaidâr, or Solîman Shâh; but that now, when things wore quite a different aspect, he expected that all those three ministers should wait upon him. The Moguls having rendered it impossible for any of the people and garrison of Baghdād to escape by means of the Tigris, and made themselves masters of the walls, the 26th of Al Moharram; that capital, with all the riches in it, was in the most imminent danger of falling e into their hands. Every thing being ready for storming the place, Hülacü caused it to be signified to the Khalif's subjects by an Arabic inscription cut on some of his archers arrows, and shot into the town, "that the noblesse, the descendants of Ali, the learned (Y) men, and in

(X) In this article we have followed Khondemir, as translated by M. D'Herbelot; the siege of Baghdād scarce continuing three weeks, according to Abu'l Faraj (1).

(Y) During the Khalifat of Al Mosta'sem Ebn Al Mostanser, the following learned men are said to have flourished in the Moslem territories by Abu'l Faraj.

1. Jemâlo'ddin, or Jamâlo'ddin, Ebn Al Koftî, the author of the history of wise men, or physicians; who was born at Koft, or Coptos, an ancient city of The Upper Egypt, denominated Al Sa'id by the Arab writers, in the year of the Hejra 568. His father removing to Al Kâbirah, or Al Kûbirah Al Moezziyah; he was taught there both to read and write, and instructed in the rudiments of polite literature. From thence he travelled to Aleppo, where he contracted an intimacy with Al Emîr Al Maimûn Al Kafri. During his residence there, he became acquainted with many learned men; by whose conversation, and disputations, which he constantly attended, he was much improved. After Al Emîr Al Maimûn Al Kafri's death, he kept himself altogether at home, till he was appointed by Al Malec Al Dhâber, much against his inclination, to preside over the weighty affairs of the Dîwân. That prince being dead, he retired from the Dîwân, confined himself to his own house, and applied himself there so closely to study and meditation, that he scarce ever appeared elsewhere. However, Al Malec Al 'Azîz conferred upon him the office of Wazîr, in the year 633; the duties of which he continued to discharge, with great reputation, till the day of his death, or the 13th of Ramadân, 646. Al Malec Al Nâser, Al Malec Al 'Azîz's son, when Jemâlo'ddin Ebn Al Koftî expired, sat upon the Egyptian throne.

2. Nojms'ddin Al Nakhjîwânî, a celebrated philosopher, who made a vast progress in most branches of ancient literature. He first studied philosophy in his own country, and afterwards settled in the capital of the Belâd Al Rûm; where his merit was so conspicuous, that he arrived at the highest honours. But being tired with the hurry and noise of a court, he withdrew to Aleppo, and remained altogether at home; though he was visited by considerable numbers of people, being of a very “ fine all who should not be found in arms when he entered the place, should be safe, together “ with their families and effects.” The Dowaidâr and Solimân Shâh, with a large retinue of the grandees, in obedience to his commands, then appeared before him ; but he permitted the fociable disposition, as long as he lived. He was of the sect of those who maintain the Metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, asserted by Pythagoras. He published strictures upon the Al Ajbârât of Ebn Sinâ, and wrote a sort of commentary upon that piece. He likewise discovered several errors and defects in the logical treatise of Al Afdal Al Khawarizmi, intitled Al Calkf. Nojmo'ddin, who was born at Nakchirwân, Nakhsirwân, one of the principal cities of The Greater Armenia, in the province of Adharbijân, and has been represented as a man of piety as well as learning, finished his observations upon Ebn Sinâ's system of logic, about the year of the Hijra 650.

3. Theodorus Antiochenus, a Jacobite Christian ; who attained to an uncommon skill both in the Syriac and Latin tongues, as well as the Arabic, at Antioch, and was a physician also well acquainted with several branches of antient literature. He read at Al Marâsîl, with Camâloddin Ebn Yûnes, the works of Al Fârâbi and Ebn Sinâ, as likewise Euclid and Ptolemy's Almagest. After which, he returned to Antioch, his native city ; but soon went back to Al Marâsîl, for the benefit of Ebn Yûnes's instruction. When he had perfected himself in the mathematics and philosophy there, he applied himself to the study of physic at Baghdâd ; and, by his indefatigable application, acquired a most extensive knowledge of that art. From Baghdâd he repaired to ' Alâoddin's court, in order to become physician to that prince, who was the Seljukian Soltân of the Belâd Al Rûm ; but meeting with a cold reception there, he passed into Armenia, to serve in the same capacity Constantine, the father of king Hâtem. Not finding in this country the encouragement he expected, Theodorus departed from thence in the retinue of an ambassador to Constantinople. The Latin emperor, having been apprised of his merit, loaded him with presents and honours ; and settled upon him the revenues of the little city of Camâbi, or Camâbia, including those of the district appertaining to it. Being in affluent circumstances, the desire of seeing his native country and his friends made him take the resolution of returning to Antioch ; but not being able to get the emperor's leave, he embarked with his servants and all his substance, setting sail for the coast of ' Accâ, whilst the emperor was engaged in a western expedition. He had not been long at sea, when a contrary wind arose, and constrained him to enter the port of a certain city where the emperor himself at that time was. Of which having been informed, through shame rather than fear, as he had fled without the permission of his benefactor, who would nevertheless not have punished so excellent a physician with death, by some poison that he carried about him, he put a period to his days.

4. Mas'ûd Al Baghdâdi, generally denominated Ebn Al Kafi ; who was physician in ordinary to the Khalif Al Mosta'sem Ebn Al Mostanser, and one of the greatest favourites of that prince. After the taking of Baghdâd by the Tartars, he lived in the most retired manner, scarce ever appearing in public, or even out of his house, to the day that he expired.

5. Gars Al Ne'mat Abu Nafr, the son of Mas'ûd Al Baghdâdi ; who was a man of very extensive learning, and an excellent geometrician. He was of a thin habit of body, a valetudinarian, drank copiously every day of ptisan, dieted himself, and, by that means, arrived at a pretty advanced age.

6. Isa Al Baghdâdi, an eminent physician, commonly called Ebn Al Kasîs Al Khatîrî ; who seems, according to Abu'l Faraj, to have been of a choleric disposition. Being once engaged in a dispute with that author, Isa Al Baghdâdi pretended to prove from scripture, that the night at first preceded the day, as the Syrians hold ; Moses clearly asserting, that “ the evening and the morning were the first day.” The Arab historian answered, that this text was so far from supporting his opinion, that it made directly against him ; the term evening there importing nothing more than the end, or termination, of the preceding day. To which, with some emotion, Isa thought fit only to reply, “ This is the opinion of your whole sect, how therefore can you have the assurance to attempt proving them guilty of a lie ?” Abu'l Faraj immediately returned, “ For my own part, I follow the Greeks in this point ; though, by way of apology for the Syrians, it may be said, that as their months are lunar, and begin with the new moon, which appears first in the evening, not in the morning, they fix at the beginning of the night the commencement of their epochs and supputations, as do also the Hebrews and Arabs, for the same reason.” This Isa Al Baghdâdi, whose father was also an excellent physician, that trained up youth in the principles of his art, having deposited an inaccurate copy of the Kûrûn of Ebn Sinâ, drawn out by himself in his younger days, in the library of the college of Al Mostanserîya ; he revised and corrected it, lest his memory should thereby suffer, after his decease. He did not pay the common tribute to nature before he had arrived at an extreme old age.

7. Takio'ddin Al Râsaini, known by the name, or surname, of Ebn Al Khattâb ; who was vastly celebrated for his skill in his profession, and served in the quality of physician both Soltân Gayâthoddin and ' Azzoddin his son. Those princes greatly honoured him, treated him in all respects as their equal, assigned him a most ample salary, and contracted an uncommon intimacy with him ; insomuch that he enjoyed an uninterrupted flow of prosperity, for a considerable time, under their protection.

8. Sharfo'ddin Ebn Al Rahabi, and his brother Jemâlo'ddin, both of Damascus ; who made no small figure, at the time that we are now upon. Sharfo'ddin excelled in the theory of physic, and applied himself diligently to the instruction of young students in the principles of that art. Jemâlo'ddin rendered himself exceeding famous by his experience, and the success that attended him in his practice. We are told by Abu'l Faraj, who visited many patients in the hospital Al Nûrî at Damascus with him, that he was a person of a most amiable disposition, and that he never saw a physician of a better address. That author farther relates, that Sharfo'ddin, whose scholars were very numerous, wrote notes and a short comment upon the Kânûn of Ebn Sinâ ; which, as he tells us, he had never perused.

9. Bedro'ddin, the son of the Kâdi of Baalbec, a most celebrated physician ; who wrote a small treatise upon cordials and exhilarating medicines, adapted to all constitutions. In this piece, which bore the title of Mofarreh Al Nefs, that is, exhilarating the soul, he reprehended Al Kayis, the primary doctor, or Ebn Sinâ, for ranking coriander amongst those medicines which raise the spirits, and comfort the heart ; that herb, according to him, producing no such salutary effects.

10. Nafiso'ddarwla Al Dimshki, a Christian of the Melchite sect, generally going under the appellation of Ebn Talib ; who, according to Abu'l Faraj, was the principal of the physicians employed by Hûlâû the Tartar.

11. Al Mowaffik Yakûb Al Dimshki Al Sâmari, or Al Mowaffik Jacob, the Damascene Samaritan ; who was a physician of great sagacity, and in his practice attended with uncommon success. He was, however, so retentive of his knowledge, that he refused to communicate any part of it to those who came from foreign countries for the benefit of his instruction, before a stipulated sum of money was paid down ; which, says Abu'l Faraj, indicated a meanness of disposition, utterly repugnant to the sentiments of a generous mind.

12. Nojmo'ddin Al Dimshki, called also Ebn Al Labûli ; who was appointed to preside over the Diwân, and raised to the dignity of Hazîr. He was justly esteemed one of the most learned and virtuous men of the a Khalif himself either to stay in the imperial palace, or retire to the Tartar camp, according to Abu'l Faraj ^a.

THE Wazir Al 'Alkami having been conducted on horseback to Hulacû's, or Il Khan's, tent; that prince received him in a very gracious manner, and set both him and his sons at liberty, but made the rest of his attendants prisoners. As for the Dowaidâr, he returned into the city; but the next day, endeavouring to escape out of it, was slain. In fine, Baghdâd being now in a defenceless state, as the Moguls had possessed themselves of the walls, Hulacû, the 4th of Safar, gave a general assault, and, almost without opposition, entered it with his victorious troops ^b.

THE common people of Baghdâd having before made their submission to Hulacû, and sent Sbarfo'ddin Al Marâghi and Shahîbo'ddin Al Zencâni to testify their attachment to him; the Khalif found himself deserted by all his subjects, and consequently was obliged to ask Hulacû's leave to wait upon him. This being granted, he left his palace; but was stopped, for some time, with his family, by Hulacû's order, at the gate of Calwâd. But the Mogul general going soon after to view the imperial palace, Al Mosta'sem appeared in his presence, with the jewels, unions, and other pearls, of almost inestimable value, in dishes, that had been collected by his ancestors, during a long course of years; all which, without reserve, Hulacû caused to be distributed amongst the principal officers of his troops. At night, that conqueror returned to his tent; when all the women, belonging both to the Khalif and his sons, about 700 in number, together with 300 eunuchs that waited upon them, were brought before him. The Khalif Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah, being thus fallen into the hands of the Tartars, Hulacû was, for some time, at a loss how to dispose of him. But at last it was resolved, that he should be sewed up in a leather bag (Z), and dragged through all the streets of the city; which being accordingly done, he quickly expired. Other writers, however, inform us, that both he and his sons (A) were trod to death by the army of the Moguls. Abu'l Faraj only relates, that after Hulacû had given up Baghdâd to his troops to be plundered seven days, he departed from thence, the 14th of Safar, and put to death the Khalif Al Mosta'sem, together with his middle son, and six eunuchs, by night, in the first station from his capital. His eldest son, and many of his friends, had been killed before the gate of Calwâd; which, according to Khondemir, that young prince had valiantly defended. Such was the deplorable end of the last Khalif of the Moslems, and even of the Khalifat itself; which commenced immediately after Mohammed's demise, in the person of Abu Becr, and continued in the house of Al Abbâs about 523 years ^c.

THE Khalif Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah was forty-six years old, at the time of his decease, and reigned near sixteen years. He had no proper successor. For, notwithstanding Bîbars, the fourth Soltân of the Turkish Mamlûks in Egypt, in order to revive the lustre of the family of Al Abbâs, acknowledged for Khalif Al Mostanser Bi'llah, who pretended to be a member of that house, three years after the fatal catastrophe abovementioned; his authority was not recognized by the most considerable part of the Moslem world, as will hereafter more fully appear, when we come to the history of the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs in Egypt, after the loss of Baghdâd. With regard to the Khalif Al Mosta'sem, it may not be improper to remark, that although he was a prince of but little sense, and altogether without conduct, he affected to display on all occasions a higher of pomp and magnificence than any of his predecessors. As he was extremely the age; but excelled chiefly in architecture and geometry, which he had cultivated in his younger years with great success.

13. 'Azzo'ddin the blind man likewise merited a place amongst those illustrious persons who were looked upon as the brightest ornaments of the age in which he lived. He was extremely well versed in every branch of philosophy, and the whole circle of Arabic philology. He had so strong a memory, and so lively an imagination, that when the six first books of Euclid had been read to him, though he was blind, he could describe the requisite diagrams or figures, and demonstrate all the propositions therein contained (2).

(Z) This is the account of Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah's death given us by some of the authors consulted by M. Renaudot; but, according to Khondemir, as cited by M. D'Herbelot, he was packed up tight in a felt, and dragged through all the streets of Baghdâd, where he soon expired (3).

(A) M. Renaudot seems to intimate, doubtless from some of the eastern writers, that the Khalif Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah and all his sons were sewed up together in a leather sack or bag, dragged through the city of Baghdâd, and in that condition miserably perished (4).

covetous, he added immense riches to the treasures which his ancestors had left him. His pride ^a was so great, that the most powerful Mohammedan princes could scarce find access to him. The author of the book intituled Wassaf relates, that this Khalif had caused a stone to be placed at the threshold of the door of his palace, which was as much respected by the Moslems as the famous black stone of the temple of Mecca. Over the door there was a piece of black velvet, which hung as low as a man could reach. When the principal lords made their court to the Khalif, they stood without the palace; to which they rendered almost divine honours, by rubbing their eyes and forehead upon the velvet and the stone, and kissing them with profound humility, in order to pay it homage. When this proud Moslem pontiff went out of his palace, he generally wore either a mask or a vail over his face, to attract the greater respect from the people, whom he did not think worthy of looking upon him. Notwithstanding which, the streets were so crowded ^b when he appeared in public, that they were too narrow to contain the multitude that flocked together to see him; and the windows and balconies, near the way he was to pass, were let at an extravagant price. If he, therefore, really suffered the death mentioned by Khondemir, 'tis not improbable that the Tartars inflicted so public and ignominious a punishment upon him, in order the more effectually to expose the insolent parade he had kept up, and the overstrained regard he had required, through the whole course of his reign ^c.

The Tartars
and Wâset.

HULACU, having committed the reparation of the city of Baghdâd and its fortifications to the late Khalif's prefect, or Sâheb, of the Dîwân, the Wazîr Al' Alkâmî, and Ebn Darnûs, detached Bûkâ Tîmûr, with a body of troops, to Hella, to make himself master of that place. Bûkâ, having executed Hûlâcû's orders, with regard to Hella, marched from thence to Wâset; which ^c he entered with his detachment, staid there a week, and put a multitude of people to death. Ali Ebn Abd'allah Ebn Al Abbâs, according to Ebn Shohnab, is reported to have said, "By God the Khalifat shall continue in my family, till a conqueror shall come from Khorasân;" by which, as that author insinuates, he seems to have predicted Hûlâcû's conquest of Baghdâd. After the Tartars had taken that capital, they set it on fire, and put a vast number of its inhabitants to the sword. The treasures they found there were immense; that place, when it was pillaged by the Moguls, being, if Khondemir may be credited, the richest and most powerful city in the universe ^d.

Several eminent persons die.

THE 656th year of the Hejra was likewise rendered remarkable, if Ebn Shohnab in this point may be depended upon, by the deaths of several eminent men. Al Malec Al Nâser ^d Dawd, the son of Al Malec Al Moadbâhem Isa, and the grand-son of Al Malec Al 'Adel Abu Becr Ebn Ayûb, died in some part of it. He was seized by Al Malec Mogayâtho'ddîn, the Sâheb of Al Carac, who stood in great fear of him, on the road, with some Arabs; and sent by that prince to Al Shawbec, in order to be imprisoned there. But as some of Mogayâtho'ddîn's people were digging a dungeon for him, a messenger from the Khalif Al Mosta'sem Bi'llah arrived at Al Shawbec; who was commanded to bring him immediately to Baghdâd, the Moslem pontiff having constituted him general of the forces destined to act against the Tartars. Upon their arrival at Damascus, they received advice of the catastrophe that had happened at Baghdâd. After, therefore, he had taken leave of the messenger, who returned home, he retired to Al Bowîdha, a place a little to the east of Damascus; where he was soon carried off by the plague, ^e when he had lived about fifty-three years. Al Malec Al Nâser Yusef, the Sâheb of Al Shâm, having been informed of his decease, hastened to Al Bowîdha, lamented over him, and caused him to be carried to Damascus; where, in the Al Sâlehiya, or temple, built by Al Malec Al Sâleh, by the side of his father Al Malec Al Moadbâhem Isa, he was interred. Al Malec Al Nâser Dawd was the author of several excellent poems, a few verses of one of which Ebn Shohnab has preserved. Shahâbo'ddîn Zohair Ebn Mohammed Ebn Ali Ebn Yahya Al Mahlabi, or Mohallebi, secretary to Al Malec Al Sâleh Ayûb, who composed some poems held in good esteem, and was born at Wâdi Nakblab, in the territory of Mecca, in 591, about the same time ^f also departed this life. He was buried in Al Karâfa Al So'gra, or the little cemetery, in a decent and becoming manner. A few of his verses have by Ebn Shohnab, by way of specimen, been handed down to us. Al Sbeikh Shamso'ddîn Yusef Sibî Ebn Al Jawzi, the author of a book intituled, Mîrât Al Zamân, or the mirror of time, and Saifo'ddîn Ali Ebn Sâbeco'ddîn Kazal, or Kozul, known by the name, or surname, of Ebn Al Mashîd, who left behind him certain poems taken notice of by the last mentioned Moslem writer, general and prime minister, Emîr of Emîrs, or Emîr Al Omrâ, of Al Malec Al Nâser Yusef, the Sâheb of Al Shâm, paid likewise the common tribute to nature, the present year. For a full account of the transactions and exploits of the Moguls, on the side of China and Tartary, during the period that we are now upon, particularly the conquest of Long-gan Fû and Lang-chew, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to F. Gaubil, or rather the subsequent part of this volume; in which the history of the Tartars, ^g or Moguls, deduced from the best authors who have treated of that powerful nation, will be contained ^h.

- a THUS have we completed the modern history of the Arabs, from the birth of Mohammed to the reduction of Baghdād, and the abolition of the Khalifat by the Tartars; a work which, though long wished for, has never yet been fully executed in any of the European tongues. For M. l'Abbé De Marigny's performance¹, lately published in France, which by no means merits the attention of the curious and the learned, is so short and imperfect an epitome, that it scarce deserves the name of a history. With regard to the materials of our work, it may not be improper to observe, that it has been extracted almost intirely from the oriental writers. So far have we been from epitomizing any translations, and cloathing them in an English dress, that we have neither servilely followed Erpenius's Latin version of Al Makin, which indeed must be owned faulty enough, nor the celebrated Dr. Pocock's of Abu'l Faraj; but have
- b constantly adhered to the original Arabic, with a religious exactness, and even sometimes emended the vitiated text of the Arab historians themselves. This will be readily acknowledged by all who are thoroughly acquainted with those authors, when they have perused the foregoing sheets. Nay, we have been enabled, by the assistance of the Reverend and Learned Dr. Hunt, Professor of Hebrew and Arabic in the University of Oxford, for which both we and the public are extremely obliged to him, to insert in this work all the particulars recorded in Ebn Shoknab's history, from the commencement of the 512th year of the Hejra, the last mentioned in Erpenius's edition of Al Makin, to the close of 656. As this history has never yet been printed, and Dr. Hunt has collated his manuscript, out of which we have been supplied with so many additional articles, with two others preserved in the Bodleian library, Oxon. in
- c several passages that seemed to have been the most depraved; such a valuable accession to the first part of our large and extensive work, hitherto in vain desired by the learned world, cannot but be highly acceptable to all our most curious and intelligent readers. We have also transfused into the modern history of the Arabs many extracts from Abu'lfeda's chronicle, or general history, for a considerable part of which our most grateful acknowledgements are due to F. Assemani and M. Reiske, two gentlemen justly celebrated over the whole republic of letters for their profound erudition, and from the productions of other eastern authors, whose writings in Europe are very little known. This performance has likewise been enriched with the substance of some critical manuscript notes on Abu'l Faraj, which not seldom correct Dr. Pocock's Latin version of that author, now in the possession of the Reverend John Swinton, M. A. of Christ-
- d Church, Oxford, F. R. S. as well as with M. Kebr's observations upon the Arabic coins found on the coast of the Baltick, in 1722, adorned with inscriptions in the Cifc character, and other valuable pieces, either hitherto inedited, or at present extremely difficult to be procured. All which being maturely weighed, the variety of matter contained in this and the preceding volume will, we flatter ourselves, be deemed an ample compensation for the delays, occasioned by our being always obliged to have recourse to the fountain head, made in the publication of them.

WE should now have proceeded, in conformity to our original plan, to the history of several Mohammedan dynasties, in Africa, Europe, and Asia, whose princes had rendered themselves independent on the Khalifs; had not a deviation from that plan appeared necessary, for the

1. BECAUSE an execution of it would have obliged us to relate many of the Moslem transactions that happened in the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries of the Hejra, after we had given a particular account of the abolition of the Khalifat, which was effected by the Tartars in the seventh century of the Mohammedan æra, and consequently to break in upon the chronological order of the history.
2. BECAUSE the states governed by those dynasties being formed at different times out of the territories belonging to the Khalifs, and owning them, for the most part, as their spiritual directors or sovereign pontiffs, their history must either coincide with that of the Khalifs, or be considered as detached from the body of this work, and consequently be thrown into a supplement or appendix.
- f 3. BECAUSE the old plan is remarkably defective, as will very clearly appear from the additional articles of the new one, which we shall substitute here in its room.
4. BECAUSE, by deferring for some time the publication of the history of those dynasties, we may probably be enabled to oblige our curious readers with a more perfect, distinct, and particular account of them; as some learned men abroad, especially the famous M. Reiske of Leipsick, who has already favoured the public with a Latin version of a considerable part of Abu'lfeda's general history, and promised such a translation of the remainder, may perhaps supply us with some valuable materials for the last part of our work, that have not yet in any of the modern western languages appeared.
- g 5. BECAUSE, by the assistance of these learned men, and our own farther endeavours, we may possibly render a future list of those dynasties still more complete, than even the new one exhibited to the view of our readers here.

6. BECAUSE the history of the Turks, Tartars, and Moguls, who abolished the Khalifat, will much more naturally succeed that of the Khalifs, than the history of the first Mohammedan dynasty, rendered in a great measure at least independent on those princes; which, according to the most approved oriental writers, commenced towards the close of the second century of the Hejra. a

7. BECAUSE we have already referred our curious readers, for many interesting particulars relative to some of the aforesaid dynasties, to the supplement here mentioned. For though we have had frequent occasion to touch upon the affairs of those dynasties in the course of this and the preceding volume, as the history of the Khalifs under whom several of their princes flourished must by a profound silence on that head have been rendered incomplete; yet every person, who has a taste for such a large and extensive work as this, will naturally expect to meet with the whole series of the principal transactions of each Moslem state, in one clear and succinct view, arranged in the chronological order by us all along observed. b

FOR these reasons it has been thought proper to assign the histories of those states places in a supplement, detached from the body of this work; which will be formed of them, and those of a few other independent kingdoms, according to the following plan.

THE history of the Aglabites, Rostamites, Edrisites, and Fâtemites, in Africa.

THE history of the Emirs of Sicily, who gradually rendered themselves independent on the princes of the house of Aglab.

THE history of the Ommiyan Khalifs, and Moorish kings, in Spain.

THE history of the Moslem kingdom, founded by Apocephsus, or Abu Kabs, the Spanish Magrebian admiral, in Crete. c

THE history of the families of Tolûn and Al Akbshid; and of the Fâtemite Khalifs of Egypt.

THE history of the Khalifs of the house of Al Abbâs in Egypt, after the taking of Baghdâd by the Tartars.

THE history of the monarchies which sprung up in Irân, or Persia at large, on the declension of the Khalifs, to the conquest of the Tartars, viz. the Tâherians, Thâherians, or Dhâherians, Saffarians, Sammâniâns, Deylamites, Bûiyâns, Gaznevîds, and Khowârazmians.

THE history of the Indians, to the conquest of India by Mahmûd Gazni, and his successors of the families of Gazni, Gaur, and Kurt, till the subversion of their power by Tîmûr Bek and the Moguls. d

THE history of the princes of the house of Mardâs at Aleppo, and of the family of Hamdân at Al Mawfel, Mâredîn, Aleppo, Kinnisrîn, and other places in the territories of the Khalifs.

THE history of the Sâbebs of Al Batîba, of the descendants of Merwân in Mesopotamia, and of the Okailite Arabs at Al Mawfel.

THE history of the Atâbeks presiding over the Babylonian Irâk, Syria, and the greatest part of Mesopotamia, generally called the Atâbeks of Irâk.

THE history of the Atâbeks of Adherbijân, Fârs, and Laristân.

THE history of the Ayûbites in Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, from Salâb'addîn to the usurpation of the Babrite Mamlûks. e

THE history of the Babrite Mamlûks in Egypt.

THE history of the Circassian, Cbercassian, or Al Jercassian, Mamlûks in that country, to its conquest by the Turks.

THE history of the kingdoms of Sennar and Nubia.

THE history of the kingdom of the Hammadites in Africa.

THE history of the Al Molâhidab, or Ismaelians in Irân and Syria, commonly called Assassins, to their extirpation by the Tartars.

THE history of the Modhafferian dynasty in Persia, to which a period was put by Tîmûr Bek. f

THE history of the Sarbedarian dynasty in Khorasân, the last of whose princes was also subdued by that conqueror.

THE history of the Zeyrites, Al Morabeta, or Molathemiyab, Al Moâbedûn, and Banu Merin, in West-Barbary.

THE history of the Druses, seated on mount Lebanon, and the maritime coast of Syria.

THE history of the kingdoms of Prester John and Tibet.

THE history of the Circassians, or Cbercassians, Afghans, Lesgees, and other nations; of whom no particular account has been given, either in the preceding part of this supplement, or the body of the work.

WE have seen, in the foregoing history of the Khalífs of Baghdád, a series of eleven Abassine Khalífs from Al Kayem, the 26th of that dynasty^a, to the total extinction of the Khalífát, gradually stripped of all their secular authority and power, and reduced to a mere religious and ecclesiastical sway, by a succession of Seljúkian monarchs, the descendants of the famed Togrol Beg^b, who, under the bare title of Emír Al Omrá, which that unfortunate Khalíf bestowed upon him, governed all civil and military affairs with an absolute and despotic power, assuming the royal title of Soltán only over their Seljúk subjects, and their other conquests: so that, in order to set forth the surprising decline, as well as the once amazing extent and power, of the Khalífát, we have been under the necessity of anticipating, in a great measure, the Seljúkian history, which was designed for this second book; without which that of the Khalífs must have appeared maimed and imperfect to any curious reader.

BEING now therefore come to give a particular account of that celebrated dynasty, the same reasons will of course oblige us to recapitulate, tho' in the most succinct manner the subject will admit of, the same monarchs reigns, conquests, and transactions, in order to render their history, which makes no less a figure in the Oriental one, as full, clear, and compleat, as the former, which we have given of the Khalífát, especially as both of them have been so strangely mutilated and disguised by the Greek writers: but of this we shall say the less here, having prefixed at the threshold of the Seljúkian history an account of them, as well as of those others, whether Turkish or Arab, of whom we have made use in the course of it^c. And that, joined to what we have said above, will, we hope, sufficiently account to our readers, not only for every such unavoidable repetition, but likewise for every contrast and inconsistency they may have occasion to remark between those writers. It being, indeed, next to impossible it should happen otherwise, considering the vast difference of their religions and interests: one set of them zealous Mohammedans, the other Heathen; the former full of gall and resentment against those monarchs who had deprived their Khalifs of all their secular power, and raised their own to that envied height upon the ruins of theirs. The other no less jealous of the glory of their own natural princes, representing their every action, motive, and successful step to aggrandisement, in the most advantageous light, and glossing over every thing that casts the least tarnish upon it.

To give one instance for all of the different representations of those writers; When the haughty Khalif Al Kayem [after having been restored to his dignity, and reconducted to his capital, and to his very palace, with the greatest marks of honour and respect by the generous Togrul Begh]^d was observed to hesitate so long whether he should condescend to grant him his daughter in marriage; it was natural for the Moslem historians to represent his behaviour as a mark of his strenuous and laudable zeal for the Mohammedan religion, whilst the Seljuks looked upon it as a piece of ill-timed pride and black ingratitude to so noble a prince and benefactor. We have endeavoured to account for these and other material variations as often as the nature of the subject would permit it; the rest we have chosen to refer to our reader's judgment.

General History of the Turks, and the empires founded by them in Tartary, and the Lower Asia.

CHAPTER I.

The origin, country, and different tribes or branches, of the Turkish nation; with an account of their affairs till the destruction of their empire in Tartary.

SECTION I.

The origin of the Turks.

Turks,*

ALTHOUGH the origin of the Turks hath been already treated of elsewhere ^a, yet several matters relating thereto were left unhandled, because they seemed more proper for this place, where we are to speak particularly of that warlike nation; whose empire shifting gradually from east to west, under different dynasties, hath continued for above 2,000 years, and still subsists under the Othman family, with no small lustre.

TURK is a name known in all languages; and the Arabs have out of it formed the plural Atrâk, that is, Turks ^b. There are three traditions or accounts concerning the origin of these people; one given by themselves, the other by the Persians and Arabs, and the third by the Chineses. The reader has already, in the places before referred to, been made acquainted with that related by the Turkish historians; which is, that they derive themselves from one Turk, whom they affirm to be the son of Yafis or Jafet: we shall, in this place, lay before him the tradition of the Persians, Arabs, and Chineses, as delivered by their historians, accompanied with remarks; wherein we shall examine their respective authority, and shew which a tradition deserves most credit, pursuant to a rule which we have always observed throughout this work: for it is the duty of an historian to examine the memoirs he makes use of, and give his opinion of their fidelity; not out of ostentation, to shew his skill in critical learning, but purely for the sake of truth, and to distinguish the spurious from the genuine. There are authors, who, by their silence on this important head, mislead their readers for fear of disgusting them; and sacrifice their own credit, to save that of fables.

ACCORDING to the Persian historians, the Turks descended from Túr, third son of Fraybdîn (A), the seventh king of Persia; or, according to others, sixth king of the first race of kings called Pishdâd, contemporary with Abraham *. Fraybdîn having divided his dominions among his three sons, Masbarek, or the Eastern Countries (B), fell to the share of Túr, who went and built the city Túrân, in Turkestan not far east from the Caspian sea. Túr having joined his second brother Salm (who had Mogareb, or the West Countries), against his eldest brother Ireje (C), and slain him by treachery, Manucher (D). Ireje's son, slew him; whereby, upon Fraybdîn's death, which happened soon after, Turân, or Turkestan, fell under his dominion.

According to the Persians.

In the fiftieth year of Manucher or Manujer's reign, Afrasiab, son of Pasbangh, king of Turkestan, rebels in that country, under pretence of revenging Túr's death, from whom he was descended; beats Manucher, and obliges him to appoint the river Jihûn, or Amû, the boundary betwixt Persia and Turkestan. Nauden (E) succeeding his father Manucher, Afrasiab invades him with 400,000 men, and never gave over, till he had taken and put him to death; subduing all Persia, which, with Turkestan, became subject to his father Pasbangh.

Exploits of Afrasiab.

BUT the cruelties of Afrasiab soon obliged the Persians to throw off the Turkish yoke; and he quitted Persia, after he had been possessed of it twelve years (F). Yet, in the reign of Kaykobâd, the eleventh king of Persia, Afrasiab invades that kingdom again, but is beaten by Rostâm, the famous Persian champion; who, in the reign of Kaykaws, the twelfth king, cotemporary with Solomon, routed him a second time, pursued him as far as Turân, the capital of Turkestan, and plundered it of vast treasures. Kaykowsraw, the thirteenth king of Persia, sent an army of 30,000 men to invade Turkestan, but they were defeated; and their general, Gudarz, being besieged by the Turks in the mountain of Damawand, in the province of Mazanderân, had been lost, if Rostâm had not come to his relief.

He conquers Persia.

THE fame of that siege brought two kings, neighbours of the Turks, to their assistance; the one called Hhakbon, or Kbakhân, the same as Khâan, a title of the Mogol kings; and the other Shangol; the former of whom was slain. Gudarz afterwards beat four armies of the Turks, took an hundred thousand of them prisoners; and, some time after, Afrasiab himself was taken and slain.

THIS is the account of the original of the Turks, given by Mirkond (G), a famous Persian historian, which differs greatly from that penned by Fadlallah (H), another Persian, who

(A) By some written Aphridun or Afridun, Phridun and Fridun, Pheridun and Feridun; but we never use ph for f, in oriental words.

(B) These are to be understood more properly of the countries to the north of the river Jihûn or Amû, containing all that part of Asia which goes at present by the name of Tartary.

(C) Some write Irege, but improperly; for, in oriental names, the same character ought not to be used for two different sounds, when one of them has a character peculiar to it. To prevent confusion therefore, we never use g before e or i instead of j, which is the proper letter.

(D) It may be written also Manujer or Manujeher, not Manuger, for the reason assigned in note C; much less Manugjer, by joining g and j, to make a double character; which is not only unnecessary, but highly improper, as it may mislead one to read Manugjer. Observe also that we always use ch as in charm, never as kh in chronicle.

(E) Written by some Nuder. This is a consequence of not inserting the vowel points; and of taking the Arabic Waw or double u, sometimes for a vowel.

(F) He is reckoned the 9th king of Persia, of the Pishdâd race, and third from Fraydûn, or Feridûn.

(G) Mirkhond, or Mirkhawend, as the Persians pronounce it, is an abbreviation of the true name of this author; which is Mohammed Ebn Amîr Khawând Shâh, or Khawând Shâh. He wrote a general history of the world, in Persian, from the creation to the year 875 of the Hjra, and of Christ 1471, consisting of seven thick volumes in folio, collected from a great number of histories, general and particular (1).

There is a Persian abridgement of the whole work of Mirkhond, by his son Gayyath Addin, surnamed Khond Amîr; whom D'Herbelot confounds with his father (2). He also wrote a history of the Mogols and Tartars, Jenghîz Khân and his children, which was published about the year 1508 (3).

Teixeira, a Portuguese traveller and geographer, published an abstract of Mirkhond's history; but it is too concise, and, in many places, confused, as well as defective. Nor are the larger extracts of the reigns of kings, furnished by D'Herbelot, in his oriental dictionary, sufficiently particular and accurate. However, for want of better, we have made use of them, and the translation of Teixeira by Stephens, which is also very incorrectly printed.

(H) Called also Khajah Rasîd; from whom chiefly Abu'lghâzi Khân, cited lower down, extracted his history. An account is given of Fadlallah, and his collection, in sect. iii.

wrote the history of the Mogols and Tartars, at the command of Ghazân Khân, one of Jenghiz Khân's successors in Persia. a

It is easier to account how the Persian historians came to differ so much, than to reconcile them: for those who wrote before the Turks obtained the dominion in their country, framed their history to aggrandize their own nation, and depreciate the Turks, whom they hated, for the injuries received from them; whereas those who wrote under the Turkish monarchies, through fear or flattery, conformed themselves to the traditions of their masters; or, not thinking it for their honour to adopt the old Persian account, framed another, more agreeable to their humour; from whence naturally arose the contradictions we meet with.

NOR is the Persian story perhaps more true than that of the Turks; at least it is, on many accounts, liable to exception; particularly as to the chronology of those first kings, and the length of their reigns. b

It is observable, that the account above given of Afrasiab, makes his life of an incredible length. The historian, being aware of this, remarks, on the occasion, that he waged war with so many princes, that he must have lived three or four hundred years. Hence some authors make Afrasiab or Farfiab (I) (which signifies conqueror of Persia), a title common to those kings of Turkestan, who obtained so many victories over the Persians in ancient times: and, for the same reason, others compare his reign to a very dark night which covered Persia.

HOWEVER that be, all the Turkish families, which have made a noise in the world, claim to be descended from this great conqueror. Seljuk, founder of the Seljuk monarchy, would have it believed, that he was the thirty-fourth of his descendants, in a right male line; and the Othman monarchs, who pretend to be related to the Seljuks by the family of Oguz Khân, assume in their titles that of Afrasiab, as well to denote their nobility as valour; especially as they have, in latter times, obtained great victories over the Persians. c

Afrasiab.

AFRASIAB must have been eight or nine generations later than Oguz Khân, who, according to the Turkish historians, was cotemporary with Kay-umarraz, first Persian king of the Pishdad race; and conquered Persia during the minority of his successor Husheng, at what time the great lords were at variance among themselves. But as none of the early Persian historians make mention of these great conquests, some of the latter are apt to think that they might have been effected in the interval between the death of Kay-umarraz, and the reign of Husheng, a space of two hundred years; during which time, we are told, the historians have not taken notice of any transactions. d

HOWEVER this may be, according to the extract we have from Mirkbond, a modern author, he mentions no such interregnum: he only says, that when Kay-umarraz died, his grandson Husheng was a minor; and that, as soon as he came of age, he ascended the throne. Now, though we should consider the throne to be vacant during his minority, yet we cannot rationally suppose that it lasted two hundred years.

Khân of Tur-

ONE would imagine that Abulghazi Khân, who undertook professedly to write a genealogical history of the Turks, could not have avoided speaking of the Khâns of Turkestan, and particularly of Afrasiab: so far from that, he treats of no descents from Oguz, but those relating to the Mogols and Tartars; and never so much as mentions Afrasiab, except once, on occasion of Ilek, Khân of Balâsigûn, who, he tells us, was descended from Afrasiab Khân, without saying any thing more of this hero, or his race. e

alogies,

BUT to return to the origin of the Turks. If the authors, who have come to our hands, had given us the genealogy of Seljuk, it might have been of use in settling this point. However, if we may judge by that of Ozmân, or Othmân, founder of the Othmân empire, their pretences to antiquity seem very suspicious: for, in three lists of that prince's ancestors, two given by Leonclavius, one in his history of the Soltâns, the other in his Mussulman history, and the third by Prince Cantemir, in his history of the growth and decay of the Othmân empire, all taken from the Turkish historians themselves (K); though, in all of them, I say, we meet with the name of Oguz, yet none of them makes mention of either Afrasiab or Turk (L); Bulkbas (M) being put instead of the latter in one of them, which alone runs so high as Japhet. The list found in the history of the Soltâns, which was translated from the Turkish, ends at Lekrek, who is but the fifth in the other given in the history of the Mussulmans. And though both f

(K) We shall insert them hereafter, in the Othmân history.

(L) This omission may possibly be owing to the aversion which the Othmâns have to be called Turks, as will be observed when we come to give their history.

(M) Unless Bulkbas, or Abul Khas, may stand for the father of the Khâs or Gau, who are the wandering Turks or Turkmâns.

a genealogies are said to ascend from son to father, yet Othmán's ancestors by one are fifty-seven, and by the other only seventeen, to Lekrek.

PRINCE Cantemir's list wants three ancestors, found in the former with which it best agrees, and ends at Takva, called in the other Diptakoy (N); only adding, that he was of the house of Jafet. But although this author represents his list as the best and most correct of any which are to be found in the Turkish historians, yet he observes, that his author, Saadi Effendi, does not venture to warrant it as certain. In short, the whole history of the origin and descent of the Turks carries the marks of fiction: for, although we should admit that there might have been such persons as Afrasiab, Ogúz, and Turk, among the ancestors of the Turks, yet it is manifest, that both the times and actions ascribed to those heroes must be false (O), as well as the tradition of Turk being the son (P) of Japhet; since he is not to be found in the genealogy of that patriarch, given by Moses, which both the Christians and Mohammedans follow.

THE truth may possibly be, that the Sultans of either the Gazna or Seljuk families, first Turkish sovereigns in Persia, who were Mohammedans, having had, by tradition, one Turk for their common ancestor, or feigning him to be such, their historians, to honour them, by carrying his origin as high as they could, made him the son of Jafet; whose posterity, according to the Mohammedans, as well as Jews and Christians, peopled the north parts of Asia. The Othman Turks, who succeeded the Seljuks, thought they could not do better than claim or acknowledge the same original; and the successors of Jenghiz Khán in Persia, the two Bukbarias and Karazm, being Mohammedans, consented to be branches of Turks, that they might have the son of so great a patriarch as Jafet at the head of their ancestors. It must farther be considered, that they who were the first historiographers to this last race, being Persians, took care to make their history tally with that of former writers of their nation, who made all the inhabitants of Tartary, from one end to the other, to be sprung from the same common stock. But it is hardly to be presumed that the Mogols, and other tribes of the east, who continued in their old religion, acknowledged themselves to be descended from Turk, though they were possibly a branch of the Turkish nation; whom yet they always hated for their inroads, and had lately conquered.

ACCORDING to the Chinese historians, the Huns and Turks are the same people; who, at different times, went under those different names. They give them the appellations of Hyong-ni and Tú-kí-ik, that is, Huns and Turks; the first is that which they had before the Christian æra; the second, that which a remnant of those Huns, re-established in Tartary, assumed afterwards; and say that they dwelt in the neighbourhood of the great desert, extending from the country of Korea, in the east, to that of the Getes, in the west; which part of Tartary was their habitation from all antiquity: that Mau-ton, son of the last Chinese monarch of the first family, or the Hya race, was the first Tanjú, or emperor, of these Huns; and the same with the famous Ogúz Khán, so renowned amongst the present Turks and Tartars, and acknowledged for the founder of their empire: that, in the reign of one of his successors, they came to be divided under two distinct Tanjús; one branch was called the northern, the other the southern Huns; but the Persian historians distinguished them by the names of Tartars and Mogols: that the northern Huns, being destroyed by the Chinese, removed westward; and passed, at least part of them, into Europe: that the southern Huns, after this, became best known by the name of Turks; about which time they were subdued by the Juijen, eastern Tartars; and at length, being greatly reduced, they retired into the mountain of Erganakon, where they forged iron for their conquerors: that they afterwards overthrew them in their turn, and established a new empire under the name of Turks, as will be more fully related lower down.

IN this account we discover two very material facts, hitherto unknown to the historians of Europe, and perhaps to those of the west of Asia; namely, first, the original of the Huns, about which Jornandes, and other writers, have related such ridiculous fables: secondly, that the Huns and Turks are the same people, under different names; which latter seems not to have been given till about the year 500, as noted before; at what time they became known by it in Europe.

(P) His right of primogeniture is also disputed; for some historians give it to Chin, whom others make the second son. However, the oriental Turks maintain, that Turk was the eldest, whom they call Jafet Oglan, the son of Jafet, and account the founder of their nation (1)

A general description of Great Tartary, with an account of the Turkish tribes or nations inhabiting it, according to the Arab authors.

Great Tartary.

BEFORE we treat of the several branches of the Turkish nation inhabiting Great Tartary, it will be necessary previously to insert some general account of that vast region; that the reader may be better able to form a notion in what part of it the several tribes formerly were, or at present are, situated.

Bounds and extent.

TARTARY, or rather Tatary, in its greatest extent, is situate between fifty-seven and one hundred and sixty degrees of longitude (A); and between the thirty-seventh and fifty-fifth degrees of latitude: being bounded on the north by Siberia, or that part of North Asia which belongs to Russia; on the west by the rivers Don (B), the Wolga, and Kama, which separate it from Russia; on the south, by the Euxine and Caspian seas, Karazm, the two Bukhariâs, China, and Korea; and on the east, by the oriental or Tartarian ocean. From this account it appears, that Tartary, or Great Tartary, as we call it, is a vast region, situate almost in the middle of Asia, and extending the whole length of it, in that part from west to east, the space of one hundred and four degrees in longitude, or four thousand one hundred and forty-five geographical miles: but its breadth is not proportionable; being not above nine hundred and sixty miles where broadest, and, where narrowest, three hundred and thirty.

Division.

THIS vast region is divided into two great parts; the one called the Western, the other the Eastern Tartary: which last is scarce one-fourth part so large as the former; beginning at about the one hundred and thirty-ninth degree of longitude, and ending at the one hundred and sixty-first. Hence it contains only twenty-two degrees of longitude, or is but nine hundred geographical miles from west to east, though eight hundred and eighty broad, from south to north. But with this part of Tartary we have nothing to do at present: for although some oriental authors would derive all the inhabitants of Tartary in general from the same stock, making the people of Katay, under which denomination they seem to comprise all the inhabitants of Eastern Tartary (of whom they had scarce any knowledge at all), to be descended from Turk, the son of Jafet; yet, in the genealogy of those tribes given by Abû'lghâzi Khân, and doubtless in that of Fadlallah (C), from whom chiefly he extracted his history, we meet with none but what are to be found in Western Tartary: for which reason we shall confine our description, in this place, to that part only.

Western Tartary.

IN this vast region of Western Tartary (containing in extent one hundred and thirty-nine degrees of longitude out of one hundred and sixty-one), although the lands belonging to every nation or tribe are marked out, and well known to the inhabitants; yet as there are few or no cities, towns, or villages, to direct strangers, their several situations or possessions are best distinguished and ascertained by the natural marks or boundaries, such as mountains, rivers, lakes, and the like, with which Western Tartary abounds. But it will be sufficient for our present purpose to mention only the most remarkable of them.

Chief mountains.

THE principal mountains, or rather chains of mountains, found in this part of Great Tartary, may be divided into three classes: first, those which run along the northern borders of it; and though perhaps not always contiguous, or of the same denomination, go under the general name of Ulug Tâg or Dâg, that is, the great mountain: secondly, those which make the southern bounds, and are called Kichûg Tâg, or the lesser mountain: the third great chain is called mount Altay, lying nearly in the middle, between the Caspian sea and Eastern Tartary, and extending between the other two, in about the one hundred and tenth degree of longitude.

THE chief deserts or plains are, first, those of Kipjâk or Kapchâk in the west, extending many days journey on the north and north-east of the Caspian sea. These are generally fertile lands. Secondly, those stretching eastward from Kipjâk to mount Altay. Thirdly, that called the great Kobi, or sandy desert, by the Mogols, and Sba-mo by the Chineses. It is divided by ridges of hills into three or four parts, and extends eastward from mount Altay to Eastern Tartary.

Rivers.

The Jaïk

THE principal rivers of Western Tartary, besides the Dnieper, Don, and Wolga, are the Jaïk, or Taïk, and Yem, both descending from the Ulug Tâg, and falling into the Caspian

(A) Reckoning from the west end of the isle of Ferro, supposed to be twenty degrees west of Paris, and seventeen degrees thirty-five minutes west of London.

(B) The limits might be carried westward, beyond the Dnieper or Borjphenes; but these parts were rather conquered of later ages, than originally inhabited by Turkish or Tartar tribes.

(C) We cannot be positive as to this point, because De la Croix, in his history of Genghis Kân, taken chiefly from Fadlallah, has mentioned only the Mogol tribes.

a sea, on the north side. The river Ili or Kbongis, which rises out of the Kichuk Täg, on the borders of Little Bucharía, about the one hundred and fourth degree of longitude, and runs north-west into the lake Palkasi (D); on this river the Khán of the Eluths or Kalmúks usually resides. The river Irtish, Irtis, or Erbis, which rises into mount Altay, and runs westward, inclining to the north, between two branches of it, into the lake Saysan (E); from whence issuing again, it passes north-west, through part of Siberia, and falls into the Obi, which has its source out of the same mountains, about one degree to the north of that of the Irtish; and seven or eight degrees to the north-east rises the Kem or Jenisea, which runs westward for the space of seven or eight degrees, and then, turning northward, enters Siberia.

THE next river of note is the river Selinga, which rises out of the lake Kofogol or Hutúkú (F): Selinga not far from the source of the Jenisea, takes a sweep southward round by the east, and falls northward into the lake Baykal, in Siberia, about thirty leagues north-west of the city Selinghinskoy, which stands upon it. Into the Selinga runs the Orkon, coming from the south-west; Orkon and into the Orkon the Tula, rising eastward in Mount Kentey: two rivers very famous in Tula. the history of Jenghíz Khán. Out of the same mountain (G), and not far from the source of the Tula, rise two other rivers still more famous than the former; first, the Onon, called also Onon or by the Mogols, Saghalian Ula, or the dragon river, and by the Russians Amúr; which running north-eastward, and then taking a large sweep by the south, rolls along the bounds of Eastern Tartary, and falls into the Eastern ocean, in about the 53d degree of latitude, and 159th of longitude. On its bank stand two cities; Nerchinskoy, or Nipchew, a frontier of the Russians, almost due north of Pe-kin, in China; and Saghalian Ula, possessed by the Chineses.

THE second river is the Kerlon, or Kerulon; which running north-eastward, falls into the lake Kulon, or Dalay (H), and passing out again, under the name of Ergona, or Argun, joins the Saghalian Ula, about one hundred and seventy miles beyond Nerchinskoy. To these let us add the river Kálka, from whence, tho' small, the Kálka-Moguls, or Mongols, take their name. It rises in the mountains, separating the Eastern from the Western Tartary; and, running westward, falls into the lake Puir, and then into that of Kulon, before spoken of.

HAVING mentioned the principal lakes of Western Tartary, in our account of the rivers, we shall take notice only of two more; first, the Kámish, about four hundred and eighty-four miles long, and near as many broad (I). The second, Isikol; a lake of small extent (K), but renowned among the inhabitants in the west of Tartary, for being the place where Turk, their great ancestor, fixed his residence, or royal seat.

As to the political state of Western Tartary, we shall only say in general, that it is intirely possessed by the Mogol tribes, under several Kháns, whose dominions are named after the people, or their prince who rules over them. The first and chief of these Mogol nations are the Eluths, nicknamed Kalmúks by the Mohammedan Tartars. These are divided under two Kháns. The first are called Ayuki Eluths, from their Khán Ayuki, who has the western part of Tartary, bounded by the river Jaik, containing most of that country which was formerly called Kipjá, or Kapchák, and extending about 10 degrees eastward from the river Jaik, in the 72d degree of longitude. The second are called Dsongari or Kontaisi Eluths, from the title of their prince, stiled Kontaisi, whose dominion extends from 72 degrees of longitude as far as the end of mount Altay, in about the 102d degree.

THE second nation or branch of the Mogols are the Kálka, Kbálkba, or Hálba Mogols: their country extends from mount Altay eastward to the source of the river Kálka, whence they derive their name, in the borders of Eastern Tartary, and 139th degree of longitude. The third branch are the Mogols or Mongols, properly so called; whose territories lie to the south of that of the Kálkas, between them and the great wall of China; to which empire both nations are subject.

BESIDES these Kháns (who with their subjects are idolaters, of the religion of Tibet, or the Dalay Lama) there are two others in Great Tartary, who possess that part of it called Turkestan, situate to the north of Great Bucharía and Karazm, between those countries and the dominions of the Eluths; of which we shall speak more particularly in a subsequent section, and now return to our subject; for explaining which, this short description of Tartary, with the help of maps, may suffice.

(D) It is about forty miles long and thirty broad, in latitude forty-eight degrees, longitude ninety-seven, reckoning from the isle of Ferro.

(E) Saysan or Isan, called also Honhotu Nor, ninety miles long from west to east, and forty broad; in latitude forty-seven degrees thirty minutes, longitude one hundred and four degrees.

(F) Or Klutuku, 70 miles long from south to north, and 20 broad. In lat. 52°. long. 118.

(G) It lies in about 126 degrees of long. and 48 of lat.

(H) Sixty miles long from south-west to north-east, and 27 broad. In lat 48° 30'. long. 135.

(I) In lat. 50. long. 83° 30'.

(K) Lat. 46°. long. 94° 30'.

Turkish nations,

according to
the Arabs.

It is generally agreed by the oriental historians, that the inhabitants of Great Tartary are originally Turks, or so many branches of the same nation: but those who wrote of Turkish affairs, and even the Turks themselves who inhabited Persia before the time of Jengbiz Khân, seem to have had but a slender knowledge of the several tribes of people into which their nation was said to be divided. The Arab author of the book miscalled The geography of the Nubian, who wrote about the middle of the twelfth century, says, the Turks were branched into many different kinds of people; as the Tobbat (L), Taghazghaz (M), Kharkirs, Kaymaks, Khazaljes (N), Hofarens, Mohametans, Torkhosh, Odkhosh, Khoshbaks (O), Khalaj (P), Olghars, and Bolghars (Q).

THIS geographer affords us little more concerning those different people than their names^a; but describes the countries inhabited by some of them; from whence we shall extract so much as may be proper to lay before our readers.

Tobbot.

THE country of Tobbot (Tibet) with part of India, borders on the west on Mâwâra'nabr (or Great Bukharia), and on the east on Sin (or China). The chief cities are Tobbat and Shib, Wakhan, Sakita, Berwan, Ug, Mejag, Ramajag, and Danekbu. The country of Wakhan and Sakita border on those of Wakhash and Jil, in Mâwâra'nabr. Wakhan abounds with rich mines of the finest gold and silver. In it is a lake called Berwân, forty leagues in length, and twenty-four in breadth.

Taghazghaz.

THE land of the Taghazghaz, who are governed^b by a Khakân, is bounded on the east by Kharkir, on the south by Sin, and on the north by the people of Kaymak. It contains four cities; Kakhân or Tantabee, Masa, Jormok, and Bakhwân. Kakhân, the capital, has twelve iron gates, and is seated on a great river, that runs eastward: 'tis two months journey from Bersajan the higher, in the country of Farghâna (R), and twelve south-east from Bakhwân. In the mountains near this last city are found the musk goats. There is among the Taghazghaz Turks a nation who adore the fire^c.

Kharkir.

THE inhabitants of Kharkir border on the sea of Sin, and possess four populous cities, all lying within the compass of four days journey. The country is large and fertile, abounding with water. Some of its rivers descend from the country of Sin; the greatest of them, called Menbar, is very rapid; running between rocks, and driving mills for grinding rice and wheat. On its banks grow aloe trees and costum dulce. In its stream is found a fish called shatrun; which, being eaten, affects the seminal vessels. It is said, that it has not many bones; that the flesh is divided into joints, and does not smell like other fish. The city where the king resides is most strongly fortified, with walls, ditches, and counterescarpes, and is three stages from the sea; where there is a large peninsula, called that of the Hyacinth, from the precious stones of the same name, which are found there in abundance^d.

Kaymak.

THE land of the people of Kaymak has, on the south, Taghazghaz; on the south-west Khazalj, where it joins with Tobbot; on the west Khalakh; and on the east the sea of darkness; wherein are islands, to which the merchants pass on horseback, and lie every night on trees. The king of Kaymak is equal to the greatest monarchs for power and grandeur; the inhabitants are very numerous, and worship the fire. It contains sixteen cities; the principal whereof are Astur, Buragh, Sisian, Mannon, Mostânab, Khakân (S); the regal seat, Benjar, Dholan, and Hanawes; to these may be added Karan Hiya.

mas.

THE great river Ghammas, rising in the mountains of Benjar, runs eastward to the city Astur, on its south bank, six stages distant, through the desert; thence to Sisian, on the north side, twelve stages; it proceeds forwards to the regal city Khakân, which stands on the south side: then turns northwards to Mostânab, on its west bank, four stages distant. From this city it advances eastward till it falls into the sea, one stage distant. Along all the coast of Kaymak is found gold, when the sea rages; and the country produces plenty of musk; but not so good as that of Tobbot, which is the best of all^e.

FROM Karan Hiya, the first city of Kaymak, to Khakân, or the royal city, are twenty-four stages, from west to east. From Khakân to Buragh four stages, south-westward; and eighteen stages, through the desert of the Turks of Khalakh, to Tarân (T). From Tarân to Benjar are thirty-six stages: thus, to Kasra forty-five miles; to Damorrtab, crossing a mountain in the way, four stages; to Kbaykham castle twenty stages, eastward; and to Benjar four stages.

(R) Which belongs to Mâwâra'nabr.

(S) Khakân, with this author, is the name of the chief city of every country of the Turks.

(T) Perhaps rather Taraz.

- a THE country of Khazalja has several cities in it; among which are Bersajan the higher, Khazaljans, Nawaketh, Rudban, Talan, and Bersajan the lower. From Atas (in Farghana) to Bersajan the higher are six stages, through the country of the Turks: to Nawaketh, in the entrance of Khazalja, almost ten stages. From Atrakana to Karantia, the first city of Kaymak, ten stages, through the deserts. From Tarán to Bersajan the lower, consisting of towns and fields, thirty-nine miles. From Bersajan the lower to the higher thus; first, to Ayas castle six miles; to Kukfawb twelve miles; to Kulan Ghaya town fifteen miles; to Borak town fifteen miles: it stand on a mountain, from whence the river Borak descends, and, running westward, through the territories of Aylan, falls into the river Ajshib (the Sibun, or Sir): to Ajsira fifteen miles; to Ghane Burekt town twenty-four miles; to Jerk town twelve miles; to the city of Khakán twelve miles; to Kobab thirty-six miles; to Bersajan the higher near ten stages, with the Karawán^f.

THE Arabian geographer says little or nothing of the other Turkish nations, and their countries, except the Odhkos and Olgharians; of whom almost every thing he relates may be suspected of fable. We shall, however, give the reader a taste of what he has collected on the occasion. The country of the Odhkos has on the west the land of Al Aazaz; on the east nations, and their generations. In the south part is the lake Takama, 250 miles in compass, whose water is exceeding green, but sweet. Four stages east of the lake is the mountain Jorda, or Bald; which is so slippery, that to get to the city at top, they were forced to dig into the bowels of the hill, and to ascend by the help of ladders. The north side of the country is covered by the great mountain Taraan, extending for eighteen stages from west or east.

THIS tribe of Turks are reported to have broad faces, great heads, thick of hair, and flaming eyes. They have a peculiar language, and worship the fire. However, some of them are pretended to be Moslems or believers^g.

EIGHT days journey from the castle of Jordab aforesaid is the mountain of Kokaiya, which is inaccessiblely steep, and always covered with snow and thick clouds. It extends thence to the north of Bolgar, and surrounds the country of Tajij and Majij, which is full of cities, cultivated lands, and exceeding populous^h.

As these are the famous nations of Gog and Magog, after whom so much enquiry has been made in Europe, to little purpose hitherto, it may not be amiss to give the reader some account of them, and their country, from the Arabian authors, who pretend to be acquainted with both. As a convincing proof of this, they inform us, that the people of Tajij are of a proper size; but those of Majij not above three spans high: that they are covered with a sort of thick down, and have large round hanging earsⁱ.

BUT let us hear the report of an eye-witness, reputable by his office, Salam the interpreter; who was sent by no less a personage than Mohammed Amin Billab, sixth Khalifah of the Abbás family (U), in order to discover the mountain of Kokaiya, with the bank of Tajij and Majij, of which such strange things had come to his ears.

SALAM, who had with him fifty men, and provisions for a whole year, leaving Sarra Man-ray (X), where the Khalifahs then resided, took his way by Tafis (Y), having had letters from his master to the king of Armenia, who gave him others to the king of Al Sarir (Z). This king sent them to him of Lán (A), and he passed them on to the lord Fila Sháb, who gave them five guides. Having, in twenty-seven days, reached the bounds of the regions of Besejert (B), they came to a black long stinking land, in which they travelled ten days, using perfumes, to keep off the noxious smells. They travelled a month farther, through a desert country, where they saw the ruins of many cities, destroyed by the people of Tajij and Majij. In six days more they arrived at the castles near the mountain Kokaiya; in the opening of which appears the bank. Those in the castles spoke Persian and Arabick. There is also a city there, whose king is called Khakán Odhkos; and the inhabitants, who are Moslems, have temples and academies.

FROM that city they went to see the bank, two stages distant. Here they found a mountain, with a ditch cut in it one hundred and fifty cubits wide, and within the chanel an iron gate, ^{Surprising bank.}

(Y) Tafis, or Tefis, is at present the capital of Georgia.

(A) Or Allan.

(B) Rather perhaps Beskbert, or Baskir, a people of Kipjak, bordering on the Russian dominions. However that be, as the course of this journey is so manifestly northward, 'tis unaccountable how Bayer should suppose Lán to be Labijan in Ghilán; and Besejert, Besa or Phasa (the old Pasagarda), to the south-east of Persepolis: as if the country of Tajij and Majij, in Tartary, lay to the south-east of Sarra Manray, instead of the north-east; or that to get to Besa, instead of going directly south-eastward, the way was first to travel twice as far north to Tafis, and then turn back again south-eastward, to reach that city.

gate, fifty cubits high, supported by great buttresses, with an iron bulwark, crowned with a iron turrets, reaching to the top of the mountain, which is as high as one can well see. The reader, by the height of the gate, may judge of the size of the valves, lintels, and threshold of the gate, with that of the bolts, lock, and key, which are described. What is most curious of all, the governor of the castles before-mentioned takes horse every Friday, with ten others, and, coming to the gate, strikes the bolt three times with a hammer, weighing five pounds, and then listening, hears a murmuring noise within; from whence they conclude, that the Tajîj and Majîj are confined within bounds. Salam was told, that they often appeared on the turrets of the bulwark; and that a high wind had once blown three of them over; who, being measured, were found to be each but three spans high (C). Salam returned by the cities Lokman, Aaraban, Berfejan, and Taraz, to Samarkand, after having spent twenty-eight months in the journey.

The Olghars. THE Olghars possess inaccessible mountains, on which are garisoned castles; where the kings fortify themselves, and lay up their provisions. The chief of these, and capital of Olgharia, is named Hiyâm. At the south foot of the hill, on which it stands, runs the large river Rudba (D), eastward; and seven days journey down the stream is another city, callen Jajân. There are in this country several other cities.

Mountain Moregar. NORTHWARD of the city Hiyâm is the great mountain Moregar, which is covered with snow, and divides Olgharia from Besjert (E). In a river, descending from it southward, is found much gold, and Lapis Lazuli; and in the woods, along its banks, are caught the Alnebr, monstrous beasts, which are carried into all parts of Armenia and Greece; whose skin is very beautiful, and furs surpass all others in goodness: but the yellow fox-skins, being scarce, are reserved for the use of the kings of those regions.

ON the side of the above-mentioned river stands a high mountain, out of which gush a thousand springs, that flow into the river Margha. On the top of it stand Nuja and Badegha, one day's journey asunder; and on its skirts Daranda and Darku, three stages distant from each other; and the last, which lies most eastward, ten from Jajân. The lake of Karazm is six stages distant to the south^k.

Gaz and Walak Turks. BEYOND the mountain Moregar, southward, dwells a nation of wandering Gâz Turks, called Khanaket, who destroyed the land of Samarik, or Walak Turks, which is divided from that of Khanaket by the same mountain. To Samarik belongs the city Lokhmân, seated on the mountain Sunia, out of which rises the river Lokhmân, on whose west side stands Danbaba, a beautiful city; from whence boats go up the stream, as far as a great lake, and thence to the city Jermân^l.

Bolgar country. WITH regard to the country of Bolgar, it is only observed, that there is in it a city called Babîn, built upon the top of a hill, and strongly fortified: that, to the north, lies the mountain Kokaiya; beyond which are found no dwellings, nor any living creature, by reason of the intense cold: and, lastly, that the land is washed^m by the Atel (F). This river consists of two branches; the eastern, flowing out of Kbarkir, between Kaymâk and Olghâr, runs westward, till it comes to Bolgar: there it divides into two arms (G), one of which turns to the east, and passing through the countries of Rûs (H), Bolgar, and Bertas, at length falls into the sea of Khozâr (I): the other flows westward, to the sea of Nites (K).

Khozar kingdom. THE city of Atel (I), twenty stages from the borders of Bertas, is the capital of Khozâr, and divided into two parts by the river, very populous, and three miles long. The king of Khozâr resides in the east part; the merchants and commonalty in the other. The Khozârs are Christians, Mohammedans, and Pagans: but there is no contention among them about religionⁿ.

To this account of the Arab geographer we may add, from others, that the Khozârs were descended from Khozâr, the youngest brother of Turk; that their king was stiled Khakân; that they made a great figure in the seventh century; and that the capital of the country was called Balanjar: besides which, two other cities are mentioned, viz. Siyakoweth and Saray^o.

Remarks on the foregoing account.

FROM this account of the Turkish nations, and the countries they inhabit, the reader may perceive how little Tartary was known to the Arabs; as well as what a knack they have at invention. They have mentioned rivers, lakes, and mountains, which, in all probability, a never were in being; nor are their names to be found in later writers: they have placed large and rich cities, where never any thing but deserts existed; and, in many particulars, had recourse to fiction. In short, if we except the names of nations, which might have been formerly in use, and of a few places which are still known, the whole seems to be romance. Neither are we sure, from what our author has written, that all the nations whom he mentions were branches of the Turks: in all probability they were only so in the opinion of the Arabs; it being customary to call the different people, under one power or dominion, by the same name; or to give the name of the people who are nearest, to all the rest who are beyond them, either for want of knowing better, or to avoid prolixity in speaking of them.

S E C T. III.

b THE oriental authors, who wrote in and after the time of the Seljuk Soltans reigning in Turkish Lif- the west of Asia, seem to have been a great deal better acquainted with the Turkish nations, than the Arabs, although some of them extend their branches much too far; including, under that denomination, not only the Mogols, Tatars, and Igurs or Vigurs, but also the inhabitants of Kitay, or Katay^a, which contained the northern provinces of China, and great part of Tartary, to the north and north-west of it. Others, as Mirkbond and Arabshah (A), more distinctly inform us, that the posterity of Turk was divided into four great tribes, named Erlat, Jalayr, Kawjin, and Berlas, or Perlas^b, which were again subdivided by Oguz Khan into twenty-four others, of which the principal are the Mogols, the Turks properly so called, the Igurs, the Kangbelis (B), the Kipchaks, the Kazelaks (C), and the Tamgaj (D). These twenty-four tribes were likewise divided into the right and left wing, called by the Mogols Jivangar and Berangar, which, by their fundamental laws, were never to mix or marry one with the other^c.

THIS scrap, which D'Herbelot has given us from the oriental historians, was all to be met with on the subject, till the history of Abulghazi Khan of Karazm (E) appeared of late, one of whose chief designs was to treat particularly of the tribes of the Turkish nation, and mark the descent of each. As this book is one of the chief funds which afford materials for the history of the Turks and Tartars, it will be proper to inform the reader on what authority it is grounded. Abulghazi Khan, sixth successor of Hulaku, grandson of Jenghiz Khan, who subdued Persia, being desirous to preserve the memory of the Mogol tribes, as well as the great exploits of his ancestors, sent one Pulad, or Fulad, a nobleman skilled in the Mogol language, into Tartary, in order to collect materials for that purpose. At his return, the Khan put his memoirs into the hands of his grand Wazir or Visier Fadlallah, that he might compose a regular history from them; and ordered Pulad to assist him in the work, which consists of three folio volumes (F), and was finished in the year of the Hejrah 702, and of Christ 1302. It was from this history chiefly that Abulghazi Khan extracted his, excepting as to that part which relates to the Uzbeks of Great Bukharia and Karazm.

(A) Arab Shah, a Turkish historian, who wrote the life of Timur-bek, or Tamerlan, in elegant Arabic: but gives that prince a very bad character; probably on account of the victories obtained by him over the Turks, and the ravages he made in their country. This history has been published in French, translated by Vatier.

(B) Or Kanklis.

(C) Or Kazlaks; but Karliks in Abulghazi Khan.

(D) Tamgaj, or Thomgaj, or Tamgaz, is by all the oriental authors reckoned a tribe of Turks, which he takes to be the Gaz, descended from Gaz, tenth son of Jafet; and from them came the Turkmans. But Abulfeda says, the country of Tamgaj is that of Katay. See D'Herbelot, Bibl. orient. Art. Gaz, Tamgaj, and Tamgaj.

(E) It is written in the Mogol or Turkish language, and under the title of Shajari Turki, that is, a genealogical history of the Turks. It is divided into nine parts: the two first treat of the Khans and tribes descended from Turk, the son of Jafet, to the time of Jenghiz Khan: the third relates the life and actions of that conqueror: the five next those of his sons and successors in the several parts of Tartary: and the ninth treats of the Khans of Kharazm, to the death of the author, who was sovereign of that country, which lies on the east side of the Caspian sea. The Khan dying in 1663, before the history was quite finished, his son and successor Amusha Mehmet Khan, completed it two years after. Besides the history of Khejaki Rashid, as he calls Fadlallah, and eighteen others which he does not name, he made use of particular memoirs relating to several Mogol tribes (1). Abulghazi Khan's history, which was procured by Strahlenberg, while prisoner in Siberia, has been translated into Russian, German, French, and English.

(F) The first volume is in the French king's library, and was translated by De la Croix the son, but not published.

tribes.

ACCORDING to this author, the several different nations or tribes of people, called Aymaks, may be distinguished into two sorts; those descended from the Mogols or Mongols, and those not descended from them. Whence many of these latter are derived, does not appear from Abu'lghâzi Khân's history^d; but they must be either Mogols or Tartars, who had lost the memory of their origin; or else tribes sprung from the Khâns preceding Alanza; for all the Aymaks, it seems, are derived from the Khâns.

WITH respect to the tribes not descended from the Mogols, the following five derive their name from Ogûz Khân; viz. the Kankli, Kipjaks, Karliks, Kalach, and Vigurs; the last of which only, as we are informed, sprung from Mogul Khân.

1. THE Kankli dwelt, for some time, jointly with the Turkmâns, in the sandy deserts; but when these last began to live in towns, the former went to inhabit about the rivers Issikul and Talash (G), where they have remained for a long time. Jenghîz Khân put to the sword ten thousand of them, whom he found there; the rest, to the number of fifty or sixty thousand, had before become subjects to Soltân Mohammed Karazm Shâh, whose mother was of this tribe.

2. THE Kipjaks (H) have always inhabited the banks of the Don, Volga, and Jaïk.

3. THE Karliks have constantly dwelt in the mountains of the Mogols country, living on the produce of their lands. This tribe elected their Khân, and might have amounted to twenty thousand families in the time of Jenghîz Khân. This conqueror having sent an envoy to persuade them to submit, Arslân, their Khân, carried him a pretty daughter, besides very magnificent presents. The receiver, in return, gave him a relation in marriage: but, when he was gone, said, the name Arslân Sirak (I) suited him better than that of Arslân Khân. The Moguls use the term Sirak, signifying a poor-spirited man, when they speak of the Tajiks (K), who are a very simple people^e.

4. KAL-ACH signifies hungry. There are, at present, several numerous branches of this tribe, not only in the country of Mawara'nabr, or Great Bukharia, but also the Persian provinces of Khorasân and Irâk^f.

5. THE Takrins. Bugay Zinanz, Khân of this tribe, being invited by Jenghîz Khân to submit, he sent, among other presents, a daughter, who appeared so beautiful in the eyes of Ugaday, or Ostay Khân, that, after his father's death, he married her, and loved her above all his other wives.

6. THE tribe of the Kerghis, which was but thin at first, increased considerably in time, by the accession of Moguls, and other families who joined them, for sake of the agreeable country which they inhabited. Urus Inal, their prince, unable to resist Jenghîz Khân, who summoned him, by two ambassadors, to submit, sent that great monarch magnificent presents, and, among the rest, a bird called Shungar (L). The Ikar, or Ikrân Murân, now called Jenisea, glides along the borders of the Jerghis (M), and falls into the Azokh Jenghîz, or bitter sea. Near its mouth, our author tells us, there is a great town, called Alakhzin, which signifies pieb (N); which name it took, because the inhabitants thereof, and the dependent towns, have none but pieb horses (O): these horses are very tall; a colt of a year old being as large as a horse of three any-where else. There are likewise rich silver mines in its neighbourhood. The story goes farther; that the favourite widow of Tauli Khân, son of Jenghîz Khân, to whose share the Kerghis fell, sent three officers, with a thousand men, up the river, by water, to discover this country. After a long stay, they returned, with only three hundred of their company; the rest being lost, as they pretended, by the badness of the air. These gentlemen confirmed, as truth, all which had been reported of the place; and even declared, that they had loaded their vessels with silver, but were obliged to throw it overboard, for want of hands to get it up against the stream.

(G) The French translator says they are now called Tekiz and Ili: but he seems to have been mistaken, at least with regard to the last.

(H) Called also Kopjaks and Kapchaks. These are supposed to be the same with the Kofaks, who inhabit the same parts: and both may be the remains of the Kbozârs or Khazari, who had an empire to the north of the Caspian sea, in the time of the Greek emperor Justinian.

(I) This must signify, the sneaking lion.

(K) Tajiks are the trading people or inhabitants of conquered countries: the Tartars of Karazm give the Persians that nick-name in contempt or aversion, being their enemies, and of a different sect in religion.

(L) Or Shenkar; a bird of prey, found in the plains of Tartary.

(M) At present, by Kyriakov's map, they are placed near the borders of Russia, and the Ural Tâg.

(N) Strahlenberg mentions the ruins of a town called Alak Sin or Chin, which signifies the chequered tribe; but places it without the great wall of China (1).

(O) The Russians have a tradition like this, of a pieb people, somewhere in Siberia, called by them Pesraya Orda, or the pieb tribe. See history of the Turks, &c. p. 648.

(1) See his hist. geogr. desc. of the north and east parts of Europe and Asia, introd. p. 75.

^a 7. THE tribe of Ur-mankats, so called, from their living in places most remote, and full of forests, are neighbours to the Kerghis, on the Ikâr Murân, and submitted, at the same time, to Jenghiz Khân. There is another tribe who bear the same name; and follow the same course of life, but they are Mogols ¹.

8. THE tribe of Tatars, or Tattars (by the western nations of Europe called Tartars), one of the most ancient and famous of the Turkish nation, being descended from Tatar Khân (P), consisted formerly of above seventy thousand families, and had only one Khân, who was very potent: but coming afterwards to be divided into several branches, its power, by degrees, declined. The principal branch settled in the country of Biurnaver, near the borders of Kitay, to which it was brought in subjection: but, in some time revolting, the emperor of Kitay forced them, by arms, to return to their duty: and this happened often to be the case with them. Another branch went and inhabited the river Iâr, or Ikrân Murân ^k above-mentioned. Gaubil informs us, from the Chinese annals, that, in the time of Jenghiz Khân, they were settled along the rivers Kerulon, and Onon or Amur; and were tributary to the emperor of the Kim, who reigned in Kitay ¹. From this tribe all the rest, and the country they inhabited, took their name, among the nations of the southern Asia and of Europe ^m.

9. THE Virats (Q). This tribe inhabit the banks of the Sekir Murân, or eight rivers, which fall into the Ikâr, or Ikrân Murân, that is, the Jenisea, on the east side (K). After maintaining the war a considerable while against Jenghiz Khân, their Khân Tokta-beghi, with his two sons, Inalzi and Tauranzi, were obliged to submit. Several tribes have sprung from them. 1. The Torga-uts, so called, because they dwell beyond the country of Salika, which lies beyond that of the Moguls: but, at present, they are under Ayuki Khân, and make the whole or part of the second branch of the Eluths or Aluths, called Eluths-Ayuki, or Torga uti ⁿ. 2. The Kuris. 3. The Utilas. 4. The Tumats, who dwell in the country of Barku-chintugum (S): their Khân, Tatula-Sukar Khân, was obliged to submit to Jenghiz Khân. 5. The Boygazins. 6. The Hirmuzins. These two last tribes dwell near the Kerghis, and are very peaceable. 7. The Telanguts. 8. The Oras-uts. 9. The Kussutmaits. These three last have been always famous for their skill in physic and magic, as well as hunting and fishing; which carried them to dwell near forests and rivers ^o.

STRAHLENBERG relates, that the Kalmuk nation, properly called Eluths, call themselves Avirat, and Virat, or Dorbon Virat, that is, the four Avirat tribes, which are, Torga oth, Koshioth, Kayoth, Dsongar and Dorb-oth, which two last make but one tribe. He likewise observes, that the terminations oth, ath, and auth (or ät and öt ^p, as others write them), in those and the like words, are the same: that the Mongols call the above-mentioned four tribes not only Avir-ät, but also Vil öth, and Avil-öth (T): and that these are descendants of the same people, whom the later Greek writers call Avari ^q, and Abari; but Jornandes, more nearly, Aviri ^r: of both which words D'Herbelot's Avairat ^s is a kind of compound ^t. But as our author makes the Avari or Var, and Huni or Khuni, the same with the Igurs or Un igurs, how can they be Kalmuks or Eluths, who are a very different people from the Vigurs? We have already shewn how very uncertain it is to trace the origin of people by the names found in historians of foreign countries: and, to speak the truth, Mr. Strahlenberg, though very happy in many of his conjectures, yet was so bigotted to this method, that he takes the smallest resemblance in the name as a certain proof of his point; and often strains matters beyond measure, to make things answer his purpose.

10. THE Naymans is a very antient tribe, and very rich (U): they dwell in the country of the Moguls, called Karakum, or black sand (W); but did not use agriculture. Their Khân, mans.

(P) De la Croix, in his history of Jenghiz Khân, says, the Tartars are the same called Su Moguls, or the Moguls of the waters; and that they took the name Tatar from a river of that name, in the country of Su Mogul. Yet, in another place, he derives it from Tatar Khân.

(Q) Perhaps the Burats or Brats, still inhabiting thereabouts.

(R) Abu'lghazi Khân says (3), the Moguls call them Kok Muran, On Muran, Kara Ussin, Sebikan, Ikrân Muran, Akar Muran, Zagan Muran, and Khaja Muran. Muran signifies a river.

(S) Perhaps the plain of Bargu, mentioned by Marco Polo, was in this country.

(T) Hence perhaps the name of Eluths or Aluths.

(U) For this reason, along with the name, Strahlenberg supposes the Naymans or Noymans, are the Nomæi, afterwards called Aramæi, of Pîny. But it is surprising that De la Croix, without any apparent grounds, should affirm, that these Naymans are the Issidon Scythians, and that their capital Issidon is called by the moderns Sukkir (4). Besides, Sukkir is now known to be Su-chew in Ghina, at a great distance from the country of the Naymans.

in the time of Jenghiz Khân, was called Tayyan, who, with his son Kuchluk, was slain by that conqueror. Gaubil informs us, that the Naymans were contiguous to the Moguls, near the city of Holin, or Kara-kuran, to the north of the great sandy desert. At present they are settled near the Sira Muran, to the north-east of Pekin^w.

The Karaits.

11. THE Kara-its (X), that is, swartby, so called from the swarthy complexion of seven brothers, from whom they sprung. Korzakur Khân, surnamed Bufruk, son of Margus-Ili-Khân, was the father of Tayrel Khân, to whom the emperor of Kitay gave the title of Wang (Y): hence some writers give him the name of Wang Khân. This is the famous Ung Khân, stiled Prester John, by Marco Polo, and other European writers, who represent him both as a Christian king and priest; but without the least foundation that appears from any history but their own. The Kara-its were neighbours to the Naymans, and possessed a great part of the countries along the rivers Tula or Tola^x, and Orgbun^y.

The Ungutti.

12. THE Ungutti (Z), that is, men well to pass; for these people, being situate near the Chinese wall, had great wages of the emperors of Kitay, to guard it and its gates. In the time of Jenghiz Khân this tribe consisted of about four thousand families, whose Khân Alakus, making an alliance with that monarch, contributed much to render the conquest of Kitay easy, by going to meet him as he approached, and giving him a free entrance by the wall^z.

The Turkâks.

13. THE Turkâks. This word signifies a guard, in the Turkish: for, among the Turks, while, one half of the night, the guard take their repose, the other beat on something, to shew they are on the watch; and, when they want to be relieved, call to those at rest, Turkak, that is, get up and beat. Tur signifies get up, and kak, beat. This tribe is very numerous^a.

Vig'rs or Oygûrs.

WE come now to the Mogul or Mungl tribes, which are in all forty-five. The first of these are the Vigûrs (A), who took their rise in the time of Ogûz Khân (B), as hath been before related. They dwelt originally between the mountains Tugra Tubusluk, Uskunluk-tugra, and Kut, on the west of the Moguls; from whom they seem to have been separated by the mountain Kut or Altay. As there are, in this country, nineteen rivers, ten on one side, and nine on the other, those who settled about the former were called Un Vigurs (C), and such as dwelt along the latter Tokos Vigurs (D). These two tribes, which consist of more than an hundred and twenty branches, possessed a great number of towns and villages, yet had no Khâns; till at length falling out together, the first elected a prince, called Mangatati, to whom they gave the name of Il-ittar; and the second chose another, whom they called Il-irghin. Their descendants had the same titles: but, an hundred years after, the two tribes, coming to unite, had but one sovereign, stiled Idikut; which, in Turkish, signifies, sent by the spirit (E), but, in the Usbek tongue, a free independent person.

Their branches.

THEY lived thus in union two thousand years, in the above-mentioned mountains: after which a new difference arising between them, they separated, for good and all; one part remained where they were, and the other went to dwell on the banks of the river Irtish. These last dividing again into three branches, one went and dwelt in Bish-balik (F), and cultivated the lands about it: the second dispersed themselves in the neighbourhood of that city, feeding on their cattle: and the third branch continued on the Irtish, where they lived by fishing, and hunting of fables, castors, martens, squirrels, and other beasts. On the flesh of these they fed, and clad themselves with their skins, which had always been their cloathing.

BANERZIK (G) Idikut, their Khân, submitted to Jenghiz Khân, in order to secure himself against Kavar (H), Khân of Turkestan; and every year sent him considerable presents. He joined the conqueror also, when he went to attack Mohammed Karazm Shah.

(X) Written Kerit, and Keit, by Europeans.

(Y) In the translations Annak; and, by European writers, no less faultily, Ung.

(Z) Perhaps the same as Onbiot and Ankût.

(A) Wigûrs, Igûrs, or Oygûrs, as the word is variously written. It signifies helpers; at least that sense has been given to it by the Mohammedan historians, to honour this tribe, which was very potent, for joining with Jenghiz Khân. This seems to have been done in imitation of Mohammed, who gave the name of Ansârs, or helpers, to a family of Arabs on the like occasion. We judge the Vigûrs to have been a colony from Tibet, as has been already observed, if not the Ikori or Juijen.

(B) If so, how could they be now existing? since we are told, none of the Moguls escaped the slaughter made in the army of Il Khân, except Kayan and Nagos.

(C) From these it is supposed came the Unns or Huns; but more especially the Onagri, Unigari, Iguræi, and Inugri, as they are called by authors; also Utrigori and Kutrigori, Uth-urgari and Kuth-urgari. Whether this difference in the names had any real foundation, as belonging to different tribes of people, who appeared at different times, or in different parts of the Roman empire, or was owing to those who transmitted accounts of them either mistaking or corrupting the names, seems pretty hard to determine, considering how greatly words have been distorted by those means.

(D) Un signifies ten, and Tokos nine, in Turkish.

(E) Idi, being sent, and Kut, spirit. Abu'l-faraj stiles him Idikûb, and says, it signifies lord of the empire. Hist. dynast. p. 283.

(F) Bishbalig was in Little Buklaria, near the city of Turfân.

(G) He is called Parcbukorte Tikin in the Chinese history.

(H) Rather, perhaps, Gur, or Kur Khân.

^a IN regard many of the Vigûrs were skilled in the Turkish language, and expert in writing, And learning. Jenghiz Khân made use of them in all his expeditions, as secretaries to the chancery; in which quality also his descendants, who reigned in Mawara'labr and Persia, employed them for a long time ^b. On this occasion it may be observed, that the Vigûrs or Oygurs were the only people inhabiting Great Tartary, who had the use of characters, which were the same with those now found in Tibet, where they are called characters of Tangut ^c.

THE Ur-mankats. They lead much the same course of life with their namesakes before-mentioned; and are descended from Ogûz Khân: which is all that is said of them ^d. The Urmankats.

It has already been remarked, that the descendants of Kayan took the surname of Kayat; and those of Nagos that of Durlagan, or Nagofser: whence, in a short time, they came to lose their true names. The tribes mentioned as sprung from them, are thirty-eight in number; thirty derive their pedigree from Kayan, and five from Nagos.

THE tribes descended from Kayan are the following. 1. From the three sons of Alanku Nirkha or (I) sprung a numerous tribe, in the Mogul language surnamed Nirkha; that is a pure family; Niron tribe: in memory that the founders of it were begotten without any commerce with man, as hath been before related: elsewhere it is said they took the surname of Niron ^e.

2. THE Kunkurats, or Kankrats (K). These are sprung from Kunkurat, a son of Zurluk The Kunkurats. Mergan, who descended from Kayan (L). They dwelt along the river Kalassui (M), in the time of Jenghiz Khân; to whom their Khân Turk-ili, who was his relation, went over ^f.

3. THE Burkuts; and, 4. THE Kurla-uts. These two tribes formerly inhabited along with The Burkuts. the Kunkurats, who are related to them.

5. THE Ankarab; and, 6. THE Alaknuts; are descended from the two sons of Kaba Shîra, The Ankarab. brother of Zurluk Mergan. Ulu, called also Ulu Iga, and Ulu Kufin, the mother of Jenghiz Khân, was of the latter tribe.

7. THE Kara-nuts. These are sprung from Karanut, the eldest son of Busyuday, third brother The Karanuts, of Zurluk Mergan ^g.

8. THE Kurlas, one of the most eminent tribes among the Moguls, are sprung from Kurlas, The Kurlas. son of Meyfir-ili, son of Konaklot, son of Busyuday, youngest brother of Zurluk Mergan. Bertizena, Khân of the Moguls, when they sallied out of the mountain Irgana Kon, was a descendant of Kurlas. This tribe is divided into many branches, who have the surname of Niron. 1. The Kataguns, descended from Bokum Katagum, the eldest of Alanku's three sons. 2. The Zalzuts, from Boskin Zalzi, second son of Alanku. 3. The Bayzuts, from Bassikar, and Hurmalankum, sons of Kaydu Khân. 4. The Zipzuts, from Zapzin, Baydu Khân's third son. 5. The Irigbents, from Zapzin also ^h. 6. The Zenas, surnamed Nagos, but different from the Nagofser: they sprung from Kauduzena and Olekinzena, sons of Hurmalankum. 7. The Butakins, from Butakin, eldest son of Tumana Khân, grandson of Kaydu Khân. 8. The Uruths, from Uruth, second son of Tumana Khân ⁱ. 9. The Mankats, from Mankat, Tumana's third son: these are nick-named Kara Kalpaks by the Russians, and possess at present the western half of Turkestan, with the city of that name. But Kyrihow's map makes the Kara Kalpaks and Mangats distinct tribes. 10. Badurghins, from Samkarum, third son of Tumana Khân. 11. The Budats, from Batkilti, Tumana's fourth son ^k. 12. The Burlas or Berlas (N), from Zedemzi burlas, son of Kazuli, Tumana's sixth son. Of this tribe was the great Timur-beigh, or Tamerlan. 13. The Kayums, from Udur-bayan, seventh son of Tumana Khân. 14. The Vilots, from Balzar, Tumana's eighth son, called Oglan, or the lame, because he halted. 15. The Bassuts, or Tessuts, from Olzingan, ninth son of Tumana ^l. 16. The Kayats are descended from the six sons of Kabul Khân; in whom, being strong men, and great warriors, was revived the name of Kayat, which had been in a manner unknown for above three thousand years. 17. The Borzugan Kayats sprung from the five sons of Tessugbi Bahâdur Khân, of whom Temujin, afterwards Jenghiz Khân, was the eldest. They were all of a fair complexion, inclining to yellow, with a red circle between the

(I) An account of most of the descendants of the three sons of Alanku, down to Jenghiz Khân are mentioned hereafter, on occasion of the Mogul tribes being derived from them. Some write Alankawa.

(K) Konkorats and Kongorats.

(L) It appears, from several circumstances, that this Zurluk Mergan lived many ages before Alanku, and possibly, during the time the Moguls remained shut up in the mountain of Irganakon; since the tribe of Kurlas derive themselves from him, and Bertizena, Khân of the Moguls, at the time of their famous fall from thence,

was a descendant of Kurlas. Mention is made of Zurluk Mergan's two brothers, Kabay Shira and Busyuday, but not of his father: he was such an excellent archer, that, being to fight on horseback with Kabay Shira, and seeing him thro' fear bend down on one side for shelter, in pity, would not kill him, but struck the pendent out of his ear, without touching the jewel at which it hung.

black and white of their eyes; which kind of eyes the Moguls call Borzugan, from whence a their descendants had that name ^m.

The Ilzigans. 9. THE Ilzigans. This tribe is descended from Ilzigan, brother of Kurlas, son of Meysir-Ili, before-mentioned.

The Durmans. 10. THE Durmans, that is, four, in the Moguls language (O), derive their origin from the four eldest sons of Bizin Kayan Khân; who, resenting the election of K. pzi Mergan Khân, though it was made pursuant to the will of their father, left the country: but their descendants, in process of time, came and dwelt in the dominions of Kipfi Mergan. From these are descended two tribes. 1. The Barians, from one of that name. 2. The Sukut, from the son of a Durman, by a she-slave. This slave coming before her time, through the abuse she received from his wife, went and hid the infant among shrubs, called, in their language, Yulgun; but, by the Moguls Sukut (P): the father finding it here next morning, from thence gave it the name of Sukut ⁿ.

THE tribes of the Nagosler, or Durlagans, descended from Nagos, are five.

The Bayuts. 1. THE Bayuts are divided into several branches, the most considerable of which are the Sadagbin Bayuts, and the Makrim Bayuts, so named from the rivers Sadagbin and Makrim, on the banks whereof they inhabit; being neighbours to the Virats.

2. THE Jalayrs (Q) are a very ancient tribe: they were formerly scattered over a great extent of country, and had many princes; till the Kitayans having declared war against them, they were obliged to come closer together, in order to be in a capacity to assist one another. Their families were so numerous, that they spread over seventy different provinces (R), which they called in their language Kurân; and the greater part of them dwelt in a quarter of the Moguls called Umân. But the emperor of Kitay having defeated, and carried away, a great number of them (S), the rest fled, and were reduced to live on roots.

Their distress. THIS happened in the reign of Dutumin Khân (T), father of Kaydu Khân; who going to be married in another country, left his second brother, Mutulun, to take care of the house, and his seven other brothers. These repairing one day to a very level spot of ground, near their habitation, where they used to perform their exercises and tournaments, they found the Jalayrs digging for roots, which rendered the place unfit for their diversions. They immediately informed Mutulun hereof, who hastened thither with a strong force, and put the Jalayrs to flight: but the latter returning to the charge, after great loss, at length overcame Mutulun, killed him, and his seven brethren: not content with this, they ruined their habitations, and put to the sword as many of their subjects as fell into their hands.

The Kaydu Jalayrs. KAYDU Khân, being informed of this misfortune, returned home forthwith, and sent to demand of the Jalayrs the reason why they had killed his brothers. The Jalayrs, terrified at the message, sent five of the chief persons concerned, with their wives and children, to the Khân, to be disposed of as he thought fit: but he was content to keep them as his slaves; which proved of good account to him: for they took the surname of their master, serving him and his posterity faithfully, to the fourth generation; insomuch that some of his descendants had ten, twelve, and even twenty, families of them, for their portion. In the reign of Jenghîz Khân the other Jalayrs took the name of their captive brethren ^o.

BESIDES the Mogul tribes before-mentioned, there are nine others: but it is uncertain whether they are sprung from Kayan or Nayos.

The Markats. 1. THE Markats. Toktu-begbi Khân, of this tribe, was always at variance with Jenghîz Khân. One time, in the absence of that hero, he carried away his wives and subjects, with all that fell into his hands. Another time, lying in ambush for Jenghîz Khân, he made him prisoner while he was taking a walk; and it cost his subjects a large sum of money to ransom him.

The Umma-uts. 2. THE Umma-uts, formerly called called Urma-uts. From them are derived four tribes. 1. The Kunakhmars, sprung from a person of that name. Menglik, surnamed Izka, or the devout, for his piety and virtue, was of this tribe, and married the widow Ulun-iga (U), mother of Temujin, or Jenghîz Khân, who was then but thirteen years of age. Some years after Vang Khân (W), of the Kara-its, sent a letter to him, proposing to kill Temujin, and divide his possessions between them. This was to be done at the time of a visit Vang Khân was to make to

- b Khân intended to invade Temujin unawares; and being sprung from the Moguls, as soon as they had delivered in the milk, they went and discovered the plot; for which service Jenghiz Khân made them, and their descendants for nine generations, Tarkân (X); which frees them from all sorts of taxes.

- c THIS is the account of the tribes or branches of the Turkish nation, given by Abu'lghâzi Khân; which, though the most extensive of any which has yet come to our hands, is, after all, very superficial: nor indeed could it well be otherwise, since it does not appear, that any of the inhabitants of Tartary had written records, or even made use of letters, except the Ighirs or Vigirs, before the time of Jenghiz Khân: and their oral traditions must needs, from the nature of the thing itself, have been very imperfect, as well as liable to much uncertainty, and even corruption.

HOWEVER that be, Abu'lghâzi Khân, and the authors whom he made use of, differ much Disagreement from those quoted by D'Herbelot, and apparently go upon a different plan (Y). For he speaks of authors. neither of Turk's posterity being divided into four tribes, nor of any subdivision into four others by Ogûz, conformable to Mirkbond, and the earlier Persian historians. In all probability we should discover a still greater disagreement, had D'Herbelot but given us the names of all the Turkish tribes from that author, or his son Kond Amîr, who wrote a particular history of the Mogol tribes, Jenghiz Khân and his successors ^a.

- d WHAT in Abu'lghâzi Khân seems most singular is, that he mentions no particular tribe pro- No tribe called perly called Turks, as the Persian historians have done. Whether he omitted them, in conse- Turks. quence of nothing being said about them in the authors he made his extracts from (Z); or as intending to treat chiefly of the Moguls, which seems indeed to have been his main design; or lastly, because there is at present no tribe in all Tartary existing under the name of Turks, that now in Tar- people having long since passed into other countries, or been destroyed by wars; we cannot deter- tary. mine. But let whatever will have been the reason, it is certain, that there was formerly a particular tribe or nation among the inhabitants of Tartary named Turks; for they are mentioned both by the Roman and Chinese, as well as the Arab and Persian historians already cited. This will appear more evident still from their history, delivered in the following section.

S E C T. IV.

The affairs of the Turks with the nations bordering on Tartary, and among themselves, from their first appearance, till the time of Jenghiz Khân.

- e I T may well be questioned, whether all the different tribes of people inhabiting Tartary are Particular branches of Turks; but it seems probable that there was a particular nation among the antient tribe of Scythians who went by that name; since the Turci, perhaps better written Turki, are mentioned by Pomponius Mela the geographer ^a, and Pliny ^b; who place them among the nations dwelling in the neighbourhood of the river Tanais, and the Palus Mæotis.

How the Turks should be known so early to the Romans, and not to the Greeks, who lay oriental much nearer to them, may seem a little strange; for they are not mentioned by Ptolemy (A), Turks,

(X) Or Terkan, as written by De la Croix.

(Y) Their history undoubtedly was calculated to do honour to the Mogols; as that given by the authors before mentioned was to do honour to the Seljuks.

(Z) We can form no judgment on this point from the history of Jenghiz Khân, published by De la Croix, which, though extracted chiefly from Fadlallah, the principal author made use of by Abu'lghâzi Khân, mentions scarce any tribes besides those which are Mogols.

(A) For the Turci can't be said to be the Turks, without straining matters beyond reason.

nor any writer of that nation, who has come to our hands, before the middle of the sixth century. Then, indeed, they speak of them for the first time; but, far from placing them in the west of Asia, they give them a situation in the farthest east: yet it must be confessed, that the name of oriental Turks, by which they call them, should seem to be conferred on them, with a view to distinguish them from other Turks, known to them in the west. However this be, it is surprizing that Khalkondilas, who, in his history of the fall of the Greek empire, treats of the name and origin of the Turks, should say nothing of these eastern Turks, mentioned by preceding historians: but indeed he seems to be quite a stranger to the Seljuks, or any kind of Turks, though living near the northern borders of the empire (B), before the time of the Ogúzians or Othmáns.

Their situation,

according to the Greek

THE Bizantine historians tell us, that these oriental Turks were the same formerly called Sakæ (C): that they dwelt beyond the Sogdians (D); and were divided into eight tribes (E): that they had greatly increased in power within a few years, so as to border on the Roman empire: that their king, named Disabules, sent ambassadors in the fourth year of Justin the younger (F); and that they brought with them iron, to sell, to make it believed, that there were mines in their country: that Disabules encamped near the mountain Ek tak: that this name signifies the mountain of gold; and was given to it on account of the abundance of fruits and cattle which were on it: that it stood in the most eastern part of his dominions: that to the south of it was a place called Talas, and four hundred stadia to the west a plain, called Ikar^c.

WHETHER this Talas was the same mentioned by later travellers^d, or the plain of Ikar had any relation to the river Ikar or Ikran^e, now called Jenisea, we shall not pretend to say: but 'tis certain this account agrees very well with what is related by a curious missionary, from the Chinese history, which begins to speak of the Turks, whom they call Tu-que, in the year 545; at which time they were an inconsiderable people, who dwelt to the north-west of Turfán (G), in Little Bukharia; and, not long before, their employment was to work iron, near a mountain called Kin (H) (that is, gold): but, in a few years, they grew very powerful; subduing the whole country between the Caspian sea and the river Lyau, in the province of Lyau-tong. They were divided into Tu-que of the north, and Tu-que of the west; and had great wars either among themselves, or with the Chinese, to whom they were very formidable.^f Whether they made any conquests in China itself, does not as yet appear: but we are told, that the founders of the dynasties of the latter Tang and Han in that empire were of these Tu-que^g; the former commencing in the year 923, the latter in 947, of the Christian æra.

Set up iron-works, near the

BESIDES the great conformity between the Roman and Chinese history, relating to the rise of the Turkish power, it is worth observing, that they both confirm a very remarkable circumstance in the history of the Mogols, and almost prove them to be the same people with the Turks; namely, their working in iron, near a mountain called Kin. This mountain is probably the same with that of Irganakon, Erkana, or Arkenekom (I), situated in the extreme north parts of the Mogols country; where, we are told, a foundery was erected by the chiefs of the Kayat (K) tribes, thence called the Arkenekom smiths^h (L). And hence the fable related by Abu'lghâzi Khân, of the Mogols making a way through that mountain, by melting the iron minesⁱ, doubtless had its rise.

WHETHER the mountain Kin, which in Chinese signifies gold, be the same with that called Ek tak, or Ak tak (M), I will not pretend to say, the situation of this last not being sufficiently fixed by the Byzantine writers: neither does the name signify the same as Kin; for although those historians explain it gold, yet in reality Altún tâk or tâg signifies the mountain of gold, in

(B) In Hungary, in and before the time of Constantine Porphyrogenitus.

(C) According to this account, the name of Turks was but newly sprung up. What was their former name must be very uncertain. The antient historians were not always geographers, and guessed in this case as the moderns do, who are oftener in the wrong than in the right. Besides, how should the Greeks know much of people who lived at such a distance, and with whom all intercourse had been broken off for some ages?

(D) By the Sogdians are to be understood the inhabitants of the country about Samarkand, called Sogd; or, in a larger sense, all Mawara'lnahr, or Great Bukharia.

(E) By the Kagán's or Khân's letter to the emperor Mauritius, their number was only seven.

(F) Which was in 569.

(G) Named perhaps from the Turks.

(H) Or Tu-kin. Kin in Chinese signifies gold: possibly that called Irganakon by the Turks.

(I) D'Herbelot writes Erkenekûn.

(K) Kayat signifies, a smith.

(L) De la Croix (from whom, in his life of Jenghiz Khân, p. 6. we have this circumstance), tells us of an annual feast observed by the Mogols, in memory of this foundery; or rather, perhaps, of their having found out the way of working iron, which, Suidas informs us, the Turks were in his time unacquainted with. Abu'lghâzi Khân, in his history, p. 28. pretends the feast was appointed in memory of their famous sally out of Irganakon.

(M) Perhaps Artag; to the east of which the Mogols dwelt, between it and the mountain Kurtog. See Abu'lghâzi Khân's history, p. 10; and Gellius ap. Horn. arc. Noæ, p. 246.

a the Mogol or Turkish language; Ek tak, or Aktak, the white mountain. Perhaps it went by both names, and the Greeks brought home only the latter.

In effect, if we may be able to judge, from the imperfect account that is left us, of the roads which the ambassadors took to and from the Turkish camp or court, the mountain Ek tak, in case it be the same with that of Kin, must be rather to the west than east of it.

THAT our reader may the better judge of this, we shall lay before him what little we find concerning those roads.

WITH regard to the route taken by Zemark, the first ambassador from the Romans to the Turks, we are only told that he was sent back with Maniak, prince of the Sogdians; and that, being arrived in his country, he travelled from thence to mount Ek tak, and returned to Constantinople through the country of the Kliatorians, and town of Koalites. The ambassadors sent to Toxander, son of Disabules, took a different course: they sailed from Constantinople to Sinope, on the north coast of Asia Minor, and thence crossed over the Euxine sea to Kherfonesus: they proceeded through the country of the Opturians, and other sandy territories, and the south frontiers of Taurica: then, passing over marshy places, full of reeds, they came to the country of Ak Aga (N); so named from a lady, who formerly commanded the Scythian country, and received that power from Anongeus, prince of the Utragurians. Lastly, they arrived at the places where the trophies of Toxander were set up^k.

THIS is all we meet with relating to the roads into the country of the Turks, taken by the Roman ambassadors: nor is there any thing said of that road which the ambassadors of Disabules took in their way to Constantinople; farther than that, after travelling over a vast extent of country, and mountains covered with snow, they entered (O) into the Caspian straits.

OUR author is somewhat more particular in his account of the road taken by the ambassadors Kliat here one of the ambassadors taking the shortest but most desert road, the other advanced along the morafs for twelve days together; then, continuing his journey over hills, at length came to the river Hik (P); and next to the river Daïk (Q). From thence, travelling along another lake, they arrived at Attila (R), and the country of the Hungars. Proceeding through a dry desert country, along several great lakes, they came to a morafs, into which the river Kofon discharges itself. Then they entered the country of the Alâns; but were afraid of the Horo lay in ambush, in Sivania, to intercept them), they turned off to the right, and, striking thro' the Darina (S), or two gates, a pass, arrived in Apfelia (T): thence they proceeded to Retaurion (U), and the Euxine sea; afterward, crossing the Phasis (X), they came to Trabizond, and so to Constantinople^l.

WE are beholden to Menander for these notices; which, though short, deserve to be preserved, as being almost the only account we find of travels into Tartary for many centuries together.

BUT to return to the affairs of the oriental Turks. Disabules having, at the request of the Sogdians (Y), whom, with the Nephtalites (Z), he had newly conquered, sent two embassies to the Persians, to solicit a trade for silk; the Persians were not content with rejecting the alliance of the Turks, on account of their inconstancy and breach of faith, as they alleged; but, to give them an aversion to the country, poisoned their ambassadors: from whence began the enmity between those two nations. It was on this occasion that Disabules sent ambassadors to the emperor Justin, as before-mentioned; who concluding a treaty of peace, the Turks became the friends and allies of the Romans; with whom they never had any dealings before. Much about the same time the Kliats (A) also, who were subject to Disabules, and inhabited near the borders of the Roman empire, sent ambassadors to Justin. The country of the Turks was then divided into four governments, all under the command of Disabules: several nations, and, among the rest, the Avares (B) and Hungors (C), were subject to them: but 20,000 of the former had revolted, and passed into Europe^m.

(N) Ak Aga signifies, the white lady.

(O) One would have imagined, that they passed southward, between the Euxine and Caspian seas; but the Caspian straits are placed between Media and Parthia by Ptolemy, and a day's journey from Rages by Arrian; which Rages or Ragau, in all probability, is the same with Ray or Rcy, once the capital of Persian Irak, about eighty miles south-east of Kazvin.

(P) This may be the Yem.

(Q) Which seems to be the Taik, or Taik.

(R) Doubtless the Volga; called also Atil, or Edel; or else some town upon it.

(S) Darayn signifies, in Arabic, the two gates.

(T) Apfelia, somewhere in Mingrelia.

(U) Retaurion, a town, or castle, belonging to the Romans.

(X) Now Fash, or Rion.

(Y) The Sogdians were the people about Samarkand, which stands in a valley called Sogd.

(A) Perhaps the same with the Kalatz.

(B) Ewogrius says, the Abari were driven out of their country by the Turks.

(C) Perhaps Un-igurs.

The Persians
invaded.

THE ambassadors engaged Justin to make war upon the Persians, offering to ravage Media ^a at the same time: and, at the end of the fourth year (D), the emperor sent Zemark on an embassy to Disabules: who, professing much friendship, feasted the ambassadors under a tent, spread with carpets, of several colours, but plain manufacture; where they eat and drank all day. At this entertainment there was no wine; for no grapes were found in their country; but they had other liquor, which was sweet and agreeable. Next day they were treated in another tent, whose furniture was rich and elegant.

Soon after, Disabules, setting forward on his march against the Persians, took Zemark with him, and some of his retinue; but left the rest in the country of the Kliatorians (E). He also gave the ambassador a concubine of his, who was one of those called Cerkhises ⁿ (F).

bassies.

In the second year of the emperor Tiberius (G), Valentine was sent on an embassy to Disa- ^b bules, in company with 600 Turks, who came to Constantinople, with several ambassadors: but Disabules dying soon after Valentine's arrival, he was the next day admitted to audience by his son Toxander; who charged the Romans with artifice, and breach of faith, for confederating with the Varkonites, or Avares, who were in rebellion against him. After this, he gave the ambassador to understand, that he had subdued the Alains and Utrigorians; and that Anan-ceas (H) was then actually encamped before Bosphorus (I), with an army of Turks. In short, the Greek historian complains, that he treated the ambassador very ill ^o.

the Turks.

THIS account we have from Menander. The next news we hear of the Turks is from Simokatta; who informs us, that the Kagân (K) of his time (whom he names not), so famous among the oriental Turks, sent an ambassador to the emperor Mauritius, in the beginning of the summer (L), with a letter, speaking in high terms of his victories: the superscription ran thus; The Kagân, the great lord of seven nations, and master of seven climates of the world, to the king of the Romans. In effect, continues Simokatta, this Kagân had conquered the Abtelians, or Nephtalites, and seized their dominions: after which, being elated with his success, he joined Stembiskador, and subdued the Avares. Next he marched against the Ogorites (M), and conquered them (N), killing 300,000, and put to death their king Kolk.

wars.

THIS victory was followed by a civil war among the Turks. One of his relations, named Turon, having revolted, he was obliged to implore the aid of Sparzugun, Khunaxolus, and Tuldik; with which he defeated the tyrant in the plain of Ikar. After he had thus settled his affairs, he sent the above-mentioned embassy to the emperor Mauritius, to acquaint him with his good success. The Kagân, farther to keep things in a settled posture, made alliance with the inhabitants of Taugasta (O), whose prince was called Taysan ^p.

THESE are all the transactions which the Romans had with the Turks, till the time of the Seljuks. Let us now turn our eyes towards the Higher Asia, and see what they were doing on that side.

The Huns;

WE have already given an account of the origin of the Turks, from an extract lately made from the annals of China, and published by Mr. Guignes, under the title of The origin of the Huns and Turks; who, from thence, appear to have been the same people under different names. We shall in this place give the substance of that memoir at large, as it may help to supply and explain many imperfect and obscure passages in the history which follows of those people, taken from the oriental historians.

THE Huns were a considerable nation of Great Tartary; and had the dominion there more than 200 years before the Christian æra. They inhabited formerly ^q in the neighbourhood of the great desert, extending from the country of Korea, on the east, to that of the Getes (P), on the west. The Chinese historians give them two different names, Hyongnû and Tû ki ûk; that is Huns, and Turks. The first is that which they had before the time of Christ: the second, that which a remnant of these Huns, re-established in Tartary, assumed afterwards.

- a THESE Huns or Turks ^{Way of living.} dwelt in tents, placed in carts, and removed from place to place, for the conveniency of pasture to feed their cattle ; which supplied them with both food and cloathing. They despised old people, and only set a value on the young, as more proper for war, which was their sole occupation. Their riches consisted in sheep and cattle ; but chiefly in the number of slaves taken in war. The skulls of their enemies served for cups to drink out of in their principal ceremonies. Once every year they assemble at the imperial camp, and sacrifice to their ancestors, heaven, the earth, and spirits. Every morning the emperor adored the rising sun, and in the evening the moon. The left hand was the post of honour with these people, as it is at present with the Turks : and in all their encampments the emperor's tent was placed fronting the north. At his death, they put into the coffin with his body his richest habits ; and conveyed him to his sepulchre, attended by all those of his family, and his officers. For the space of one month, they attended on him in the same manner as when he was alive : and the men of valour engaged in tilting, like our knights formerly, in their tournaments.

Thus lived the Huns in the earliest times, that is, under their Tanjais, or emperors ^{Barbarous custom.} : but their manners changed in time. When re-established in Turkestan, they introduced a barbarous custom, with regard to their kings. As soon as their grand Khân was dead, his son, or nearest relation, was declared emperor ; and, to know if his reign would be happy and long, they put a silk cord about his neck, and after drawing it so tight as to stop respiration, then slackened it, and the first words which he pronounced in coming to himself, were considered as predictions of what was to happen in his reign.

- c THESE Huns have inhabited Turkestan from all antiquity ^{Ogûz Khân} : and it appears from their history, that, in process of time, several *Chinese*s also removed into that part of Tartary. After the ^{their first em-} reduction of the Hya dynasty, a prince of that family, son of the last emperor (Q), retired ^{perior.} thither with all his people ; and, according both to the Chinese and Persian ^u historians, the Tanjais or emperors of the Huns are his descendants. Dibbakawi, mentioned by Mirkond (R), is no other than the emperor Yu, founder of the same Chinese dynasty : and one of his descendants, named Mau-ton Tanju, is the famous Ogûz Khân (S), who is considered throughout Tartary as the founder of the empire of the Huns (T) : he maintained fierce wars against the *Chinese*s. His posterity reigned a long time over the whole nation of the Huns, with the title of Tanjû ; being the contraction of a word which, in their language, signified the son of heaven ; and often committed hostilities against the *Chinese*s, notwithstanding the treaties of peace and alliances which were made with them.

- UNDER one of these princes named Pû kû Tanjû ^x, the empire of the Huns began considerably to decline. A terrible famine, which happened among them, proved the fore-runner of ^{Their power declines.} many other evils. The *Chinese*s, taking advantage of their miserable circumstances, attacked them ; but, at their humble suit, granted them peace. Yet scarce were the *Chinese*s retired, when the Eastern Tartars entered their country, and obliged them to remove more to the north. But that which was the source of all their evils, and completed the ruin of this empire, was the dissention which crept into the royal family, on the following occasion. Pû kû Tanjû (U) put to death a brother of his, who was to have been his successor, in order to place his own son on the ^e throne. Hereupon, a prince of the same family, the son of an emperor, concluded, that the succession belonged to him ; which had like to have cost him his life : but being warned in time of his danger, he found means to escape, and put himself at the head of certain hordas or tribes, who proclaimed him emperor.

Thus the empire of the Huns came to be divided into two parts. Those of the south, over ^{Their empire divided.} whom the new monarch reigned ; and those of the north, subject to Pû kû Tanjû. It is this division of which the Persian historians Mirkond and Beidâwi make mention ; giving to one party the name of Mogols, and to the other that of Tartars (W).

AFTER this defection, the northern Huns found the *Chinese*s less disposed to assist them in their ^{That of the northern Huns destroyed.} calamities than they were before. They were continually opposed by those of the south ; who at length granted them peace. They then resolved to carry their arms into Mawara'nahr; where, elated with their success, they, without regard to the faith of treaties, bent their forces against China. But there they found the Huns of the south, who repulsed them vigorously. At length the Chinese, always aided by these latter, after several battles, determined utterly to destroy the Huns of the north; which they effected by their general Tew-hyen, who, in the reign of Hyan Ho-ti (X), emperor of the Han dynasty in China, defeated the northern Huns in Tartary: and, in order to transmit to posterity the memory of this victory, he caused an inscription to be cut on a mountain in Turkestan, indicating the time when it happened (Y).

THE Persian historians^y ascribe this defeat of the Huns to Tür, the son of Feridün: but it is easy to see, says our author, that they were led into this error by the similitude of the names Tew and Tür (Z): withal, being fond of their antient heroes, they laid hold of this occasion to advance their fame.

westward.

OF the Huns, thus vanquished^z, some remained in Tartary, and mingled with the tribes who had been brought from the farthest parts of the east, to re-people this country. But the major part of them continued to advance towards the west, through the regions to the north of Samar-kand, till they reached the Caspian sea, and parts about Astrakán. Here, where the Chinese historians lose sight of them, ours begin to have them in view; and, conducting them into Europe, over the Palus Mæotis, after pointing out their various migrations, seat them in Pannonia, as hath been already mentioned.

Southern Huns

THE southern Huns, who^a remained in their antient country, preserve their power, till such time as a tribe of the oriental Tartars, named Juijen, intirely subdued them, and brought almost the whole extent of Tartary under their dominion. The title borne by their kings was that of Khán, or Khákán, which was substituted in the place of Tanjú. The Huns, thus driven out, went and established several principalities in the northern China; which were destroyed one after the other. One of them, whose princes descended from the emperor of the Huns, was defeated by Tay-vú-ti, emperor of the northern China. Upon this misfortune, the whole family, together with the Huns, retired into a mountain of Tartary, named Erkena-Kom. These people, at that time most known by the name of Turks, were employed, according to the Chinese, as well as Mohammedan historians^b, in forging iron works, for the service of the Kháns of the Juijen Tartars; and continued in this manner to support themselves for a certain number of years; that is, till the Juijen came to be attacked by the nations inhabiting to the west of them.

TU-MWEN (A) Khán, at that time head of the Irkena-Kom Turks, marched out of the mountain, at the head of these people, and defeated the enemy. Tu-mwen, making a merit of this service which he had done the Khákán or emperor, imagined he was intitled to demand his daughter in marriage. The Khákán, far from being of the same opinion, rejected the proposal with disdain; saying, that it did not become a slave to aspire to such an alliance with his sovereign^c. Tu-mwen, incensed at so contemptuous a repulse, immediately revolted against his prince; and, having slain the Juijen envoy, entered into a confederacy with Ven-ti, emperor of the northern China. Next year he marched against the Juijen, defeated them, and slew their Khán; after which he assumed that title, and caused himself to be called Tu-mwen Ilkhán.

Turks.

IN this manner was established a powerful dominion in Tartary, at that time called the empire of the Turks. To preserve the memory of the origin of this family, they used to assemble every year, and, with much ceremony, beat a piece of hot iron upon an anvil: a custom which continued to the time of Jenghiz Khán^d, who descended from this Tu-mwen Khán; and 'tis from hence that some of our historians have represented this prince as the son of a blacksmith.

Hungarians
whence.

THE Juijen, thus driven out of their country by the Turks^e, in all probability passed into Europe; where, being known by the name of the false Avares, or Abares, they mixed with the Huns of the north, who had been settled there a long time before: and these two people uniting together formed the nation of the Hungarians; that is to say, Hun-Ikorians: which last name is that which the Juijen went by in Great Tartary.

THIS is the true original of the second Huns, or Turks, in Turkestan, according to the Chinese historians. But, not content with a beginning which had not something extraordinary in it, they affirm^f,

(Y) [Mr. Guignes would have done well to mention when this was, or in what year of Hyan Ho-ti, emperor of the Han, this defeat happened.]

(Z) [In the French, Tew and Tour. This conjecture seems too forced. Besides, the Persian historians refer the reigns of Tür and Feridün, or Fraydhün, to the ages long before the Christian æra.]

(A) [By the Mohammedan historians written Tumana Khán. Abulgházi Khán makes him the fifth ancestor of Jenghiz Khán; and puts the fall of the Mogols out of Irganakor, under Lertizena Khán, nineteen generations before; and, by his reckoning, above 2300 years. See Anc. Hist. vol. i.]

a that a nation of Tartars, being at war, was so intirely defeated by their enemies, that only one child escaped the slaughter, whose arms and legs, however, they cut off, and then threw him into a lake: that a she-wolf, touched with the misfortunes of the boy, drew him out of the danger he was in, and provided for his support: that the child, out of gratitude, married this wolf; and, returning with her into the mountains to the north-west of the Igûrs country, she there brought forth twelve children; whose descendants took the name of Affenas. Falle of the Zenas.

THE account which is given (by the western historians) of Ti-mwen Ilkhân^g, will explain the above fable. This prince, named Tûmana by the Persian historians, was the son of Biffiker, son of Kaydu, descended from Bûzenjir, son of queen Alankawa. This queen of the Mogols or Turks, then inhabiting the mountains of Tartary, and before the re-establishment of their empire, being left a widow, with two children, according to the account both of the Mohammedan and Chinese writers, took the government of her small state, during the minority of her sons, and constantly refused to marry again. However, her firm attachment to widowhood did not hinder her from being the mother of three other children, one of whom was named Bûzenjir. The grandson of Bûzenjir, called Dutumin, had nine children, eight of whom perished on a certain occasion: and our author is persuaded, that the above-mentioned fable had an eye to this massacre. How explained.

THE ninth son of Dutumin, who escaped, was Kaydu, the father of Biffikar, and another called Hurmalankum, whose children bore the name of wolves; on which the fable is apparently founded: but then this history does not respect the Turks in general, but only the particular hord of them called Zenas (B), or Affenas, as the Chinese pronounce it, descended from Hurmalankum. Tribe of the Zenas, or wolves.

THE TU-MWEN ILKHAN, after he had subdued the Juijen, attacked and defeated several other people of Tartary. His sons, imitating their father's example, formed an empire, which extended from the Caspian sea to Korea. But as so vast a region could not long remain under the dominion of one prince, these Turks divided into two branches^h, the eastern and the western, who had each their particular Khân. Eastern and Western Turks.

THE empire of the latter extended as far as the *Sibun*ⁱ, and more than once became formidable to the kings of Persia, particularly Hormûzd, or Hormisdas, son of Kosrû Anushîrwan. But, in process of time, this empire of the western Turks was destroyed by other Turks of the hord named Wbey-ke, who founded a new dominion in the same country; and from these Wbey-ke Turks, in the opinion of our author, were descended the four famous Seljuk dynasties of Irân, or Persia at large, Kermân, Rûm, or Asia minor, and Syria, reigning in Aleppo and Damascus. Wbey-ke Turks, from whom the Seljûks.

As for the oriental Turks, who inhabited at the farther end of Turkestân, their branch was destroyed by the people named Khitân^k, who came originally from Eastern Tartary: the Khitân were, in their turn, invaded from the same quarter, by the Nyuche Tartars^l, who are the Altûn Khâns (C) of the Mohammedan writers, and called by us at present Manchews. This nation having ruined the empire of the Khitân, some of the latter passed into Persia, and there established a dynasty, known to the Mohammedan authors by the name of Kara Khatayans. destroyed by the Kitan.

THE Turks, after the destruction of their empire, as above related, formed themselves into small principalities; and every hord had its particular Khân. The Kera-its, or Kara-its, one of the Turkish tribes^m, were, in the twelfth century, governed by a prince named Tûli Khân, otherwise called *Onk Khân*ⁿ, whom the Arab writers stile King John, and European travellers Prester John. Broken into tribes.

THE posterity of Ti-mwen Ilkhân dwindled insensibly, and was on the point of being extinguished, or at least of never making any considerable figure again in Tartary, when the famous Jenghiz Khân appeared^o.

THIS is the original of the Turks, according to the Chinese historians; but compared, in certain periods, with the accounts given by the western Asiatic writers. In this comparison, however, Mr. Guigues does not sufficiently distinguish what is taken from the authors of each kind, either in the text, or by the references: neither does he assign dates to all the principal facts. When he says Dibakkâwi Khân is the emperor Yu, and that Mau ton Tanjou is Ogûz Khân, it does not appear whether those are the words of the Chinese annals, or only conjectures of his own. Supposing them to be the Chinese account, there will be found a great disagreement between it and the Tartar relation: for Ogûz Khân will be the nineteenth in descent from Dibbakâwi, or Yu, Some remarks on the foregoing extract.

according to the former, and but the fifth according to the latter. By this latter also Tu-mwen ^a is only the fifth ancestor of Jenghiz Khân: but the Chinese annals set him at the head of the Irganakon sally, instead of Bertizena, nineteen generations before. If Mr. Guignes had been more copious and distinct in his extract, it would have supplied many defects, and cleared up many obscurities in the history of the Turks, which, for want thereof, we meet with in the Mohammedan historians, from whom we are now going to give an account of their affairs, till the Seljuks founded their empire in Iran.

MIRKOND, the Persian historian, informs us, that, when Kasra Anushirwân, the famous Khosroes (D) of the Greek historians, came to the throne, which was about the year 531, he was possessed of Mawara'nabr (E), to which he added other countries; and, among the rest, that of Abtela ¹.

THE country of Abtela, which signifies, in Persian, water of gold, takes its name from a people so called; who, some time before, had conquered it. The Greeks, corrupting the word, call them Nephtalites (F), Eutalites, and, more nearly, Ephtalites. They were denominated, by the Arabs, Hayâtelab. According to Procopius, the Ephtalites were those called the white Huns: they seem to have been masters, for a time, of all Mawara'nabr, or Great Bukharia; to which Abulfeda gives the name of Hayâtelab ². Dr. Hyde observes, that Heyâtelab was the title of the king of Katlân ³, a province in the eastern part of Mawara'nabr: and Eutychius informs us, that Gosbnawaz, king of Abtelab, who raised Firûz to the throne of Persia, about the year 465, was king of Balkh ⁴, and part of Khorasân; which shews, that the dominions of the Abtela had once been very extensive (G); though we may suppose their power to have been much reduced, at the time when Anushirwân conquered them. ^c

BUT while this prince was busy in extending his dominions, they were invaded by Khâkân Chini, king of Tatary or Tartary, with a mighty army, who took from him Samarkand, Bokhâra, and several other cities in Mawara'nabr, which he afterwards was forced to quit upon the successes of his grandson Hormoz ⁵.

D'HERBELOT reports from Mirkond, that Anushirwân having repulsed the Hiyatelab beyond the mountain Parapamisus (H), in the twelfth year, marched against the Khâkân of the oriental Turks, who then reigned in the Transoxane provinces, and obliged him to sue for peace, as also to yield him one of his daughters in marriage ⁶. Eutychius relates this transaction with some variation: he tells us, that the Persian monarch, resolving to revenge on the Hiyatelab the injury done his grandfather Firûz, first makes an alliance with the great Khâkân of the Turks, and acquaints him with his design; that then, marching against the enemy, he overthrew them, and killed their king. By this means the country of Balkh, and the adjacent parts of Khorasân, were delivered up to him: after which he encamped in Fargâna (I), and married the Khâkân's daughter ⁷. ^d

THE reader, from what has been said, may see that Khâkân is a general name given by the Persian historians to the princes of the Turks, called also emperors of Tartary, of whom we find mention from the time of Babram jaur, son of Tazdejerd I. king of Persia, who began his reign about the year of Christ 417 ⁸, as a people different, at least with regard to their original country, from the antient Turks, or inhabitants of Turkestan, situate to the north of Persia, with whom the Persians, according to their history, had wars (K), in the earliest times of their monarchy. The former are called oriental Turks, by way of distinction; and the gentile name of Chin is added to the title of Khâkân, in all probability to denote their coming from the eastern parts of Tartary towards China: although it must be observed, that Chin is a general name, sometimes used by the orientals, to comprehend both those regions ⁹. ^e thors, often endeavouring to explain, become more obscure; and, out of an affectation of shewing their skill in geography, betray their want of it. There is no point in which they have committed more errors, than in giving the antient names for the modern; or those of their own fancy, instead of the names found in the writers they copy from: what is still worse, they commonly omit inserting, by way of note, the names used in the original; which often puts it out of the power of others to correct their mistakes.

(K) These were the Tajiks, whose princes had the title of Khân, or Khakan. See p. 134.

a HORMUZ (L) succeeded his father Anushirwân, about the year 566, and was not long after invaded by the Greek emperor (M); of which Shabafbab, his cousin-german, son of the Khakân, whose daughter Nushirwân had married, taking the advantage, passes the Jibân, or Jamâ, with 300,000 men (N), and subdues Khorasân. Persia being in this distress, Babram Chubin, the bravest man of his time, was sent for to oppose the enemy (O); who taking with him but 12,000 experienced foldiers, made a great slaughter of them, slew their king, and took his son prisoner, besides an immense booty: but afterwards being defeated in his attempts against Khosraw Parvîz, the son and successor of Hormoz, he fled into Turkestan, where he served the Khakân Chini ^a.

b FROM that time the Turks seem to have remained quiet, till the year 654; being the nineteenth of the reign of Yazdegerd, last king of Persia; at which time vast multitudes of them (P) from Turân, or Turkestan, passed the river Sihûn, or Sîr, and laid waste the countries to the south of it. At the same juncture the Arabs invaded his dominions on the other side; and he dying next year, the whole, by degrees, fell a prey to the latter. At length, in 716, the Arabs drove the Turks out of Karazm and Mawara'nabr. ^{They over-run Persia.}

c HOWEVER, from that time they swarmed all over the dominions of the Khalifah, and, by degrees, got the possession of them: for being a handsome people, and famous for their courage, the Khalifahs, and, after their example, several of the princes, who, in time, threw off their yoke, caused great numbers of young Turkish slaves to be bought, and educated in their courts. Out of these they formed troops of militia, who often rebelled, and deposed the Khalifah himself. In effect, at length their commanders became masters, not only of the Khalifat, and persons of the Khalifahs ^b, whose guards they were; but also of great dominions, which they erected in Khorasân, Karazm, Egypt, and India itself ^c, as hath been already set forth at large.

BUT to return to the affairs of the Turks at home. In the year 894 Ismael al Sammâni, who, throwing off his subjection to the Khalifah, set up for king of Mawara'nabr and Khorasân, marched into Turkestan; and, defeating the Khân, took him prisoner, with 10,000 men, besides a vast treasure. Some time before his death, which happened in 909, he made another expedition thither, subduing several provinces ^d.

d THE Turks seem to have kept within their bounds till the reign of Nûb Ebn Mansûr, sixth king of the race of the Sammâni, who ascended the throne in the year of the Hejrah 365 (Q), and of Christ 975. This prince, being possessed of all Marawa'nabr and Khorasân, gave the government of two considerable districts to two brothers, Abuali and Faëkb. These, at length, quarrelling together, the latter first, and then the former, rebelled, and invited Kara Khân (R) of Turkestan to invade the dominions of Nûb (S). The Khân joins them; and, routing the army of Nûb, takes Samarkand and Bokhâra, while Nûb made haste to muster another. Kara Khân, falling sick, was advised by his physicians to return to Turkestan; which he attempted to do, but died by the way. ^{Invited by rebels. Hejrah 365.}

e HOWEVER, the rebel brothers still held out, and raised great forces; being assisted by the neighbouring princes: at what time Sabektekin, a famous general of Nûb's, having returned with laurels from India, the king, by his assistance, marched against, and, after a doubtful battle, routed them ^e.

AFTER this battle, Nûb, at the request of Sabektekin, made his son Mahmûd general of his forces, and went to Bokhâra; Sabektekin to Gaznûn (T), a territory in Khorasân, and Mahmûd to Nishabûr; whence Abuali and Faëkb who had retired thither, fled; but, raising forces, they drove out Mahmûd: however, the latter, rallying his troops, and being joined by his father Sabektekin, routed the brothers in their turn. Abuali, upon this, submitted to Nûb; but Faëkb retired to Ilek Khân, who succeeded Bokra Khân in Turkestan, and was persuaded by him to make war on Nûb.

f NUH, being informed of what was in agitation, ordered Sabektekin to attend him, and Mahmûd, with his troops, between Kesh and Nesâf, near Samarkand; but an accommodation ^{Ilek Khân withdrew.}

being agreed on, whereby Faëkh was to have the government of Samarkand, an intire end was put to these troubles in 995; and Nûb died in peace two years after, having reigned twenty-two years, leaving his son Abu'lbares Mansûr, a youth, to succeed him at Bokbâra, in the dominion of Mawara'nahr and Khorasân.

Troubles in MAHMUD GAZNI (U), son of Sabektekin, whose government Khorasân was, complaining Khorasân. of this injury, Abu'lbares gives him Balkh, Termed and Herat in lieu thereof: but Mahmûd, not being content with the exchange, marches to Nisabûr, from whence the king fled; yet, fearing to be deemed a rebel, turns off, without seeing that city. Baktuzun marches to the king's relief; and, meeting him on his return, under some pretence conspires with Faëkh, and puts out his eyes, after he had reigned one year and seven months. They enthrone Abdalmâlek, the eighth king; but Mahmûd marching against the traitors, they fled different ways; Faëkh carrying the new king to Bokbâra. Thus Mahmûd became possessed of all Khorasân. The traitors, gathering forces, marched against him; but Faëkh dying, the expedition came to nothing.

This happened in the year 999.

king. Ilek Khân, being thus possessed of Bokbâra, seizes the blind king Abu'lbares Mansûr, his two brothers, and two uncles, with others of the royal family, who were all confined apart, and attended by his women slaves. She who attended Abu Ibrahim Monteser, taking a liking to him, procured his escape by means of her vail. Being at liberty, he went to Karazm, where crouds resorting to him, he sent a numerous army to Bokbâra, which defeated Ilek Khân's forces, and took their general prisoner. Marching forward, he routed another of his armies, commanded by Takin Khân, governor of Samarkand.

Defeated MONTESER, after this, returned to Bokbâra; but, Ilek Khân soon marching against him, he twice by Mon- fled; and passing the Jibûn, came to Nisabûr, in the year 1000: about the beginning of the teser. next year, by the assistance of the Turkmâns, he marched into Marawa'nahr, where Ilek Khân met him with a great army: but as they lay encamped near each other, the Turkmâns one night, by surprize, fell upon the Khân's camp, and killing many men, put the rest to flight: after which they returned to their hords, with the better part of the plunder. Monteser, finding himself deserted by the Turkmâns, crossed the Jibûn, which was then frozen, upon the ice. Mean time the Turkmâns, repenting that they had left him any part of the booty, returned to take it away; but coming to the river by day, found it thawed, and were thus baulked, as not being able to pursue him. Monteser, after this, got some victories in Khorasân; but finding he could not stay in that province, repassed the Jibûn, with his followers: and though he lost most of his men, in a conflict with the Skena, or governor of Bokbâra, yet, with the rest, he assaulted that city by night, and took it. Upon this Ilek Khân hastened thither; but being met in the territory of Samarkand by Monteser, was there overthrown; with whose plunder the victor's army was enriched. This was in 1003.

A third defeat. Ilek Khân, after this defeat, having recruited his forces, marched again towards Monteser, and found him, when those who had assisted him were gone. What was worse, one of his generals going over to the enemy, with 4000 men, he, despairing of success, fled. Finding no possibility of crossing the Jibûn, he came to Bokbâra, with very few followers; and though the governor promised to assist him, yet knowing that he was pursued by Ilek Khân's general, to whom most of his men had gone over in disgust, he left the city; and getting into Khorasân, hid himself in a poor house; which being forced in the night by one who was in search of him, he was there killed in 1004^g.

Hejrah 395. THIS was the fate of the dynasty of the Sammâni family in Persia, which properly ended in Nûb Ebn Mansûr, in whose reign sprung up the Gâzni monarchy, under Mahmûd Gâzni before-mentioned; the foundation of which was laid by his father Sabektekin. This Sabektekin was a Turk by nation, and originally a slave to Alptekin, another Turk, who was general to Nûb

Hejrah 387.

HOWEVER that be, his son Mahmûd, who succeeded to his father's power and authority, being disgusted, as hath been before-mentioned, at his government of Khorasan being given to another, by Abu'lbares, successor of Nûb Ebn Mansûr, subdued the whole province to himself ; and having intirely pacified the troubles which reigned there, as hath been before set forth, in the year 998, went from Gûznab to Balkh, where the Khalifah Kâder sent him a rich vest, by way of investiture in his new dominions : and thus the monarchy passed from the Alsamâni to the Gâzni ^b.

Hejrah 389.

Soon after, Mahmûd concluded a perpetual peace with Ilek Khân ; and to make it the firmer, took one of his daughters in marriage. In 1002 the governor of Sistân, or Sejestân, having revolted, he has recourse for assistance to Ilek Khân ; who, in 1005, taking advantage of Mahmûd being engaged in the war of India, sends two generals to invade Khorasân ; but Mahmûd returning on the news, they soon were obliged to retreat. Ilek Khân, upon this, applies for succour to Kader Khân, of Ketan Kotan (Y) ; who, joining him with 50,000 horse, gathered in Ketan Kotan, Turkestan, and Mawara'nabr, they passed the Jibûn.

MAHMUD, on this news, hastens to Balkh, with a noble army of Turks (Z), Gaznis, and other people, to meet the enemy. They came to a battle ; and Mahmûd's forces giving ground, he, almost in despair, rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and cutting his way through them, came up to Ilek Khân ; whom his elephant, unhorsing him, tossed up in the air. His men, at this, resuming their courage, put the enemy to flight. This battle happened in 1006 (A), and proved one of the most bloody which was fought in that age ⁱ.

ILEK Khân, after this loss, retired into Mawara'nabr ; where understanding that his brother Togân (B) Khân, who had been with him in that fight, had sent to make his apology to Mahmûd, he marched against him ; but Mahmûd interposing, they were reconciled ^k.

DURING these invasions by Ilek Khân, great numbers of Turks took the opportunity of passing out of Turkestan into Mawara'nabr. Amongst the rest was Seljûk, who, with his family and followers, settled about Samarkand and Bokhâra, where, by degrees, they acquired large possessions : at length, in 1034, being the fifth year of the reign of Soltân (C), Massîd son and successor of Mahmûd Gazni, the grandsons of Seljûk, Mohammed and Dawd (D), (called afterwards Togrâl-beg and Jaffar-beg) passing the Jibûn or Amû, and sat down about Nesa and Abiwerd, or Baward, in Khorasân, where they began some commotions : but, on their return to Massîd, who was then in India, they sat still, and sent an envoy to him, offering to become his subjects. Massîd rejected their message with contempt : yet, contrary to the advice of his council, set out again for his Indian conquests, before the affairs of the Turks were settled. They, in his absence, began to make their inroads through Khorasân, with so much success, that, in two years, they conquered almost all that province, with ^l Persian Irâk (E) ; founding, in 1037, the second great monarchy of the Turks, in the south of Asia ; which, in time, spread over all Persia, and the countries westward, as far as the Archipelago : whereof we shall give the reader an account in the next chapter.

(Y) 'Tis hard to say what country this is : in Teixeira there is added, doubtless by himself, which we call Katay. 'Tis true, the empire of Kitay or Katay might have extended, at this time, under the Kitân, as far westward as Kâshgar ; and this Kader Khân been the governor, or one set up there for himself : or the country here mentioned might have been Kotan or Hotor, a noted city and province to the south-east of Kâshgar ; which formerly had kings of its own, but then seems to have been under the Kitân hereafter mentioned.

(Z) These Turks were either such as he and his father, who were Turks, always commanded ; or else Seljûk Turks, who, many years before, had settled in Mawara'nabr. But neither D'Herbelot nor Teixeira are explicit enough on this point.

(A) Three other authors, made use of by D'Herbelot, place this event in Hejrah 410 or 1010 of Christ, and vary much from the account of Mirkond. These authors call Ilek Khân king of the oriental Turks, and all the country beyond the Jibûn. They add, that, dying in his own country, in 403 (1012), he was succeeded by his son Kader Khân ; who, being joined by Arslân Khân, king of Turkestan, they passed the Jibûn, and advanced to Balkh ; but that, being met by Mahmûd, mounted on a white elephant, they were driven back to that river, wherein most of them perished. The Soltân, crossing the Jibûn, quite ruined the enemy's country, and then returned in 410, 1019, above-mentioned (1). According to this account, there were two great monarchies of the Turks existing in Tartary at the same time. Ilek Khân, who, in the other account, is called king of Turkestan, is here made king of the oriental Turks, and Kader Khân to be his son.

(B) Or Dogân Khân.

(C) His father Mahmûd was the first who took the title of Soltân.

Turks empire HAVING brought down the foreign history of the Turks, from their first appearance out of Tartary, to this period, we ought now to return to their domestic affairs, and see what they were doing in Tartary among themselves, or with their kindred nations, during that interval. But here we are at a greater loss than before: for the memory of transactions, which are not committed to writing, can never possibly be lasting; and oral records are soon defaced. In short, we scarce know any thing of their domestic affairs during that long interval. We can only collect, in general, from certain circumstances, that their dominion, which once extended over all Tartary, in process of time became divided among several Khâns; and their power being thus broken, gave other nations an opportunity of depriving them of the greater part of what they formerly possessed.

That of the western Kitan, WE learn from the Chinese history, that, at the beginning of the tenth century, the Kitân, or Lyaü, who founded the empire of Kitay, or Katay (which comprized the northern provinces of China, with the adjoining part of Tartary, thence called Kara Kitay), subdued all the countries westward from Korea, as far as Kâshgar^m. And the Persian authors inform us, that, in the year 1017, 300,000 Tartars and Mogols, comprized under the name of Turks, issuing from the borders of China, ravaged the country from the oriental ocean, as far as Balâsfâgûn, then the capital of what is more properly called Turkestân: but that Togân, or Dogân Khân, who at time reigned there (F), not only prevented their progress any farther westward, but, obliging them to retreat, pursued them for three months together, and killed more than 200,000 of themⁿ.

called Karakitayans. THESE, which are here called Tartars and Mogols, were doubtless no other than the Kitân, or those from Letan Kotan before-mentioned^v; who, under Kader Khân, or his successor, aimed to have extended their dominions, which already reached from Kitay to Kâshgar, as far westward as the Caspian sea. Not but a great part of their army might have consisted of Mogols and Tartars; these people probably, at that time, having been subject to the Kitân, as we know they were not long after.

Their settlement. THE Kitân, having, in 1124, being dispossessed by the Kin, another nation (G) of eastern Tartary, retired westward, and founded the empire of the westward Lyaü, near Kâshgâr^p. The historians of the west of Asia call these Lyaü, or Kitân, who, after this event, became better known to them, Karakitayans; and say they settled in the parts about Imil (H), mixing themselves with the Turks^q; who, at that time, were divided into many nations, under different chiefs. The Kitân found some tribes about Turfân, and others on the borders of Great Bukhâria, whom they defeated.

The Turkish empire ceases in Tartary. THESE seem to have been independent tribes, which owned no subjection to the Khân of Turkestân; who, though possessed of but a part of the dominions of his ancestors, still preserved a shew of grandeur. But, in a short time after, his power began greatly to decline; insomuch that Ilek Khân, who reigned at Balâsfâgûn, about the middle of the twelfth century, to defend himself against the Kankli, Karliks, and Kipjaks, resigned his dominions to the king of the western Kitân, or Karakatayans, before-mentioned^r: and thus Turkestân, which for so many ages had been possessed by Khâns of its own, fell under the dominion of a foreign prince: for although some oriental historians pretend to derive even the Kitayans from Turk, the supposed son of Jafet; yet their language and manners, as well as remote situation, shew them to be people of a different origin.

The whole possessed by As soon as this prince was settled in his new dominions, according to Abû'lghâzi Khân, he assumed the title of Kavar Khân, that is, great lord. But Mirkond writes Kûr Khân (I), and says it was the title of the kings of Karakitay^s, adding, that after he had vanquished the Kankli, he pursued his good fortune, and conquered, in the year 1141 (K), the cities of Kâshgar, Khoten, Bishbâleg, and Turkestân: and thus all Tartary, between mount Altay and the Caspian sea, became again united under one sovereign, who was the greatest prince that had reigned in northern Asia for many ages before the time of Jenghîz Khân.

The Karakitayans. IN all probability all the Turkish tribes, and even those settled about Turfân, had submitted to Kûr Khân; since we find the Vigûrs or Igûrs, their neighbours to the east, were under his a protection; and so continued till the year 1212, when slaying his tax-gatherer, they went over to Jenghîz Khân ^a.

To check this growing power, Sanjar, sixth Soltân of the Seljuk Turks, before-mentioned, being at Samarkand, about the year 1145, was prevailed on to attack Kârkhân (L), king of Karakatay; but he was defeated, and all his Hârâm (or women) taken ^w.

IN 1172, Takasb (descended from Sabektekin ^x, the Turkish founder of the Gâzni monarchy), third Soltân of Karazm (a new dominion, which sprung up in the time of Seljuks), applying to the king of Karakitay for aid against his brother Soltân Shâh, he sent Karamara, his son-in-law, with a powerful army, which recovered the crown for him ^y.

b THE Karazm Shâhs were tributary (M) to the Kûrkhâns; but, on the death of Takasb, or Tokusb, his son, Mohammed refused to pay the tribute; and raising great forces, in the year 1200, first reduced Bokhâra, and the other cities of Marawa'lnabr (which had become independent under princes of their own); then, marching into the dominions of Karakatay, Kûrkhân overthrew his army, commanded by Taniku Taraz, a famous commander. After this, he took Otrâr, at that time the capital of all Turkestan, and returned home. Some years after, the Karakitayans, entering Mawara'lnabr, laid siege to Samarkand: but hearing, at the same time, both of the approach of Mohammed, and the revolt of Kuchluk the Naymân, against Kûrkhân his father-in-law, they raised the siege, and returned to Turkestan ^z.

THIS account of the Karakitayans reigning in Turkestan, we have made up the best we Historians dis- could, from the few imperfect memoirs we meet with extracted from Mirkond; according to agre.e.

c which, there were two Kûrkhâns who reigned in Turkestan, before the invasion of Jenghîz Khân; the first called Gurjasb, to whom, by the course of the history, Ilek Khân must have resigned his dominion; the other Kuyang, to whom Kuchluk retired. But Abu'lghâzi Khân Abu'lghazi makes only one Khân of the two, and differs in the date of his reign, and other circum- Khân's stances. He tells us, that the Khân of Jurjut (N) having conquered Karakitay, its prince, Nusi Tayghir Ili, was obliged, in the year 1177, to retire among the Kerghis, and thence to a town of Kitay (O), called Imil: that, two years after, Ilek Khân, a descendant of Afrasiab Khân, who resided at Balâsâgûn (P), being opposed by his neighbours the Kanklis, who had spoiled all his cultivated lands, for sake of his assistance, resigned the sovereignty of that city to the Karakitayan prince (Q), who immediately assumed the name of Kavar Khân (R), or the great lord; after which he conquered the towns of Andijan, Tashkant, and Turkestan, and made Samarkand tributary. After he was returned home, he sent Aris, one of his generals, with a numerous army, towards Urgbenj (S); who obliged Vighish (T), Khân of that city, to pay his master a tribute of 20,000 gold dinars. However, Soltân Mohammed, his successor, refusing to do what his father had done, prepared for war. But though he had gathered all the forces of his dominions, which extended as far as Rûm (U), yet he was defeated by Kavar Khân, and obliged to fly for shelter to the Kanklis, till he could find means to obtain a peace ^a.

IN the year 1209, Kuchluk, the son of Tayyan (X), Khân of the Naymans, having been Karakitayan defeated by Jenghîz Khân, and his father slain, fled for shelter to Karakitay Kûrkhân, who empire, received him honourably, and gave him his daughter in marriage ^b: which favours, not long

(P) In the English translation Jalâjâgûn: it was the capital of Turkestan, about 140 miles to the north-east of Tonkat, on the river Sir.

(Q) It is hard to say which of the two accounts is, in the main, the most exact; but both are erroneous, as well as defective, in certain particulars. Abu'lghâzi Khân seems to make Nusi Tayghir Ili the founder of the dynasty of the western Karakitayans; whereas there were several kings of that race (1), which began in 1124, as hath been related above. On the other hand, Mirkond gives Kuyang, his second Kurkhân, a reign of eighty-one years, if we may depend on the extract (2).

So that, on a supposition that it ended in 1214, by the conquest of Kuchluk, whom that author makes Kuyang's successor, the beginning of it will fall in the year 1133; which is to make him begin his reign in Turkestan eight years before his predecessor; to whom, according to Mirkond's account, Ilek Khân resigned in 1141; whereas Abu'lghâzi Khân places that event in 1117. We frequently meet with such irreconcilable disagreements in the extracts made from the oriental historians: whether the originals are more consistent we know not; but possibly the difficulties might be cleared up from the history of the western Lyaû or Kitan, which, we are told, is given at large in the Chinese annals (3).

(R) A mistake, perhaps, in the reading, for Kûrkhân: for the same letters may admit of both readings.

(S) Or Orkeni, the capital of Karazm.

(T) A mistake, perhaps, for Tekefb, or Tekasb.

after, he repaid with ingratitude. Upon his revolt, he sent ambassadors to conclude a peace with Soltân Mohammed, whom he left at liberty to take Kâshgar and Khotan, in case he could conquer them before him. Kacbluk attacked his father-in-law first, and prevailed for a while, but was at length defeated. Soltân Mohammed, on his side, entered Kûrkân's dominions, and would have made great progress, but for the revolt of one of his generals with part of his troops. This accident, which happened in the midst of a battle, put the Soltân in no small danger; so that at length he was forced, in the habit of a Tartar, to cut his way through the enemy to join his army. After which he founded a retreat; and, by slow marches, returned to Karazm.

thrown.

As for Kacbluk, he still continued his rebellion, and at length deprived his father-in-law of more than half of his dominions. But his ingratitude did not remain long unpunished: for, in 1216, Jenghîz Khân sent one of his most experienced generals against him; and although he advanced with an army superior to the Mogols, yet he was overthrown; and, flying with some troops, was at last overtaken near Badagshân in Great Bukharia, and put to death^d. After this the Mogol forces over-ran Turkestân, slaughtering all who opposed them. And thus an end was put to the very name, as well as dominion, of the Turks in Tartary.

Character of the Turks before the time of Jenghîz Khân; and whether they were the descendants of the antient Scythians, or the present inhabitants of Tartary are descended from them.

Customs of the AFTER what has been said of the early Turks and their affairs, it might be proper to give some account of the manners and customs of those people: but our memoirs are very defective in such particulars. The Byzantine historians, already cited, take notice of very few things concerning them, and that only occasionally: as, that the Roman ambassadors found their king, Disabules under a tent, attended by a coach (or waggon) with two wheels^a: that it was their custom to shave the beard in token of grief; and that Taxander required this ceremony of the Roman ambassadors upon the death of his father^b: that, during the funeral, he ordered four Huns to be brought out of prison, and slain upon the tomb, with the horses of the deceased prince^c: that they pay public signs of respect to the fire and water, and chant hymns in honour of the earth: that, however, they adore only one God, creator of the visible world, and sacrifice to him horses, bulls, and sheep: lastly, that their priests can foretel future events^d.

ancient Turks,

purely Tartar-
ian.

By the report of Rubruquis the monk, and others, who travelled into Tartary in the thirteenth century, as well as of the orientals, who wrote the history of Jenghîz Khân, it appears that the same customs were common to the Mogols, and other inhabitants of Tartary, in the time of that conqueror.

Bad character by

THE Greek historians, from whence we took these notices, say nothing as to the character of the Turks: but that defect may be easily supplied from the Arab and Persian authors, with whom the word Turk passes usually for a highwayman or robber. Hafez, a Persian poet, who lived in the fifteenth century, speaking of some evil, says, that it takes from our hearts all patience and repose, with as much violence as the Turks or beggars do the victuals from a well-furnished table. What is more surprizing, we meet with a distich in the Turkish language to this purpose: Although a Turk or Tartar should excel in all the sciences, yet the barbarian would still be rooted in his nature. It may be seen, in the history of the Khalîfahs of the family of Abbas, to what a degree the blood of the Turks was thought unworthy to be mixed with theirs, when it was proposed to give a princess of that house in marriage to Togrûl Beg, first Soltân of the Seljûk race.

Arabs and Persians.

Why hated
by them.

BUT that these things were, in great measure at least, owing to prejudice, appears from a proverb which the Persians have, importing, that no person need ever scruple to kill a Turk, even though he was a doctor of the Mohammedan law. The Arabs and Persians bore hatred to the Turks, for the injuries received from them, for several ages together, not only by their frequent invasions from Tartary, but also by the disturbances they raised in their dominions. To explain this, it must be observed, that Al Motasssem, eighth Khalîfah of the Abbâs race, Sbehâbaddin, Soltân of the race of Gaur, Al Mâlek al Sâleh, Soltân of the family of Ayyob in Egypt, and several other princes of Asia, caused a great number of young Turkish slaves, the a handsomest who could be procured, to be bought, and educated in their courts (A); these being formed into troops of militia, as hath been already mentioned ^f, not only often rebelled, and deposed the Khalifâh, but, involving the country in cruel war, committed unheard-of outrages on the inhabitants ^g.

THIS is the true foundation of the great animosity which the Arabs and Persians bore the Turks; who, it must be acknowledged, always were a most turbulent and insolent race of mortals, as they still are, where they had power; though humble enough where they had none. However, they were not altogether so despicable and brutish as their enemies represent them. Yet esteemed The good air and mien of those young slaves above-mentioned pleased the eyes of the Persians; for their hand-

b infomuch that the poet Hafez himself, who had passed so severe a reflection on them, would have homeneffs. the word Turk to signify a handsome man: and was charmed with one of them to such a degree, that, in his Divân, he cries out, If I could but gain the good-will of this Turk of the city of Shirâz, I would give, for the smallest of his favours, the cities of Samarkand and Bokhâra ^h.

From these the Turkmâns,

c and even the founder of the Othman family (B), descended. In effect, the Turks originally, like all the other nations inhabiting Tartary, lived in the fields, under tents, and without any a wandering houses, but such as were carried on carts. This appears plainly enough from the manner in life. which the Roman ambassadors found their king Disabules encamped, in the sixth century, with tents and carts, just as the Mogols, Elûths or Kalmûks, and Turkmâns, encamp at present. And we presume it will be very difficult to prove, that ever the Turks lived in towns, or fixed habitations, till such time as they had conquered them (C) from their neighbours in the south.

THUS we have, from the imperfect memoirs which are in our possession, given the best account we could of the origin of the Turks, of the tribes into which their nation is divided by the oriental authors, and of their affairs from the sixth century, when they became considerable, till the time of Jenghîz Khân. But, before we quit the subject, it will be necessary to d examine into three particulars; 1. Whether the Turks are descended from the antient Scythians, Descendants of mentioned by the Greek and Roman authors. 2. Whether all the inhabitants of Tartary are the ancient either originally Turks, or sprung from one and the same root. 3. Whether Turkestan always Scythians. had the same situation and extent that it has at present.

FIRST, Whether the Turks, or, if you will, all the present inhabitants of Tartary, are descended from the ancient Scythians. If by Scythians is to be understood not those properly so called, but all the different nations mentioned by Herodotus, Pliny, Ptolemy, and other authors, which, under that common name, inhabited that vast region, it may, without hesitation, be answered, that the present inhabitants are descendants of the antient; or rather of such of them as remained in Tartary, over and above those which might have been destroyed, or migrated into other regions:

e for not only there is a great conformity in the persons, manners, and customs of both, but no other nation or nations can be assigned, from whence the present possessors of Tartary could proceed. To the south of them live people, such as the Persians, Indians, Tibetians, and Chinese, who always dwelt in cities, or fixed habitations; and, consequently, could never be tempted to change their country and way of living for those of the Scythians, unless compelled by force (D), of which we meet with no instance in history.

INDEED, if we descend to particular nations or tribes, and want to know whether the Turks But from what are sprung from the Massagete, the Naymâns from the Iffidon Scythians, or would trace the tribe. migrations of the Sakæ, Huns, Sarmatians, or other swarms from that immense and prolific hive, the attempt will prove a fruitless labour. This will plainly appear, if it be only considered, f 1. That most of the names of the Scythian nations, which we find in the authors above-mentioned, did not properly belong to them, but were given them by the Greeks. Even the general name of Scythians was unknown to the Scythians, who, we are told by Herodotus, called themselves Skolot. Again; those names which cannot be affirmed to have been corrupted, or imposed by the Greeks, were such, perhaps, as were given to them by other nations (E). Thus the people, whom they called

(A) Much in the same manner as the Janizaries at present among the Turks.

(B) And hence the Othmâns, as well Seljûks, have been stigmatized with the name of Turkmans, by the Arabs and Persians.

(C) Thus the Mankâts and Kassâts never dwelt in cities, till they settled in Turkistan: yet still in summer encamp in fields. So the Elûths or Kalmûks never lived in towns, till they conquered Little Bukhâria and Tibet, where the Khân, at certain times, resides.

(D) As the Vigûrs, who seem to be Tibetians, might have been.

(E) This is commonly done at present from various motives. The Turks call the Poles Leb, from a king or called Scythians, were named by the Persians Sagæ or Sakæ, as we learn from Mela and Pliny; ^a yet the Greeks considered the Sakæ as a particular nation or tribe of Scythians. Hence the Greeks confounded the several nations together, gave one nation the name of another, and often the same nation several different names, as hath been already hinted.

2. ANOTHER reason which makes it very difficult, if not almost impossible, to discover what nations or tribes the antient names found in authors belong to, or to trace the several removals of those tribes, is; that it seems to have been always customary with the inhabitants of Tartary, as it is at present, to change their names on various occasions, as on removing their situation, dividing into different branches, being brought in subjection by other tribes, or in compliment to the reigning prince, if much beloved by them, of which some instances have been already produced ^k, and more will be given, when we come to the history of the Tartars. ^b

of Tartary,
not all Turks;

As to the second question, whether all the inhabitants of Tartary are either originally Turks, or sprung from one and the same root, our opinion is in the negative: for there is no probability that people, so extremely different in their make and features, as most of the Mohammedan Tartars, and the Elûths or Kalmûks are, should proceed from the same stock, any more than fresh and salt water should proceed from the same fountain. It is true, all the inhabitants of Western Tartary (for those of the Eastern are out of the case) speak the same language, or at least dialects of it: but might not this happen through constant intercourse, or one power prevailing over the rest, as that of the Turks did in the sixth century, and that of the Mogols in the twelfth? the conquered people generally speak the language of the conquerors, as well as their own, which, by degrees, becomes extinct; as that of the Kopts almost already is in Egypt, where the Arabic prevails; the Celtic in Gaul, where the French takes place; and in England the British, which has been superseded by the English. ^c though all

same language.

HOWEVER, it must be allowed, that the identity or affinity of languages would go for almost a certain proof of the identity of nations, as to origin, did they agree in the other circumstances before-mentioned; and might also be admitted as a tolerably sure rule in tracing the migrations of people; because the migrating nation cannot receive their language from people of a different tongue among whom they live; and therefore must be a-kin to the unmigrating nation, whose language happens to be the same with theirs. Thus the language which the Ottomân Turks speak, though mixed with Persian, Arabic, and even Greek words, demonstrates ^d that they came from Tartary, or are descended from some of the inhabitants of that region, known by the name of Turks; although it may not be easy to ascertain the particular tribe or tribes from which they draw their original.

WE come now to the third question, whether Turkestan always had the same situation and extent which it has at present. To this we answer likewise in the negative; and make no scruple to affirm, that it hath often changed its situation as well as bounds; which we shall endeavour to demonstrate in the next section.

Of the original country inhabited by the Turks, with a description of the present Turkestan.

Names of Turkestan,

IT appears, from the account already given, both by the Roman and Chinese historians, that ^a the country possessed by the Turks, at their first becoming known in the world, was about the middle of all Tartary, towards mount Altay, which divides that great region, as it were, into two parts: and that, in a few years, they, from a very inconsiderable beginning, extended their dominion from the river Lyau in the east, as far westward as the Caspian sea. Thus almost the whole of Great Tartary (A), becoming subject to the Turks, might have taken the name of Turkestan, or country of the Turks; at least the oriental writers give that name to all the countries lying on the north of the river Sihûn or Sir, the Jaxartes of the antients.

and Turân.

THE name of Turân they extend still farther, making it to include all the countries to the north of the Jihûn or Amû, that is Tartary and Mawarâ'nahr, now called Great Bukhâria ^a; and thus they seem to make their own hero Tûr amends for the loss sustained by the Tartarian hero Turk, who has ingrossed all the inhabitants of Tartary as his descendants. But the ^b or general of the Poles. The Uzbek Tartars, by way of nick-name, call the Elûths, Kalmûks: and these, in return, name the others, Hafak Puruk. So the Arabs call the Persians, Ajem; that is, barbarians: as the Greeks formerly did all foreign nations.

(A) All but what is, by us, called Eastern Tartary, to the east of Lyau tong.

a fault lay in the framers of the ancient Persian history, who, by leaving the final k out of Tür's name, gave their rivals the Turks an opportunity, by the addition of that letter, to form one more suitable to the person who was to represent their great ancestor.

It may be presumed, if the name of Turkeſtân ever prevailed over all Tartary, that it Extends over continued in use so long only as the dominion of the Turks was entire: but that when their Tartary power was broken, and they became divided under many sovereigns, Turkeſtân also became divided into so many different parts, and lost the name, which seemed to have settled in the western part of Tartary, to the north of Persia and Great Bukhâria; where probably the descendants of their first Khân, Disabules^b, fixed their seat. From these quarters it was, that they made continual war upon the Persians and Arabs, for several ages together; and here

b they maintained their dominion longest, and with greatest lustre.

THIS, at least, we know from history; that, soon after the time of Toxander, in the seven-*Ceases in the*teenth century, the Turks fell to war among themselves, which probably ended in a partition*east*. of their dominions*: and, in the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries, we find the country of the Turks actually divided among several Khakhâns, or kings, some of whom had very large territories, called by different names, or those of the tribes under their subjection, as hath been already set forth^c in a foregoing section. However, it must be observed, that all those territories extending over almost the whole of Western Tartary, are represented as parts of the Belâd Al Atrâk, which is the Arabic word answering to the Persian Turkeſtân, that is, the country of the Turks.

c It may be presumed, that the nations who were not immediately subject to the successors of Settles in theDisabules, were, in time, conquered or brought in subjection by some other nation or nations,west. more to the east or south: and thus the name of Turkeſtân came to cease, or be disused, in all but the western parts of that empire, where the Turks still preserved their power: on which account it always retained the name of Turkeſtân with the Persians.

HOWEVER, from time to time, the Turks in this western region, at different times, seem to Revives in have recovered or extended their dominion eastward, as they found opportunity, from their the east. own increase of strength, or the weakness of their neighbours, whom they had to deal with.

d Thus, in the time of Ebn Saïd al Magrebi, the geographer^d, Kâshgar, in Little Bukhâria, was the capital of Turkeſtân; as it seems to have been also in 996, under Ilek Khân. At least Turkeſtân must, at that time, have been divided into two distinct dominions, the western and the eastern; of which last, according to some authors^e, Ilek Khân was the sovereign lord, while Arſlan Khân reigned over the former.

EASTERN Turkeſtân, if we may so call it, that is, the countries east of Kâshgar, soon after fell Extends over into the hands of the Karakitayans; and from thence had the name of Karakitay given to it Tartary. by the Persian historians. But at length, about the middle of the twelfth century, both the eastern and western Turkeſtân were united again under one prince, in consequence of the surrender made by Ilek Khân of Balâsagûn to Karakitay Kûrkhân, or Kavar Khân^f: nor did the western Turkeſtân, upon that revolution, take the name of Karakitay, but still retained its own, at least with the Persians.

e BUT things did not long continue in this state: for, at the beginning of the thirteenth Again con- century, Kuchluk the Naymân, rebelling against his father-in-law Kûrkhân, wrested from him tracted. the eastern Turkeſtân; and thus once more caused a division of the empire. Some say both parts were united again in the person of Kuchluk himself, who succeeded Kûrkhân. Be that as it will, in a very few years after, Jenghîz Khân the great having over-run the whole western Tartary with his Mogols, all Turkeſtân became a province of his immense empire. Since which time we have heard no more of eastern Turkeſtân, or oriental Turks.

HOWEVER, the part of Tartary to the north of Persia and Great Bukhâria, still retained the Remains in the name of Turkeſtân; and, in the partition which Jenghîz Khân made of his empire among his west. four sons, fell to the share of Jagatay (B), who was the second. But, in process of time, these new monarchies being split into lesser states by intestine factions, and the descendants of one brother invading those of another, Turkeſtân fell into the hands of the Uzbeks, and, at last, into those of the Kassîts and Mankâts; who were formerly the subjects of Juji, eldest son of Jenghîz Khân; and at present is possessed by them: the Kassîts having the eastern part, and the Mankâts (better known in Europe by the nick-name of Kara Kâlpaks), the western part, under their respective Khâns; who, with their subjects, are Mohammedans.

FROM what has been said on this subject, it appears that Turkeſtân had not always the same Why so subject situation and extent; but varying both, from time to time, is found sometimes in one part of Tartary, ſometimes in another; juſt as the Turks, who, like the other tribes, lived for the moſt part in the fields, were able to ſtand their ground, or obliged to give way to ſuperior force. Thus countries, which have neither cities, nor any fixed habitations, may be ſaid to be of an itinerant nature, and follow their inhabitants where-ever they remove. However, the Turks, who inhabited to the north of either Great Bukhâria or Persia, had generally towns along the Sir in their poſſeſſion, as the Mankâts and Kaſſits have at preſent: and as it was from the ſame quarter that thoſe countries were, from time to time, invaded by them, it always retained, among the Persians, the name of Turkeſtân: with the deſcription of which we ſhall cloſe this introduction to the hiſtory of the Turks.

Preſent Tur-
keſtân's ſite.

THE preſent Turkeſtân is ſituate between 42 and 50 or 51 degrees of latitude, and between 73 and 90 degrees of longitude, reckoning from Ferro, one of the Canary iſles. It is bounded on the north by the Aral Yâz, or mountains of eagles, which are no better than hills in thoſe quarters; on the eaſt, by the dominions of the grand Khân of the Elths or kalmûks; on the ſouth, by the river Sir, which ſeparates it from Karazm and Great Bukhâria (C); and on the weſt by the Caspian ſea, and the river Yem. It may be about 660 miles in length from weſt to eaſt, and 540 in breadth from ſouth to north.

Natural ſtate.

THE country conſiſts generally of vaſt extended plains, which are very fruitful; and has but a few mountains, excepting thoſe before mentioned. It is watered by ſome rivers; ſuch as the Tarâz, or Telâſh, which falls into the Sir; the Turugay, which falls into the Talâſh; the Karaſi; and others of leſs note. They all deſcend from the north, and fall, for the moſt part, into the Sir; but authors differ as to the particular places where they enter that river. Here likewise one meets with ſeveral lakes. Among the reſt, one called Kamiſh Nor, that is, the lake of reeds, is 40 or 50 miles long, and 30 broad. That of Iſſikol, where Turk, the ſon of Jafet, is ſaid to have ſettled, is very near the eaſtern border of Turkeſtân, if not within it.

Principal cities.

WHEN Turkeſtân was in its flouriſhing ſtate, under its own ſovereigns, and even till the irruption of Jenghîz Khân, it abounded with ſtrong and populous cities. However, theſe, or moſt of them, probably, were not built by the Turks, who lived moſtly in the fields, but by the old inhabitants in the country, or the Arabs, from whom they took them. Theſe were ſituate chiefly on the rivers in the ſouthern parts; eſpecially on the great river Sir; which was its natural common boundary on the ſide of Mawarâ'nabr, or Great Bukhâria. The chief of theſe were Jenghikant, Jund, Yaffi, Sabrân, Saganâk, Uzkend, Otrâr, Tarâz, Eſſijab, Oſbanikat, Tonkat, Balaſigân, Benket, Tâſhkant, Shakrokîya, &c.

Royal ſeats.

FOUR of the above-mentioned cities were, at different periods, the capitals of Turkeſtân; namely, Jenghikant, or Kariyat al Jididab, in the time of Al Bergendi the geographer. Balîf-âgân, or Kambâlik, enjoyed that honour from 1017 to 1177; and Otrâr was the metropolis in 1200; when Soltân Mohammed Karazm Shâh took it from Karakitay Kîrkhân, king of Turkeſtân.

MANY of the above-mentioned cities ſtill exiſt, notwithstanding the deſtruction made of them by the Mogols, under Jenghîz Khân: but we are better acquainted with the ſtate of them at that time, than at preſent; being furniſhed with very few modern accounts relating to this part of Aſia.

Yengi kant.

YENGI kant (E), or Al Kariyat al Jadidab, as the Arabs called it, both names ſignifying the new city, or fortreſs, was ſituate, according to the Arab geographers, near the river al Shâſh (F), which falls into the lake of Karazm. This we take to be the Aral Nor, or lake of Eagles, in that country. It was ten days journey [of the Karawâns] from Karazm, twenty from Farab

Jund, or Jand.

(or Otrâr), and twenty-five from Bokhâra^b. Jund or Jand was a little city, not far from thence. It is near the mouth of the Sibûn, and has produced ſeveral famous men. Mirkbond relates, that it was from this and ſome other cities thereabout that the Scythian ambaffadors went to meet Alexander, and reproached him for his ambition and rapine. On the approach of the Mogols under Tuſhi, ſon of Jenghîz Khân, in 1219, Soltân Mohammed Karazm Shâh, to whom it was then ſubject, ſent 5000 men to garriſon it. However, Kutluk Khân, the governor, fled: but the inhabitants, depending on the ſtrength of the walls, and its towers, which was very great, they ſtood on their defence, and might have held out a long ſiege, if it had not been ſurprized by ſtratagem, without bloodſhed. On this account their lives were ſpared; but they loſt all their effects¹.

ties are inclosed with a wall, as are its gardens and out-buildings. It is well supplied with running waters^x. a

Al Shâsh, or Tashkunt. AL SHASH was formerly a magnificent city, subject to Samarkand, near the Sibûn; from whence the water flowed to every house. It is four stages from Khejend, and five from Fargâna or Andukand^y. It is at present called Tashkunt^z; but much reduced from its former splendor, having been often destroyed and rebuilt; yet is the winter residence of the Khân of the Kassits, who possesses the east part of Turkestan^a. Tusht took this place from Soltân Mohammed in 1219; but not without much effusion of blood^b, and afterward put a great number of the inhabitants to the sword^c.

Fenakunt, now Shahrukhiya. FENAKUNT (L) was a strong city, on the eastern bank of the Sîr, in the time of Jenghîz Khân. That prince sent 50,000 men against it, under two generals: and tho' Soltân Mohammed had detached thither 10,000 men, yet it was taken, after a siege of three days. All the garison were put to the sword, and the inhabitants carried into slavery^d. It was so ruined on this occasion, that there remained no vestigia of it till 1392, when Timûr Beg ordered it to be rebuilt, and peopled: and, as that conqueror gave it to his son Mirza Shabrokh, it was from him called Shabrokhhiya (M). So we are informed by the author of Timûr's life^e. At present it is a miserable place, of about 200 cabins, dependent on Tashkunt; from whence it lies about sixteen leagues to the east^f, or rather perhaps to the south. b

Tunkât, or Tonkât. TUNKAT, or Tonkât, is a city and mart of the province of Ilâk. Before the time of Jenghîz Khân it was inclosed with a wall, in which were many gates. It stood on a river; from whence water flowed into the town, and through its territories. It had a castle for its defence, and was adorned with the palace of a prince. While it was in the hands of the Arabs and Persians it had a wall, extending from the mountain Shâbâleg to the end of the valley of Al Shâsh, built to hinder the irruptions of the Turks. This city was the nursery of many learned men^g, and called Dar al ilm; that is, the palace of the sciences; on account of the academy of arts and sciences, which was formed there. It was a place so fitted for pleasure, that it became a saying, that God never made a more delicious dwelling than Tonkât^h. Jenghîz Khân held a general diet here in the year 1224; which was so numerous, that its plain, though seven leagues in length, was scarce able to contain the number of people who were assembled on that occasionⁱ. c

City Turkestan. To the cities before described 'tis necessary to add that of Turkestan, which we omitted to mention among the towns of this country; because we find no ancient place of that name in the oriental authors; though possibly it then existed under some other denomination, being mentioned often by Abû'lghâzi Khân, in the earliest times of his history. It stands on a river that comes from the north-east, and falls into the Sîr a little below the town (N): though built of brick, is yet a very pitiful place, and remarkable for nothing but an agreeable situation: however, in this condition it enjoys the honour of being the capital of Turkestan, and is the residence of the Khân of the Mankûts, who possesses the western part of this country^k. d

C H A P II.

The history of the Seljûkians of Irân, or Persia at large; and of Kermân.

S E C T. I.

The authority on which the Seljûk history is grounded.

BESIDES the empires which the Turks established in Tartary, their native country, they ^{Seljûkian} founded four great monarchies in the south of Asia. The three first were possessed by ^{dynasties.} the princes of the same family, called Seljûks and Turks, of the same tribe or tribes. The fourth, by princes of the family of Othmân, or Ozmân (A), with their respective followers. Of these we propose to give the history in order; and are sufficiently furnished with materials for setting the Othmân affairs in a very good light. We could wish, for the reader's sake, that we were but half as well provided to treat of the Seljûk dynasties. The misfortune is, that, although many Persian and Arab authors have penned their history at large, but few copies in the original language have as yet appeared in this part of Europe; and none of them been translated into any ^{European} tongue.

'Tis true that two or three oriental historians have been rendered into Latin, who speak of Oriental ^{histo-} the Seljûk affairs; as Abû'l-faraj (B), Ebn Amîd, called Al Makîn (C), and the Lebtarîkh (D) ^{rians.} of Amîr Yabia; but although these furnish us with the origin of those monarchies, and a succession of their kings, with many facts, and their dates, not to be met with in our western writers; yet they are all too general to give such a light into the history of them, as might be sufficient to satisfy the curious. The two first authors likewise, being digested in the form of annals, the Seljûk history is given mixed with that of other states, and not in one continued series, as it is in the Lebtarîkh: but then this latter, besides its great conciseness, treats only of the first Seljûk monarchy, and Al Makîn of no more than the six first princes of that line.

THESE defects indeed are somewhat supplied by D'Herbelot; who has made an extract of the history of the respective kings of each dynasty from Mirkbond, often mentioned before, and other Persian historians. But Teixeira, who has given an abstract of Mirkbond, so far as relates to the history of Persia, says very little of the Seljûks, except Togrûl Bek, or of their affairs, and that very imperfectly, as well as in confusion. Perhaps he grew tired towards the end of his work, or was afraid of swelling it too much; for we presume his author Mirkbond has handled matters in a more exact and particular manner.

As for the Greek or Byzantine historians (both those who wrote by way of annals, or such as ^{The western} penned the lives of particular emperors), they give such imperfect, confused, and erroneous ^{writers}

(A) Othmân is the Arab pronunciation; Ozmân, the Persian, which is mostly followed by the Turks.

(B) The work of Gregory Abû'l-faraj, near the Euphrates, is intitled, a compendious history of dynasties, or successions. It is written by way of annals, and takes in the transactions of the most remarkable kingdoms, from the beginning of the world to the end of the thirteenth century. He is remarkable for giving a good account of the Mogol affairs under Jenghîz Khân, and his successors, to that time. He likewise has inserted many remarkable particulars relating to the Seljûk dynasties; especially that of Rûm, or Nutolia, which he had an opportunity of knowing, as having been a physician of Malatia, a city of that country near the Euphrates. His history, in Arabic, with a Latin translation, was published by Dr. Edward Pocock, that great master in oriental learning, as well as languages.

(C) George, the son of Abu'lyaser al Amîd, compiled a history out of several authors, particularly Abû Jaffar Al Tabârî, and Kemaloddin Armuni. The first a very copious author (1). It begins at the creation, and reaches down to the year of Christ 1127. The latter part, stiled Tavîkh Al Moslemîn, or the history of the Moslems, was published by Erpenius (but from a very faulty copy), both in folio and octavo. in 1625. The former has joined with it a Latin translation; which is also published separately in quarto, under the title of Historia Saracenica. He was for his learning called Al Sheykh al Kais al Makîn; that is, the prime doctor, solidly learned. Hence his translator stiles him Al Makîn: but all others quote him by the name of Ebn Amîd, or the son of Amîd, who was secretary for 45 years to the council of war under the Soltâns of Egypt, of the family of Jûb, or Jeb; and on his father's death, succeeded him in that employment (2).

(D) The Lebtarîkh, or Lob Al Tarwarîk, is written in Persian by the Amîr Yabia Ebn Abû'ollatîf of Kazvîn, in the year 1541 (3). This is a very brief history of the Mohammedan monarchies, and those preceding Mohammed. It was translated into Latin by M. Golmin, a Frenchman; but part of the copy, at the beginning and end, is lost; the remainder was published by M. De Thevenot, in his collection of voyages and travels. It is observable, that the extracts given from the Lebtarîkh by Mr. D'Herbelot, who often makes use of it, sometimes differ widely, and even contradict the text of Golmin: but the fault must needs be in one of the copies, which were made use of by those two gentlemen, neither of whom can be supposed capable of expounding their author so ill.

accounts of all transactions which happened without the bounds of the Roman empire, that scarce a any thing true, or of moment, is to be expected from them. This may appear from the histories of the Arabs, the Khâlifabs, and other Persian monarchies, as well as that of the Seljûks, compiled out of them by Curio, Lonicerus, Bizarus, Leunclavius, and other authors. These our very defective; Knowles made use of, in his voluminous work; which, consequently, must be, like the originals, a confused imperfect mass, full of chasms and intricacies; nor to be depended on, either as to the facts, dates of actions, or even names of places and persons: in which they disagree so much, that it would be utterly impossible for any man to reconcile them (E), or make any good use of their materials, without the assistance of the oriental authors to direct his steps.

OUR readers will easily perceive this, by only slightly comparing the account, which we shall give them, of the Seljûk dynasties, with that furnished by any of the above-mentioned authors: b for although Leunclavius hath gone far beyond the rest, with regard to the history of the Othmân Turks, as being taken in part from the Turkish historians; yet what little he hath collected in relation to the Seljûks, is almost wholly drawn from European authors, having had no oriental writers to help him out.

HOWEVER, it is not to be thought, by what has been said, that the Byzantine and other western historians are of no use in writing the history of the Turks: on the contrary, as the latter Greek emperors had wars with the Seljûks as well as the Othmâns, so those wars, related sometimes in detail, sometimes very superficially, make a part of their history; and hence it is that we sometimes meet with transactions not to be found in the oriental authors. Which shews, that to write the history of a nation with any completeness, it is absolutely necessary to consult the histo- c ries of those nations with whom it hath had hostilities, or other concerns.

BESIDES, although in relating the affairs of the Turks, we ought in reason to give preference to Turkish authors, as every nation must needs be best acquainted with their own transactions, yet we are not to expect absolute perfection and exactness from them: for they sometimes differ in the account they give of the origin of their monarchies, as well as in the actions and reigns of their princes, with respect to their beginning and length: but this is no more than what happens to the historians of all other nations; for often the rise of states being attended with various changes, before they come to be settled, and their founders obscure or inconsiderable persons, it is therefore difficult sometimes to fix the origin of either. Besides, the memory of many transactions and events is lost or obscured in the confusion introduced in countries by wars d and revolutions; especially, if they be of any long continuance. However, as some historians are more exact, as well as particular, than others; and it being our misfortune, as yet, to have only extracts from the orientals, and those not from any historian who has written expressly on the subject, it is therefore presumed, that the reader, where-ever he meets with any such imperfections in the following history, will rather impute them to these last than to the first-mentioned causes.

THIS we judge to be doing no more than what is justice, even to the authors from whence the extracts before us are made, in order to prevent our readers taking up any hasty prejudices against the oriental writers in general, from the defects which they may discover in the few scanty materials out of which we are obliged to compose the history of the Seljûks, for want of more e copious memoirs. And indeed there is the more reason for this apology in their favour, because the extracts in question differ in certain particulars, and, among the rest, in those relating to the origin of the Seljûks, and the establishment of their monarchies.

(E) The reader may find a remarkable instance of this in the learned and judicious Leunclavius, who, examining into the original of the Seljûks, as delivered by several authors, all disagreeing among themselves; was so perplexed in his judgment, as to reject the true list given by Ayton, or Hayton, the Armenian (1), of the first kings of that race, in favour of the false account given by Cedrenus, and other Greek writers (2), as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter.

The origin of the Seljûkians, and their entrance into Persia.

Seljûk his descent.

SELJUK, or Saljûk, the founder of the Seljûk dynasty of Irân, or Persia at large, according to the Lebtarîkb, derived his origin from Afrasiab, often before-mentioned^a, and was the thirty-fourth descendant from that prince, in a direct male line.

BUT Mirkbond, in his account of the genealogy of Jenghîz Khân, says, that Seljûk was of Mogol race, and descended from Boskin Salji, son of Alankâwa^b.

MR. Guignes, in his memoir concerning the origin of the Huns and Turks, extracted from

^b See before. D'HERBELOT, p. 801.

- a the Chinese historians, seems to think, that the Seljuks were derived from a stock different from both the former. He relates, that the children of Tá-mwen Ilkhán, or Tumena Khán; who descended from Buzenjir, the son of Alankáwa; imitating the example of their father, formed an empire, which extended from the Caspian sea to Korea: that this empire, being too large to continue long intire, at length became divided into two; the eastern and the western; each of which had its own Khán: that the empire of the western Turks, which extended as far as the river Sibún, or Sír, was often formidable to the kings of Persia; particularly Hormozd, son of Kostrú Anúshirwán, with whom they had considerable wars: that, in process of time, other Turks, of the hord of Wbey-ke, destroyed the empire of the western Turks, and founded a new empire of their own: and 'tis from these Wbey-ke, in the opinion of Mr. Guignes, the four
- b Seljuk dynasties, which reigned in the southern Asia, were descended.

According to this hypothesis, the Seljuk tribe could not be descended from either Afrasiab Khán, or Alankáwa. But as this is only a conjecture of Mr. Guignes, and he has produced no arguments to support it, we shall leave it, and return to the account given by Mirkbond. This author informs us more particularly as to the family of Seljuk, that he was the son of Dokák, chief officer of Bigú, prince of the Turkish tribes which inhabited the plain of Khozár (A) or Kipchák, to the north of the Caspian sea. Dokák was so renowned, among those of his nation, for his extraordinary wisdom and valour, that they gave him the surname of Tazialg, which signifies a strong bow, and hard to manage. After his death, the king took care to educate Seljuk, who was very young; and, not doubting but the son of such a father would make a very brave man, surnamed him Bassafsi; that is, Chief, or Captain. As he advanced in years, the Soltán heaped favours on him: but, forgetting his duty to so good a prince, he one day presumed to enter the secret apartment of the palace, and would needs see his women and children.

Bigú, being informed of this insolence, was resolved to punish him severely for it. But and fortune. Seljuk, getting some knowledge of his design, thought it best to avoid his anger, by escaping in time. Accordingly, having gathered all his friends and people, who were attached to his family, he retired, with his effects; and (crossing the Sibún, or Sír) drew towards Samar-kand (B). Belíl Khán, governor of that city (C), not relishing such neighbours, resolved to oblige them to remove at a distance: but Seljuk, having augmented his forces, got the better of him in several engagements. In one especially he obtained a considerable advantage, by means of an ambuscade; which was so well conducted, that he acquired a great reputation throughout the country. This success laid the first foundation of his greatness, and emboldened him to present himself before Bobára; where he was very well received.

MIRKHOND mentions nothing of the death of Seljuk; which we learn from two other authors, Ebn Amíd and Ebn Shohnab (D); who differ somewhat in their account of him, both from that historian, and from one another. Ebn Amíd relates, that Dokák, Seljuk's father, being a wise as well as stout man, was always consulted by the king of the Turks, and carried with him in his wars: that he was the first of his family who embraced Mohammedism: that his son Seljuk being of age, when he died, the king made him general of all his forces: but that afterwards, apprehending danger from his crafty disposition, he resolved to kill him; which coming to the knowledge of Seljuk, he fled to Harún Sabab Oddawla, king of Ghabia, and desired aid of him, to go and conquer the country of the infidel Turks: that Harún furnished him with a numerous army, to execute his design; but that, in a battle with those infidels, Seljuk was slain, when he was 107 years old.

According to Ebn Shohnab, Seljuk's father was named Dokák, or Dokmák, which, in Turkish, signifies a hammer; but at present is pronounced Tokmák. Seljuk was chief of one of the principal families of Turkestan; and, as he was always followed by a great number of relations, and others, who were in his interest, the king grew jealous of the great authority which he had acquired, and obliged him to depart his dominions.

f SELJUK upon this retired into the countries of the Mohammedans, where he embraced their religion. His first settlement was at a place called Joud, which depended on the city of Bokbára, in Mawarâlnahr. From whence he continually made incursions upon the infidel parts

(A) On this occasion D'Herbelot observes, that these Kipchák Turks are Khorarians, whom the Greek and Latin historians, who speak of the wars of the emperor Heraclius and Khosroes, call Ararians.

(B) This was in the Hejrah 375, and of Christ 985, according to the Lebtarikh; which says, the motive of their expedition was to seek pasture.

(C) 'Tis not said for whom; but at this time Mawarâlnahr seems to have been under the Khán of Turkestan.

(D) The surname of Múbibo'ddín Abûl valid Mohammed. He was a great doctor, of the sect of Hanifah, and high chancellor of the Arabian Irák. He died in the year of the Hejrah 883, of Christ 1478. He is the author of several works; among the rest, of a very exact history from the creation to the year 806; that is, of Christ 1403. His sons.

of the Turks; whom he harrassed during the whole course of his life: in the length whereof a Ebn Shohnab agrees with Ebn Amid; but mentions nothing about his death.

THE Persian historians unanimously agree, that Seljûk (E) had four sons; but differ a little as to their names; which, according to the Lebtarikh, were Mikaël, Israël, Mussa, and Yunos: but Mirkbond calls the last Bigû, and not Yunos. Ebn Shohnab gives him only three sons; whom he names Alp Aslan, Mikaël, and Mussa (F). While Ebn Amid seems to allow him only one; that is, Mikaël; from whom the founders of the Seljûk monarchy are unanimously acknowledged to have been descended^a. The sons of Seljûk became very powerful in friends, and rich in lands, as well as flocks^f, especially Mikaël; than whom, great numbers of Turks acknowledged no other superior: and, when Soltân Mahmûd Ebn Sabektekî passed the Jibûn, with forces, to the assistance of Warar Khân (G), king of Mawarâ'lnabr, Mikaël b went to salute that prince; who, admiring his courage, and the great submission which his family paid him, intreated him to remain about his person, and, at his return, to accept of the government of Khorasân, in order to defend it against the invasion of enemies. On Mikaël's declining the Soltân's offer, Mahmûd, enraged, sent him in chains to prison, and, returning to Khorasân, still kept him in durance. However, the soldiers and family of Mikaël followed the Soltân, and settled in the plain of Khorasân. This is Al Tabâri's account of the manner in which the Seljûkians first entered Persia^g. But other authors represent the occasion very differently.

MIRKHOND relates, that Mikaël deceased very young; and Ebn Shohnab says expressly, that he died in Mawarâ'lnabr, in the war which he waged with the infidels; and that, for this reason, he is dignified in the genealogy of the Seljûkians with the title of Sbedîd, or Shadîd; c that is, martyr. According to the Lebtarikh, and Mirkbond, Mikaël left two sons, Mohammed and Dawd, who were afterwards called Togrol Beg and Jaffar Beg (H): but Ebn Shohnab adds to these a third, whom he places before the other two, as if the eldest, called Tebegû: but possibly this is Bigû, whom he has omitted among the sons of Seljûk, and reckoned to Mikaël. However that be, we are told by Mirkbond, that Seljûk took great care to educate his two grandsons; and by his will, left them sole heirs to all his effects and growing state. The young princes, having arrived at the age fit to bear arms, were masters of so much address and conduct, as well as valour, that in a short space they greatly enlarged their small territories, by the defeat of several princes of Mawarâ'lnabr; who became their vassals. The d news of these victories coming to the ears of Mahmûd (first Soltân of the Gaznah family, who reigned in Khorasân), he sent to desire them to send some trusty person to him, in order to treat about an affair of importance.

Israël's adventure,

ISRAEL, the uncle of the young princes, offered to repair to the Soltân; who received him with great civility and honour: but one day, being desirous to know what number of troops he was able to furnish him with, in case of need; Israël replied, that if the Soltân would shoot one of the two arrows, which he held in his hand, into their camp, 40,000 horse would immediately set out, for his service: that if he shot the other into the Ordû of Bil-khân (I), he might command 50,000; and the Soltân asking, how many could be had, if there was very pressing occasion, Israël told him, that if he would send his bow into Tur- e kestân, 200,000 Turks would issue forth to his assistance. This discourse so alarmed Mahmûd, that, to prevent danger, he seized Israël, and secured him in a castle; where he died. This castle is named Kalenjar (K), by the author of the Nighiariştân; who says, he was confined there seven years. The same writer speaks of the Seljûkians with great contempt; and says, they were descended from the antient Turkmâns. As a proof of this, he alleges the reproaches which Massûd, third Soltân of the Gazni race, and Mohammed, Soltân of the Karazmians, offered them, on account of the baseness of their original^h. However, the Seljûks looked upon that imputation as a great dishonour to them, and treated it with the utmost contempt.

(E) It is Seljûk, who is to be understood by Hyathon's Sadock (1), and not Tangrolipix, or Togrol Bek, as Leunclavius writes (2); for Haytho makes Sadok the father of Dogrissa (which stands for Dogri Shab, or Dogril Shab); who is evidently Togrol Beg.

(F) Cærenus makes Mikeil the father of Tangrolipix (as he writes Togrol Bek); Habramius Alim, Aspam-Salarius (so he calls Alp Aslan); and a third son, whom he does not name. He adds, that this last left a son, called Asan (or Hassan), surnamed the deaf: that Habramius had a son, called Mukbalet; and that Mikeil's brother had two sons, Kutlu Musas (Kutul Mish), and Abimelek; of whom more hereafter.

(G) Other historians, as hath been before set forth, speak of Mahmûd as undertaking this expedition on his own account against Kara Khân of Turkestân, or of Karakitay. If so, Warar Khân must be a mistake for Kara Khân; and bringing aid to him, a mistranslation for bringing forces against him: which is not unlikely to be the case, considering how faulty a copy Erpenius made use of.

(H) Abû'l-saraj calls him Jagri Beg. These rather were their first names.

(I) The author of the Nighiariştân calls this place Beljân.

a HISTORIANS differ about the time when the Seljuks first passed the Jihûn, to enter into Persia. Some say, it was in the reign of Mahmûd, the first Soltân of the Gazni race, and by his permission; others, in that of his son Massûd. Of the first sentiment are Abûl-faraj, the Lebtarîkh, and Al Makîn.

THE Lebtarîkh relates, that, on their having demanded leave to cross the river, Arslân Jazeb, governor of the city Tûs (L), in Khorasân, was of opinion, that their request should not be granted, lest these four families of the children of Seljuk, which were already pretty numerous, should draw others to them; but that Mahmûd, who confided too much in his own power, rejected the governor's counsel; and, not only granted their demand, but also permitted them to settle in the neighbourhood of Nessa and Bawera (M). This colony increased so much in a short time, by the continual passage of Turks, who joined them (as the governor Jazeb had foreseen), that the inhabitants of Khorasân began to be in fear of them, and resolved to get rid of those new guests, whom they looked on as dangerous neighbours (N).

EBN AMID agrees, in the main, with the Lebtarîkh. He tells us, that Mahmûd before he died, repented much of having suffered the Seljuks to remain in his dominions; fearing they might seize them after his death¹.

ABU'L-FARAJ goes further still on this head. He writes, that in the year 420, while Togrol Beg, with his brothers Dawd and Biga, were still in Mawarâ'nahr, the Gâz Turks (O), under Arslân (P), son of Seljuk, ravaged Khorasân: that, however, Yamûd Oddawla Mahmûd drove them out of that province: but that the enemy, carrying with them about 2000 tents, went to Isfâbân. Togrol Beg, with his brothers Dawd and Biga, the sons of Mikaël (Q), were then in Mawarâ'nahr. Some of the Gâz, after being expelled Khorasân, shaped their way into the province of Adherbijân, where they took the city of Marâga, burnt the temple, and made a great slaughter of the people; among whom were many Kurds (R). After this some went to Ray, others to Hamadûn and Mausel, which they also took².

SOME historians have written, that Soltân Mahmûd gave the Seljuks liberty to cross the Jihûn, in order to seize the vast riches which they had amassed, by the plunder of the best cities in Mawarâ'nahr.

BUT, in opposition to all this, Mirkbond affirms, that the Seljuk Turks, who had already made a great noise in Persia, passed the Jihûn, or Amû, not in the reign of Mahmûd, but of his son Massûd, in the year 424, under the conduct of Togrol Beg and Jaffar Beg; who, settling themselves about the cities before-mentioned, soon after began to make incursions into the neighbouring provinces³.

(M) The first is called also Abiwerd, and the latter Abiwerd or Little Damascus, about 120 miles from the river Jihûn, or Amû, and from each other. They are often mentioned in Abû'lghazi Khan's history of the Turks, by the names of Iburû and Nasay; and, when he wrote, belonged to the kingdom of Karazm.

(N) This account is taken from D'Herbelot's extract, p. 800; but Golmin's copy represents them quite otherwise. There we are told, that Togrol Bek and Jaffar Bek had something so royal in their aspect, that the people of Khorasân were extremely fond of them, and had recourse to them, to decide their differences: that this was the cause of Mahmûd's hatred to them: that the Seljuks having beaten an army sent against them, Mahmûd prepared to be revenged; but the troubles in India calling him thither, he left the conduct of the war to Asbi, governor of Khorasân; who was also defeated.

(O) The Gaz Turks are properly *Turkmen*s. They gave the name to Gazaria.

SECT. III.

Their transactions in Persia, and founding of their first monarchy there.

c ABOUT the time that the Seljuk Turks entered Persia, the provinces of Khorasân, Sablestân, Gaznab, Persian Irâk, Tabrestân, Jorjân, and part of India, were under Massûd, third Soltân of the Gazni race. The rest of Persia (A) was in the hands of Abû'lghanjar, by others called Kalijar, one of the princes of the family of Buyab, or Bowwab; who had reigned in Pârs (or Proper Persia), and Kerman, both the Persian and Arabian Irâks, Mazanderân, and Jorjan, Dijarbekr (or part of Mesopotamia), and in Baghdâd: to the jurisdiction of which city, the dominions of the Khalifah, once so very extensive, were now almost wholly confined.

(A) As Pârs, or Proper Persia, Kermân, Khuzestân, and Adherbijân, with Arabian Irâk, of which Baghdâd was the capital.

As to the provinces of Mawarâ'lnahr and Khorasân, it is somewhat dubious what power they belonged to. From some circumstances in the history of the Gazni Soltâns, they should be in the possession of Massîd, third Soltân of that race^a: by other circumstances, Mawarâ'lnahr, or at least a good portion of it, seems to have been in subjection partly to the Khân of Turkestan, and partly to several princes of its own^b. Ebn Amîd, as hath been related, makes it subject to its own monarch. Possibly all those different princes might have had a share in it; and the confusion which the country must have been in, from so many contending powers, doubtless favoured greatly the quiet entrance of the Seljûks into that province: but it is not probable they had conquered the whole before they entered Persia, as Mîrkbond, in his genealogy of Jenghiz Khân, asserts; not only because he elsewhere brings proof to the contrary, as hath been shewn, but because such a supposition is quite inconsistent with the submission which the same author tells us they offered to Massîd, on their arrival in Khorasân.

Hejrah 421.
A. D. 1030.

ACCORDING to this historian, as soon as they had sat down about Nessâ and Barwerd, they sent an express to that Soltân (who ascended the throne in 421,) to demand a place of settlement; offering to swear obedience and fidelity to him. But Massîd received the ambassador very ill; and, among other disobliging things, said, that he never heard of the Seljûk family, although he was himself a Turk by descent, and therefore ought to be well acquainted with all the illustrious houses of that nation. When the Seljûkians were informed with what contempt the Soltân had treated both their ambassador and family, they prepared for war^c; and, according to Mîrkbond, as related by Teixeira, whilst Massîd was subduing the provinces of Jorjân and Tabrestân, in the year 426, made some commotions in Khorasân; but sat still upon his return (B).

Defeat Soltân
Massîd:

ALTHOUGH their affairs was not settled, yet the Soltân would go into India, against the advice of his generals. In his absence they made incursions throughout the country, from Khorasân to Pârs (or Proper Persia), with so much success, that they obliged Zilla Oddawlat Ebn Kakuya and Abusûlah to quit their governments of Rey and Ispahân, which the Seljûks seized, with other parts of Persia. This was about 428; by which time Massîd returned from his Indian expedition to Gaznah; and, two years after, set out again for Jorjân. In his way, being informed, that Nûr Takkîn, governor of Balkh, oppressed them, he moved towards him, though in a hard frost; but, when advanced about half way, turned back against Dawd Seljûk, who was marching with considerable forces to assist Nûr Takkîn; and, though this latter fell on his rear, and took most of his baggage, yet he held on his way till he met Dawd; by whom being overthrown, he fled to Gaznah; where he put to death many of the Turks who served under him (C); because they had misbehaved in the battle^d.

Nishâbûr:

TEIXEIRA seems to have omitted the most remarkable circumstance, relating to the establishment of the Seljûk monarchy. Ebn Amîd is more particular. This author writes, that Massîd, surnamed Abusayd (soon after Mahmûd's death), sent an army against the Seljûk Turks; who were defeated, and some of them taken prisoners. Not long after this, Mikâ'îl Ebn Seljûk dying (D), his soldiers put themselves under the command of his son Mohammed Abutâlib, surnamed Togrûl Beg; who, attacking Massîd's army, routed it, and pursued them to Tûs: which he besieged, and took. This is the first city which fell into the hands of the Seljûkians; who assembled there, and fortified it. After this they subdued Nishâbûr.

MEANWHILE Massîd fled into India, where he staid a long time: so that Khorasân being deserted by him, the Seljûks made use of the opportunity, and conquered it. Massîd, upon advice of this, returned from India; but the Seljûkians, advancing to meet him, put him to flight (E): upon which the Khalifah Kaym Beamrillab recommended to them the defence of the country of the Moslems (F). Massîd, incensed hereat, marched against them; but they made him turn his back a second time. And thus their empire was established in the year of the Hejrah 430. of Christ 1039^e.

EBN AMID omits to mention either when Nishâbûr was taken, or that Togrûl Bek ascended the throne there; both which happened by the general consent of historians^f, in the year 429, from whence they date the beginning of his reign, and the Seljûk monarchy.

A. D. 1037.

ACCORDING to Mîrkbond (G), as delivered by D'Herbelot, as soon as Togrûl Beg was acknowledged for king in the city of Nishâbûr, in the year 429, he sent his brother Jaffar Bek to subdue

(B) In the English of Teixeira, they are always written Salinguis, or Salinquis, instead of Saljûkis, or rather Saljûkians; and Jakar Bek, instead of Jaffar Bek.

(C) Great part of his forces, and almost all his chief officers, were Turks.

(D) From what has been said before about Mikâ'îl's death, it should seem that he is named here (and perhaps in the former place) by Ebn Amîd, or the authors he copied from, instead of Israel.

(E) According to Alûl-faraj, Massîd, marching from Gazna to Balkh, drove the the Seljûks out of Khorasân, the year after they had taken Nishâbûr (1).

a due the city and county of Herât, or Heri, in the same province of Khorasân: which conquest being soon performed, he placed one of his uncles there, to govern it. In the mean time he marched himself to Merû (H), and, having taken it, he made it his royal seat. After this he put Khorasân under new regulations; and, by that means, suppressed the disorders which had reigned there for a long time. Their royal seat.

THE same year, which was 429, Soltân Maffûd Gazni assembled all his forces to drive the Seljuks out of his dominions: but the two brothers having also collected their troops, after an exceeding bloody battle, gained so complete a victory, that Maffûd found he had no farther business in Khorasân.

b HAVING related what the oriental historians deliver concerning the foundation of the Seljuk monarchy, let us see what the Greeks have said upon the same subject. Two of them, Cedrenus and Nicephorus Bryennus are more particular than the rest, and speak nearly alike. In the year 1030, while Mukhumet (I) (son of Imbrail (K), prince of Persia, Media, the Khorasmians, and Oritans), was engaged on one side with the Indians, and on the other with Babylonians, he sent an embassy to the prince of Turky (L), for 3000 auxiliaries. The Turks, charmed with the presents made on that occasion, readily dispatched the men, under the conduct of Tagrolipix Mukalet (M), son of Mikaël. And the rather, as he flattered himself, that, at their return, when the enemies of the Saracens were defeated, they might easily seize the two castles which guarded the bridge over the Araxis (N), and open a passage for his Turks into Persia, which he proposed to conquer. E verrecus account of their original.

c WITH these succours Mukhumet marched against Pissaffrius (O), prince of the Babylonish Arabs, and easily routed him; the Arabs not being able to withstand the force of the Turkish bows. The expedition being finished, the Turks desired leave to return home; and that the guard of the said bridge might be committed to them: but Mukhumet insisted on their following him into India; and, on their refusal, threatened to compel them (P). The Turks, through fear, withdrew into the desert of Karwonites (Q); from whence they made incursions on the Saracens and Persians. Hereupon Mukhumet sent against them an army of 20,000 men, under ten of his best commanders; who pitched their camp at the entrance of the desert. Tagrolipix, being informed of this, made two great marches, and, coming upon them in the night, defeated them: on which occasion he got abundance of arms, horses, and riches: then, issuing out of the desert, and encamping in the open country, his army, by the accession of disaffected people, slaves, robbers, and the like, increased at length to 50,000 men. by the Greek writers.

d MUKHUMET, imputing the late disgrace to the misconduct of his generals, ordered them to be deprived of their sight; and threatened to expose, in womens cloaths, the soldiers who fled (R). After this, raising an army of Saracens, Persians, Kaviri, and Arabs, 50,000 strong, and having with him 100 elephants, bearing towers, he marched to Ispahan (S); where Tagrolipix hastened to meet him. The conflict, for a time, was bloody and doubtful; but, while Mukhumet rode about to animate his troops, he fell from his horse, and broke his neck (T). Whereupon his army submitting to Tagrolipix, proclaimed him king of Persia. The new monarch immediately sent to open the passage over the Araxis; and, giving free permission to all Turks to enter Persia, vast numbers laid hold of the opportunity; and thus became lords of the country, giving the title of Soltân, which signifies emperor, or king of kings (U), to Tagrolipix; who divided the provinces, and, bestowing all offices in the magistracy and government among his Turks, reduced the natives to a very miserable condition.

e THE reader, from the foregoing specimen, may see what little accuracy he is to expect from the Byzantine historians, with regard to the affairs of other nations; and what little they have confounds the two authors together, as hath been observed before (1), we make no scruple to put Mirkbond in his place: and the rather, since Kondairâr, being only an abridgment of Mirkbond, cannot be supposed to differ from him.

(H) There are two cities of this name in Khorasân; one 130 miles north-east of Herât, the other 140 north of it towards the river Jibûn or Amû. This last, called Merû or Marû Shabjân, is the place mentioned in the text.

(I) This must be Mahmûd, the first Soltân of the Gazni race.

(K) Sambrael, some copies.

(L) Meaning Turkistan.

(M) Nicephorus Bryen makes Mukalet a distinct person from Tagrolipix, or Tegrol Bek.

(N) This is not the Araxes, now Arrûs, in Armenia, as the historians hitherto have imagined; but the Jibûn or Amû.

(O) Nicephorus Bryen calls him Pisares. This is Basafiri, prince of Irâk Arabi, or Bakli, (misnamed by Knowles and others Khalif of Babilon), whom not Mahmûd Gazni, but Tegrol Bek, had to do with, and that not till the 17th year of his reign.

(P) There was some dispute of this kind between them and Maffûd, son and successor of Mahmûd.

(Q) Or Karabonitis, as Nicephorus Bryen.

(R) Something of this nature is related of Maffûd, who put to death several of his Turkish officers and soldiers, for not doing their duty against the Seljuks.

(S) Ispâhân, or Spâhân, capital of Persia.

(T) Mahmûd neither fought a battle with Tegrol Bek, nor died a violent death.

(U) It is equivalent only to the title of king; and was first assumed by Mahmûd Gazni. See that article in D'Hérbelot.

further written concerning the transactions of this Soltân, and one or two of his successors, a excepting such as the Romans themselves had a share in, is no less confused and erroneous.
Let us now resume the history of the Seljûks from the eastern writers.

S E C T. IV.

The reign of Togrol Bek.

Irân.*

THE descendants of Seljûk are, in Arabic, called Seljûkiyûn, or Selajekah, and, in Persian, Seljukiyân; which is made English by the addition only of an s, at the end of it. The b singular of both is Seljûki; which, with the particle Al or the, before it, signifies any person of the family or race of Seljûk (A).

THE oriental authors divide the Seljûkians into three dynasties or races of princes, reigning in the south of Asia, and which were contemporary, not successive; namely, those of Irân, or Persia at large; those of Kermân, a province of Persia; and those of Rûm, or Asia minor; of which we propose to treat in order. And, first, of the Seljûkians of Irân.

Its duration.

THE author of the Nighiariştân gives to the dynasty of Irân fourteen princes; fixes its commencement at the year of the Hejrah 429, of Christ 1037; and terminates its duration, which he makes 161 years, in the year 593, of Christ 1196. This is conformable to Mirkbond (B), and the Lebtarikh; only the latter puts the end of this dynasty in 590: but Katib, or Katib c Sadeb, surnamed Haji Khûlfah, in his work, intitled, Takwîm al Tavarîk, says, that this succession consisted of fifteen Soltâns; who began to reign in 432, and ended in 590; giving them an existence of no more than 158 years^a. Ebn Amîd again places the commencement of the Seljûk monarchy in 430 of the Hejrah; and, in a matter of some uncertainty, 'tis hard to say which computation is most exact: however, as we are obliged to make use of one, we choose to be regulated by that of Mirkbond, and the Nighiariştân.

1. Soltân, To-grol Bek,

TOGROL BEK, or Beg, first Soltân of this dynasty, is the person whom Cedrenus, and the other Byzantine writers, call Tagrolipix, or Tangrolipix, by a corruption of the name, no less extraordinary than common with the Greeks, who have, in all ages, so disfigured most of the words which they borrowed from other languages, that 'tis scarce possible to tell what to make of d them. His Mohammedan name was Abu Taleb Mohammed; and his surname, or title, given him by the Khalifah, Rokn Oddîn (C); the pillar of the faith and religion^b.

ALTHOUGH the Seljûks had gotten possession of almost all Khorasân, yet Massûd, a brave prince, resolved to do his utmost to recover it. Accordingly, in the year 431, having raised a considerable army, he marched against Togrol Bek, and put him to flight; killing a good number of his men, and taking others prisoners, with their arms. Next year Togrol Bek returned to Nishâbûr; from whence Massûd fled to Gazna: and, after this, the Seljûkians became masters of all Khorasân; on which occasion an incredible multitude of people were slain.
Thus writes Ebn Amîd^c.

sian Irâk.

BUT the Lebtarikh relates, that he returned thither after fighting a battle with the Seljûks, e in the plain of Zandekon, near Marû, wherein he was defeated. 'Tis added, that these successes were followed by the patent of investiture (D) sent to the two brothers, Togrol Bek and Jaffar Bek, by the Khalifah Kayim^d; and by the reduction of the provinces of Jorjûn and Tabrestân, in the year 433^e, which Togrol Bek undertook, and then made himself master of all the Persian Irâk^f: for, in 434, Ibrahim Neâl Al Seljûki (E), took Hamadân. He was followed by Togrol Bek, who subdued Rey (F). Then, dividing the provinces between them, Jaffar Beg had for his share Khorasân, and Togrol Beg the Persian Irâk, with the other provinces which he subdued; fixing his seat at (G) Hamadân^g.

which he gave to his son Maëdûd, whom he sent towards Balkh, to defend that frontier^h. f
Then carrying his blind brother Mohammed with him, he marched again into the Indies; where MAEDUD his son, who was then at Balkh, succeeded him in the kingdoms of Mawarâ'ul-Karazm sub- nabr, Khorasân, and India, so far as had been conquered: but the Seljuk Turks, who dwelt in and. those provinces, refusing to acknowledge him, he sent an army against them in 435, which Hejrah 435. being met by Olb Arslân, son of Jaffar Bek, with a considerable force, was overthrown. On A. D. 1043. the other side, great numbers of Turks breaking out of Turkestan into the territories of Gau- mafer and Kandabâr, to plunder, were routed by Maedûd's garrisons¹. By this time the power of the Seljukians was so well established in that large province, that, after the Soltân's death, they found it no difficult matter to join to their other conquests the province of Balkh, with all the country of Karazm^k.

THE same year a detachment of 1650 Gâz (I) horse, under four commanders, Kukias, Abu Turkman in- Ali Ebn Dabkan, Haji Israel, and Abû Mansûr, made an irruption into the country of Amîd (K), vafon. and Miyafarkîn (L), then possessed by prince Abunafsr Ebn Marwân. From thence they went to Nasibîn, where they cut down the trees: and having stayed for some time, proceeded to Musol, whose lord, Karwûs Ebn Moktadîr, bought his peace of them with money. But after destroying the other cities of Diyarbekr and Aljazîrah (M), they returned to Musol, and took it, killing, enslaving, and plundering the inhabitants. When they had been here for some time, the Arabs assembled on all sides; and besieging them, at length drove them out of the city. They afterwards defeated them in several battles, and killed many: the rest fled to Mayasferkîn; and making what plunder they could, retired into *Adherbijân*¹.

THE same year 435, Jakîl Adawlat, king of Baghdâd, dying without children, after seven- Affairs of Per- teen years reign, his nephew Abu Kalanjar (N), son of Soltân Addawlat, succeeded him in the fia. post of Emîr al omerab, that is, generalissimo of the troops of the Khalîfat: and finding Togrol Bek grow powerful in Persia, made an alliance with him in 439, by marrying his son to the A. IN the year 442, Togrol Bek, marching to Ispahân, took it by force; and, four years after Ispahan taken. (446), entering Adherbijân with his troops, reduced it under his obedienceⁿ. Hejrah 442. A. D. 1150.

MALEK Rabîm, king of Baghdâd, succeeded his father Abu'l Ganjar (or Kalanjar) in 440, 1048, as hath been said. But being attacked by Abu Mansûr Fulâd Sotûn, his eldest brother, and deserted by his Turkish troops, he retired to Abwâz (in Khuzestân), and thence to Waset (on e the Dijlat or Tigris); where the war was continued, with various success, till 447: when being Hejrah 447. informed that Togrol Bek, at the instigation of Abu Mansûr, had possessed himself of Shirâz, A. D. 1055. and most of Pârs, he raised all the forces he could, and recovered it: then returned to Waset.

ABU MANSUR having, by the defeat and death of his brother Abufayd, secured himself Other places in the throne of Pars (O), died in a castle, where he was imprisoned by Wazîr Fazel Haf- submit. san, or Huya, who assumed the title of king. Malek Maverd, a Seljuk commander, who was then in the province of Kerman, being informed of this, marched against Fazel Huya, and he fled to another, called Olb Arslân (P), whose lands he farmed; and growing very rich by that means, revolted from him: but soon after was taken, with a son of his called Nezâm al Molk, and imprisoned in the fortress of Strabar, where they died. This was in the year 448.

ABOUT this time Dawd the Seljuik, called also Jaffar Bek, brother of Togrol Bek, who commanded in Khorasân, made war upon Ferokzâd Ebn Massîd, eighth Soltân of the Gazni race (S); but the Soltân defeated him; and then marching into Khorasân, overthrew the king of Turkestan's (T) general, who came to meet him. At last Olb Arslân, advancing against him, routed his forces. Ferokzâd, having reigned six years, died, and left the crown of Khorasân and Mawarâ'nahr (U) to his brother Ibrâhîm Ebn Massîd, who concluded a peace with the Turks, and then marched into India, to make farther conquests ^a.

Basafiri rebels THE distractions which had long subsisted at Baghdâd, occasioned by the Turkish militia, still ^b continued to afflict that city; when great feuds arose between Râis al Ruffa, Wazîr or Vizier to the Khalîfah Kayim Beamrillab, and a Turk called Ruslân Abu'l Harith Mutaffer, surnamed Basafiri (W). This Basafiri was originally a slave to Bobao'ddawlat, king of Irâk and Baghdâd; but, by degrees, rose to be one of the principal commanders of Malek Rabîm, then king of Baghdâd. Being obliged, on account of this quarrel, to quit Baghdâd, he put himself under the protection of Al Mostanser, Khalîfah of Egypt; who supplying him with troops, he became very powerful in Irâk Arabi, and at length got possession of the country, which he ravaged as far as the imperial city; so that he grew a terror both to the Arabs and Persians. He was already prayed for in the pulpits of that province: and as the Khalîfah had been deprived of all authority by the Buyab or Dilem princes, in whose hands he was, so, by this rebellion of Basafiri, nothing remained to Malek, who succeeded Abu Kalanjar, but the naked title of king of Baghdâd ^c.

AUTHORS place these events in the year 447; but they seem to have had a beginning some years earlier (X). However that be, it is certain that the Khalîfah, being informed that Basafiri designed the same year to seize on the imperial castle, wrote to Togrol Bek, who was then in the district of Rey, intreating him to come to his assistance.

BASASIRI was at Waset (Y), whence some his soldiers deserting, came to Baghdâd; and, having plundered, burnt his palace.

Besides, there was a Buyab race of kings in Tabrestân and Forjân, called Dialemah, Deylemiyah, or Deylamites. Olearius says that Dilum is a city of the province of Rasht in Gûilân: 'tis not in his map of Gûilân, inserted p. 388. but we find the mountain Deylum on the east side of the river Isperûth, or Kesiluzan.

a of Kufa, Waset, and Aynothamri, falling off from their allegiance, caused prayers to be made in the name of Mostansir Billah, Khalîfah of Egypt.

IN 449 the Khalîfah Kayîm Beamrillah honoured Togrol Bek with the imperial vest, and crowned him king of Baghdâd. He likewise adorned him with the collar and bracelets, appointed him ruler over his court, and money to be coined in his name ^p.

THUS the Soltânat of Baghdâd, or post of Amîr al omerah of the Khalîfahs, passed from the house of the Buyans to that of the Seljuks^q: and thus his power was thoroughly established: nor was there any person left, in both the Irâks and Khorasân, who gave him the least opposition.

b THE year following Togrol Bek marched to Musol, and from thence to Nasibîn, with a design to subdue those places. There went with him his brother Ibrahim, whom Basasiri, by his emissaries, stirred up to revolt; giving him hopes of obtaining the kingdom, and promising assistance. Ibrahim, upon this, having exacted an oath of fidelity from the soldiers, departs with a great army from Rey, and rebelled^r.

KONDAMIR, or Mirkbond, as reported by D'Herbelot, represents this affair two very different ways. In one place he says that Ibrahim, surnamed Nial, Togrol Bek's brother, seized the city of Hamadân; and while the Soltân was on his march to drive him thence, Basasiri, taking the opportunity, made himself master of Baghdâd^s.

IN another place the same author relates, that Ibrahim, the Soltân's maternal uncle, revolted, and unexpectedly advanced against him from the Arabian Irâk, where he was governor, with an army, as far as Hamadân (C), in Persian Irâk, where Togrol Beg then resided^t.

THE Persian historian also dates this transaction, if it be the same with the former, three years later in this place than in the other (D). Whether this difference be owing to the disagreement among the authors from whom Kondamir copied, or to the negligence of D'Herbelot, in extracting from him; or whether they be two distinct events, differing with respect to persons, time, and action; we must leave the reader to judge, on reading a subsequent note, relating to Ibrahim's death.

BASASIRI entered Baghdâd on the 8th of Dhu'lhajjah, with the name of the Egyptian Khalîfah (E) inscribed on his standards; and on the 13th prayers were put up in the cathedral church in his name. Then ordering a bridge to be laid across the Tigris, he passed over to the eastern side of the city, called Rusâfab (F), where the same ceremony was performed. After this, seizing Ebn Mostem, the Khalîfah's Wazîr or Vizier, he ordered him to be dressed in a woollen gown, with a high red bonnet, and a leathern collar about his neck; and, in this manner, to be led through the streets of Baghdâd, tied upon a camel, with a man lashing him all the way behind: then being sewed up in a fresh bull's hide, with the horns placed over his head, he was hung up on hooks, and beaten till he died.

As for the Khalîfah, he went to the camp, where a tent was set up for him on the east side of the city. Mean time the mob pillaged the imperial palace of things to an immense value. On Friday, the 4th of Dhu'lhajjah, there was neither sermon nor prayers in the temple of the Khalîfah; while, in all other churches, the harangue was made in the name of Mostansir Billah, lord of Egypt. Thus the sovereignty of the Khalîfah was suppressed for that day.

AFTER this, Kayîm Beamrillah was conveyed to Haditha (G); and being put in fetters, was left in custody with the governor of the town.

THE year following, Basasiri sending for the great chancellor Abu Abdalla Ebn Damîyân, Hejrah 451: with the preachers and princes of the family of Hassem, required from them security, and an oath of fidelity to Mostanser Billah, lord of Egypt.

THE same year, 451, Togrol Bek marched against his brother Ibrahim, defeated, and having taken him prisoner, had him strangled with a bow-string (H). He likewise put to death a great number of Turkmâns, who had joined with him.

It was, for a time, the seat of the Khalîfahs. Abûlfeza, in his description of Irâk al Arab.

(H) Kondamir differs from himself, as in the beginning, so in the event of this affair. In one place he says, Togrol made up matters with his brother Ibrahim Nial, and then returned to Baghdâd, from whence Basasiri

HAVING thus re-established his power, he marched to Baghdâd against Basasiri, and sent the Khalifah his compliments, with 5,000 crowns in gold, and 5,000 suits of cloaths for his wife. As he drew near the city, on the 11th of Dbu'lkâdab, Mabras, lord of Haditha, came to meet him, bringing Kayim Beamrilla (I) with him.

pillaged.

As soon as he arrived at Baghdâd, his soldiers fell to pillage it (K), especially that part called Karkba; and having collected a great quantity of tents, chariots, and other moveables, sent them all to the Khalifah, with his Wazir Abdalmâlek Al Kanderi, and Afiad Abubekr. Then a tent being set up, the Khalifah entered it; and, after two days rest, on the 25th of the same month, went into Baghdâd, from whence he had been absent a whole year, accompanied by Togrol Bek, who held the bridle of his mule till he had passed through the stone gate ^u.

The Khalifah
rejoiced.

MIRKHOND relates, that he conducted the Khalifah to the imperial palace on foot, sometimes holding the stirrup, sometimes the bridle, of his mule; and that, to gratify this respect of Togrol Bek, he gave him the title of Rokn oddin, in these words; Erkeb ya Rokn oddin: mount on horseback, you who are the most firm pillar, or support, of the religion. After this, the Soltân told the Khalifah, that if Malek al Rabim had no hand in the late tumult, he might safely come to him. Malek, trusting to Togrol Bek's promise, waited on him; but, being seized and imprisoned, in him ended the dynasty of the Buyabs, which had continued 127 years ^w.

SOME time before this, Basasiri was gone to Wafet; and having gathered a large quantity of corn, sent it on board some barks: but when he heard what had happened at Baghdâd, he advanced to Nomanîya (L). The Soltân sent against him part of his army, under the command of Hemarmakin, and other generals; following himself with the rest of his forces, in the end of Dbu'lkâdab (M). Basasiri being killed in the battle, his head was brought to Togrol Bek, who ordered it to be carried on a pike through the streets of Baghdâd. Then proceeding to Wafet, he sets matters to rights there, and returned to Baghdâd in the year 452; where the Khalifah made him rich presents, and received him with great honour. After this, he went to Jabâl (N), leaving his Wazir, Abdalmâlek al Kanderi as his lieutenant; and having settled that country in peace, returned to Baghdâd the same year ^x.

seized.

THE above-mentioned battle was fought between Wafet and Kufab, according to the Lebtarikh^y: but Mirkhond relates that Basasiri having been pursued by Togrol Bek as far as the last of those two cities, and being accompanied with no great force, some of his soldiers found an opportunity to kill him, and carried his head to the Soltân ^z. They likewise seized all the effects which he, and Nuro'ddâwlat Dobays (O), who accompanied Basasiri in his retreat, were carrying off: but Dobays made his escape; and submitting to Togrol Bek next year, was honourably received by him ^a.

account.

HAVING related matters thus far from the historians of the east, it is time to look westward, and see what is to be met with farther, concerning the Seljûkian Turks, in Greek authors; whose want of that exactness found in the orientals, in marking the dates of actions, makes it difficult to range them in chronological order, or deliver them from the confusion in which they seem placed. We are told by Cedrenus, and Nicephorus Bryennius, that after Tagrolipix found himself secure in the throne of Persia, he began to make war on the neighbouring princes; and marching against Pissafrius before-mentioned, after defeating him in several battles, slew him, and brought the country of the Babylonians (P) in subjection.

Basasiri was fled (1). In the other place he tells us, that he was assisted so seasonably by his nephew Alp Arslân, with the forces of Khorasân, that his uncle Ibrahim was easily vanquished; and being taken, was put to death (2). The historian adds, that after this signal victory (as he calls it), Togrol Bek sent Alp Arslân back to Khorasân, and made himself a second journey to Baghdâd; at what time he delivered the Khalifah from the persecution of Basasiri, and replaced him on the throne a second time (3). This shews that the history, in both places before-mentioned, relates to the same person and transaction, tho' differently told, and differently dated.

(I) According to Mirkhond, as soon as Togrol Bek entered Baghdâd, he went to the prison, and set the Khalifah at liberty. But this seems to be a mistake; for he was then at Haditha, in custody.

a HE then sent his nephew Kutlu Moses (Q) against Karmeses (R), king of the Arabians: Kutlu Moses but being overthrown, he took shelter in Media (S), and stopped at Baus, or Baasprakan. From ^{defeated.} thence he sent to Stephen, the Roman governor, to desire a passage (T); and being denied, routed his troops, and took him prisoner. Then marching to Brisium, on the borders of Perfisa, sold him there for a slave. When he returned to Tagrolipix, after excusing his ill success against the Arabs, he advised him to invade Media, which he said was inhabited by women (U): but that prince, highly offended at his defeat, would not hearken to him; but raising new-forces, went against the Arabs in person, and was likewise put to the worst.

At his return he marched against Kutlu Moses, who, fearing the Soltân's displeasure, had fled ^{flies from} with his followers; and taking refuge in Pasar, a city of the Khorasimians (W), revolted from Tagrolipix; b him; while he, with part of his army, besieged Pasar, which, being strong, held out long. He sent another part, consisting of 20,000 men, under the command of Affan (X), surnamed the deaf, his brother's son, to subdue Media; where he committed dreadful ravages; but being, in the end, drawn into an ambush by the Roman generals, he was cut off, with his whole army.

Tagrolipix, no way discouraged at this misfortune, sent a new army into Media, near ^{who burns} 100,000 strong; commanded by Abraham Alim (Y), his half-brother; who laid waste the Artze. c country without opposition, the Romans shutting themselves up in their strong holds; and then laid siege to Artze (Z), a place, on account of its great trade, esteemed the most wealthy in those parts; but not being able to master it, they reduced it to ashes. Of the inhabitants, 150,000 and upwards are said to have perished, either by the sword, or in the flames.

Abraham, after this, hearing that the Romans, under the command of Liparites, gover- ^{Roman gene-} nor of Iberia, had taken the field, he marched against them. The two armies engaging with ^{ral taken.} great fury, the victory continued long doubtful, but at length inclined to the Romans; although their general was taken prisoner, which hindered them to pursue the flying enemy.

Hereupon the emperor dispatched ambassadors, with rich presents, and a large sum, to redeem Liparites, and conclude an alliance with Tagrolipix, who generously returned them; with the money, to Liparites, and set him at liberty without ransom; only requiring him, at his departure, no more to bear arms against the Turks.

Not long after, the Soltân sent a Sbarîf (A), a person of great authority, with the character ^{The empire} of ambassador to Constantinople; who, having arrogantly exhorted the emperor to submit to ^{invaded.} his master, and acknowledge himself his tributary, was, by Monomachus, dismissed with scorn, and driven out of the city.

Tagrolipix, offended at the reception of his ambassador, while the emperor was engaged in a war with the Patzinacæ (B), a Scythian nation, entered Iberia; and having laid the country waste, as far as Koyma, returned from thence into Media, and laid siege to Mantzikbiert (C), a place defended by a numerous garison, and fortified with a triple wall, and deep ditches. However, as it was situated in a plain open country, he hoped to be master of it in a short time: but, after he had continued before it thirty days was obliged to retire, pretending some urgent affairs had called him home.

e Not long after, discord arising between the Soltân and Abraham Alim, or Halim, whom he ^{Abraham} sought to destroy, Abraham fled to his nephew Kutlu Moses, and joined in the rebellion. The ^{Alim slain.} Soltân, meeting them not far from Pasar (E), defeated them in battle; and Abraham being taken, was put to death. Kutlu Moses, with his cousin Malek, son of Abraham, followed by 6000 men, fled to the borders of the Roman empire; from whence he sent for protection to the emperor Monomachus, a little before his death, which happened in 1054 (F). (S) It should rather be Armenia, to which Baasprakan or Vaspûrakan belongs. The province lies betwixt the lake of Wân and the river Arrâs. Other circumstances shew, it ought to be Armenia, or Perfarmeria, which might have been joined to Media, or Adherbijân, which the Turks conquered in 1050, as before related.

(T) These Turks are said to have been first known to the Greeks in the time of the emperor Constantine Monomachus, who began his reign in 1042; but the year when this affair happened does not distinctly appear.

The Turks prepared to invade the empire on his death, but were prevented by the care of Theodora his successor. But being encouraged by the remissness of Constantine Ducas, who ascended the throne in 1059 (I), they extended their conquests on all sides ^b.

Togrol's marriage.

Thus far the Byzantine historians. Let us now return to the oriental authors. According to them, in 453, Jaffar Beg, Togrol's brother, died in Khorasân, and left for his successor his son Alp Arslân (K), who was afterwards heir also to his uncle, who died without children ^c.

THE same year Togrol Bek demanded the daughter of Kaym Beamrillab in marriage: but the Khalîfah giving him a denial, it occasioned many messages and threatenings, on the part of the Soltân; who next year, 1062, forbade the Khalîfah's officers to meddle with the public money (L). Hereupon they advised him to let the Soltân have the princess; which he at length consented to, though sore against his will (M). On this compliance, Togrol Bek, being greatly rejoiced, revoked the order he had given for seizing the Khalîfah's treasures, and sent him very rich presents.

Hej. 455.
A. D. 1063.

IN 455 the Khalîfah's daughter was conducted to the Soltân, who received her with great demonstrations of joy, and bestowed his gifts on all those who accompanied her: but six months after, in the same year, Togrol Bek died at Ray, or Rey, the capital of Irâk (N) ^d.

Occasion of it.

THE author of the Nigbiaristân is somewhat more particular than Ebn Amid, with regard to the marriage of the Khalîfah's daughter, whom he calls Seîdab (O). He tells us, that when Amîd al Molk Konderi, Togrol's Wazîr or Vizier, had, by his address, obtained the princess for his master, he conducted her to Tauris, where the Soltân then was: that it was in this city where the marriage was concluded, and the contract signed: but that the nuptials and consummation of the marriage were to be performed at Rey, then the capital of Persian Irâk, and royal seat of Togrol: that this prince repaired thither, to prepare things with proper magnificence: but that the season being excessive hot, he left the city, to take the air of Rudbâr, a most delicious place, where he had a very beautiful palace; and that here, in a few days, he was carried off, by a bloody flux ^e: so that, as Khondamîr observes, when his wife arrived at Rey, she found him dead; and so returned as she came ^f.

AUTHORS generally agree, that this great prince died at Rey, in the year of the Hejrah 455 (P), and at the age of seventy: but the Lebtarîkh makes his reign twenty-six years ^g, which is one more than Ebn Amid gives to it ^h.

TOGROL BEK was a good-natured, wise, and politic prince; exceedingly feared and courted by the provincial lords, who often wrote to him ⁱ. According to the Lebtarîkh, he was the best of princes: he said the prayers, with his whole family, five times a day; and fasted every week on the fifth and second days. Whenever he was disposed to erect a palace, he first built a temple ^k. As he had no children, he was succeeded by his nephew Alp Arslân.

is the latter Greek chronology. But if Kutlu Muses sent to this emperor after the death of Ibrahim, either Monomachus must have been alive in 1059, or the oriental authors date that event too early. 'Tis probable the Greeks have confounded things of different times together, in this instance, as they seem to have done in many others.

(G) Perhaps the same now called Kars, between the cities Arzerûm and Erriwân.

(H) This circumstance shews that he was then master of Adherbijân, or Media, which having been subdued in the year of the Hejrah 446, or of Christ 1054, as before related, doubtless the invasion of the Roman Media, or rather Persarmenia, and the siege of Mantzikyert, was about that time.

(I) Others say 1057.

(L) His Wazîr counselled him, by degrees, to retrench the Khalîfah's revenues; which obliged him to consent, according to the Nigbiaristân, ap. D'Herb. p. 1028.

(M) According to Kondamîr, in D'Herbelot, Kaym was so highly obliged to Togrol Bek, for re-establishing him the second time, that he judged he could not do less than give him his daughter in return, though an honour too great for a Turk to expect (1).

The reign of Alp Arslân.

^a THIS prince was the son of Dawd, or Jaffar Beg (A), son of Michael, son of Seljuk; Second Soltân, and, by succeeding his uncle Togrol Bek, thus united in his person the two kingdoms of Khorasân (B) and Irâk, with their dependencies: so that, in the year of the Hejrab 455, ^{Alp Arslân. Hej. 455. A. D. 1062.} when he began his reign, he was sole monarch of all the countries lying between the rivers Jibân (C) or Amî, and the Dijlat or Tigris; that is, of all Irân, or Persia in its greatest extent; in the conquest of which he had a considerable share.

Togrol Bek left him in full power at Baghdâd, where the Khalifah Kayim lived in dependence on the Seljukians, till the second year of Malek Shâh, when he died ^a.

^b THE name which this Soltân took, after he had embraced Mohammedism, was Mohammed, ^{His names,} or Abu Shejab Mohammed; for he was before called Israel; and that of Alp Arslân (D), which signifies in Turkish, the courageous lion, is a surname. The Khalifah Kayim Beamrillah, on account of his own power and merit, as well as that of his predecessor, gave him the title of Azzaddîn, or Addadoddîn (E), which signifies, the protector of the religion.

At the beginning of his reign he put to death Kandari, surnamed Amîd al Molk (G), who ^{and Wazîrs.} was the greatest man of his time, and administered the affairs of the kingdom, in the reign of this prince and his successor, with the greatest integrity and approbation ^b.

ACCORDING to the Vassaiya (H), at the beginning of his reign, Alp Arslân made war upon Kotolmîsh ^{Kotolmîsh re-} Kotolmîsh, son of Israel, his cousin-german, who rebelled against him in the province of Dame- ^{bels.} gân (I). But this revolt was soon quashed, by an unexpected accident: for Kotolmîsh advancing at the head of his troops, which were very fine ones, to give the Soltân battle, his horse of ^{Killed by a} a sudden fell under him, and, throwing his rider, broke his neck; upon which his army sub- ^{fall.} mitted, and were pardoned ^c.

^d THIS was the end of Kotolmîsh, or Kotolmîsh, according to the oriental writers; but the Greek historians represent the issue of his rebellion quite otherwise: they tell us, that this prince, whom they call Kutlu Moses, or Muses, having rebelled in the time of Tangrolipix, was defeated by him, and fled into Arabia ^d, where he remained till Axan (or Alp Arslân), came to the crown: that then, returning from thence, at the head of considerable forces, and advancing to Re (K), he laid claim to the sovereignty: but that while the two armies were on the point of engaging, the Khalif of Babylon of a sudden appeared, and, interposing his authority, which he still retained in spirituals, brought them to this agreement, that the Soltân should hold Persia, and that Kutlu Moses, and his children, who were five in number, should possess all the countries which they should take from the Roman empire; and that he should assist them with ^{Greek ac-} troops for that purpose: that after this, the father and his five sons entered the Roman empire ^{count false.} with their forces; and that Kutlu Moses actually commanded a body of Turks, which came to the assistance of Botoniates, when he usurped the empire ^e: whereas, according to the oriental historians, who could hardly be mistaken in a transaction that concerned one of their own princes, and happened among themselves, Kotolmîsh must have been dead eight or ten years before.

Hence it is often found in the names of eminent Turks or Turkmans, as Alp Tekin, Kay Alp. The Greeks call this prince Aspa'alem, and Aspasmallarius; but generally Axan; possibly corrupting the Turkish word Ak Hân, or Ak Klân, which signifies the white king; a name given possibly for a reason mentioned in a future note. Dr. Hyde observes, that Alp Arslân answers to the Persian Arîstâr. *Relig. vet. (K) By Re is here probably to be understood the city Rey or Ray, then capital of Persian Irak; and not Ere, or Eres, in the province of Shîrwân, as Leunclavius supposes.

THIS shews with what caution the Greek writers ought to be read, who were ignorant both of the name and person of the prince, who had pushed his conquests within a few days march of Constantinople itself; and had, even by their own account, been for some time personally present in their emperor's army. But to return to the eastern historians.

Arslân,

THE war with Koto'mîsh was no sooner finished, than Kara Arslân raised new disturbances in Pârs and Kermân. The Soltân, to suppress this rebel, employed Fadhlovieh, one of his most valiant commanders, who defeated him, and was rewarded for his service with the government of Pârs.

and of Fadhllovieh.

BUT this ambitious governor, as soon as he saw the Soltân on his march to Khorasân, resolved to make himself absolute master of his province. In order to effect this, he fortified a castle, situated in a very advantageous place, where he shut himself up, accompanied with very good troops, and a vast deal of money, which he had amassed by a thousand extortions in his government. Nezâm al Molk received orders from his prince to attack this castle, and bring him the traitor alive or dead. All who had a knowledge of the place advised against a siege, because they deemed it impregnable; but the Wazîr, resolving to gratify his master, invested the castle with his forces, and went himself round it to take a view.

DURING this tour, he did not observe so much as one man of the besieged upon the ramparts; which indicating the greatest confidence of their security, he was so chagrined, that, but for shame, he would instantly have raised the siege. However, he resolved to do his utmost; and had already gotten together provisions and stores for a whole year's blockade: when one morning, at break of day, he was surprized to hear them beat the chamade, and that the governor desired to capitulate.

THE joy which this news gave him, made him grant them honourable conditions; the chief of which were, that the governor should remain in the place, doing homage to the Soltân, and paying him a certain tribute annually, besides the usual presents. When matters were settled, the Wazîr, who was in pain to know what could have obliged Fadhlovieh to make such a sudden surrender, was informed by one of the besieged, that it was owing to the springs and cisterns, which were very numerous in the place, drying up all at once. This the Mohammedan author attributes as a miracle, wrought by Providence, in regard to the justice of the Soltân's cause, and his Wazîr's piety.

Nûbandijân.

AN attempt having been made to dispossess the Soltân of the province of Kermân, he marched thither with his army; and, being obliged to pass through the great desart of Nûbandijân, which separates that province from Khorasân, and is destitute of all things necessary to support an army, his troops, who had entered it with great reluctance, perceiving their provisions to fail daily, began to murmur; and were on the point of revolting, when they came to an old ruined castle, which seemed to be the retreat of owls and wild beasts: but, in viewing it, they found corn enough to supply the whole army. Yet this plenty of victuals being of no use without drink, God, to complete the miracle (as our author will have it), sent so heavy a rain, that every body had water enough to serve his occasions.

A D. 1064.

IN 457 the Soltân marched against Khazan, who had revolted in the country of Khovarazm (or Karazm); and having routed his army, consisting of 30,000 men, very few of whom escaped the slaughter, he gave the government of that province to Malek Shâh, his eldest son. In his return from this expedition through Khorasân, he paid a visit to the sepulchre of Ali Rîza (L), the eighth Imâm, who was buried at Tbûs (thence called Mashhad), where there is continually a great resort of people, who go thither out of devotion.

the states.

AFTER he had performed this pilgrimage, he took the road of Radekân, where he encamped with his army in a most agreeable place. From hence he dispatched couriers through all the provinces of his empire, to summon the governors and great lords to a general assembly of the estates. Being all met together, he declared his son Malek Shâh for his successor, and only heir to his dominions. This done, he ordered his son to sit on a throne of gold, prepared for that purpose, and made all the officers of the empire take an oath of fidelity to him (M).

IMMEDIATELY after this, he acquainted all the chiefs and generals of his armies, that he designed to attempt the conquest of Turkestan, the country whence he drew his original; and where, as he pretended, his ancestors formerly reigned (N). But this expedition was not undertaken till several years after.

a LET us now turn ourselves westward, and see what the Turks were doing on that side.

UPON the death of Constantine Ducas, which happened in the year 1065, the Turks under-^{The Turks} standing that the Roman empire was governed by a woman, broke with great violence into Meso-^{inwards} potamia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, destroying all with fire and sword. The empress was no way in a condition to oppose them, the greater part of the army having been disbanded in her husband's life-time; and the troops which were still on foot being undisciplined, and altogether unfit for service. Eudocia, therefore, to secure at once the empire from foreign, and herself ^{the Roman} from domestic enemies, married Romanus Diogenes, who was thereupon proclaimed emperor. ^{empire.}

b As he was a man of great activity, and experience in war, he no sooner saw himself vested with the sovereign power, than taking upon him the command of the army, he passed over into Asia, where, on his arrival, he was informed that the Turks, having surprized and plundered the city of Neocæsarea, were retiring with a rich booty. The emperor followed them at the head of a chosen body of light-armed troops, came up with them the third day, killed a great number of them, and recovered the spoil. He then pursued his march to Haleb (O), which he retook, together with Hierapolis, where he built a strong castle ^a.

THE oriental historians place this Syrian expedition in the year of the Hejrah 462, which Romanus de-^{answers to that of} Christ 1069. They relate, that he besieged the last city, which they call ^{feats them.} Manbej (P), for sixteen days, but do not say that he took it; only that afterwards the Moslems, or believers (so the Mohammedans call themselves) advancing with an army, he defeated them: but provisions failing in his camp, by which means great numbers of his soldiers perished, he

c returned to Constantinople.

IN his way back he defeated a numerous body of Turks, who attempted to cut off his retreat; after which the Turks abandoned several cities on his approach.

IN 463 Alp Arslân marched to Akblât (Q), with 40,000 horse, to meet the Romans, who ^{are themselves} had a vast army; but they were defeated, and their general, who was a nobleman, being taken, ^{defeated.} the Soltân ordered his nose to be cut off ^{Hej. 462.}.

A. D. 1070.

THIS, by the circumstances of the history, must have been Philaretus, who had been left to guard the banks of the Euphrates (R). The Byzantine historians farther relate, that the Turks; after this victory, advanced into Cilicia, and surprized Ikoniun, the principal city of that province: but that hearing of the emperor's approach, they, after plundering it, retired in haste:

d However, the Armenians falling upon them in the plains of Tarsus, put them to flight, and stripped them of every thing.

IN the spring following, the emperor marched anew into Asia, at the head of a considerable ^{The emperor} army, which he had raised and disciplined during the winter. But, contrary to the advice of Diogenes

Nicephorus Bryennius, who, commanding the left wing of his army, with others, would have him wait for the Turks in Cappadocia, he marched to Mazekerta (S); and, dividing his army into two parts, sent one of them to Kleat (T), a small town belonging to the Turks: between whom and the Romans several skirmishes happened, in one of which, Basilacius, one of the emperor's chief officers, was killed; a just reward for his wrong advice and false intelligence. At length Romanus, resolving to come to a general engagement, marched forward

e with his army, in three bodies, of which he commanded the centre ^k. But as an account has been already given of this battle from the Greek historians ^l, we shall here confine ourselves to what the oriental authors have related on that occasion.

EBN AMID informs us in general, that the Soltân having met the Roman emperor on the 26th of the month Dhûlkâdâ, 463, in a place called Zabra; gave him battle on a Friday, and ^{attacks the} Turks. ^{Turks.} defeated his forces; of which an incredible number were killed, and the emperor himself taken ^m. But the best account we have as yet from the oriental authors, of this remarkable battle, is that given by Abû'lfaraj. In the year above-mentioned (says this author), Romanus (U) Diogenes, the Roman emperor, marched with an army of 100,000 men to Malâzkerd (X), in the territory of Kbalât. The Soltân, who was then at Kbûnâj, in the province of Adberbijân, hearing of this, made haste to meet him, though able to draw together no more than 15,000 horse (Y). When the armies were in fight, he sent to the emperor to desire peace; but his answer was, that he would make none with him, unless he surrendered up the city Ray (Z), or Rey. The Soltân, provoked at this, on Friday afternoon put up prayers to God, with tears in his eyes, before his army, who wept themselves to see their monarch weep.

bravery.

BEFORE he engaged, he gave those leave to return who had a mind. Then casting away his bow and arrows, he took his sword, and an iron sceptre, grasping his horse's tail in his hand, as all his soldiers did after him. He dressed himself in white (A); and strewing on perfumes, If I am slain (B), said he, this will serve me for a winding sheet.

The emperor
taken.

AFTER a bloody battle, the Greeks were put to flight, and a multitude of them killed: their emperor was taken prisoner, by a slave named Shâdi (C); and being discovered by the ambassador, Shâdi, lighting off his horse, paid him reverence, and then brought him to Alp Arslân. The Soltân, patting him three times with his hand, said, Did not I send to you with proposals of peace, and you would not hearken to me? The emperor replied, Do not reproach me, and do what you think fit: then asked the Soltân, What would you have done to me, if I had fallen into your hands? I should have inflicted some infamous kind of punishment on you, answered the emperor. And what, said the Soltân, do you think I shall do to you? Either put me to death, replied Romanus, carry me through your dominions for a spectacle to every body, or else (what is beyond my hopes) spare me, on payment of a ransom, and appoint me your deputy. Yet this last is the way, said the Soltân, that I intend to deal by you. Accordingly he set him at liberty, on condition of paying a million of crowns in gold (D), and dismissing all the Mohammedan prisoners in his empire.

generosity.

WHEN matters were thus concluded, the Soltân made the emperor sit in the throne with him: then had a tent set up for him, sending him 10,000 pieces of gold, for his subsistence. He likewise set free many Roman lords, presenting them, as well as the emperor, with vests, by way of honour. At parting, he sent an army to escort him to a place of safety, and accompanied him on his way the space of a league.

Emperor's
hard fate.

WHEN Romanus arrived at the castle of Dawkiya (E), and was told that Michael had ascended the throne, he put on a religious habit, and dispatched a courier to let the new emperor know what kind of peace he had made with the Soltân. Then collecting 200,000 crowns in gold, he sent them to the Soltân (F), solemnly protesting that it was not in his power to do more. Ebn Amîd adds, that, in his way back to Constantinople, the king of Armenia ordered him to be seized, and, having put out his eyes (G), sent advice thereof to the Soltânⁿ. But this is contrary to the account of the Greeks, which has been already given in another place^o.

Georgia.

AFTER this great victory, Alp Arslân, according to the Lebtarîkh, marched into Gurjestân, or Georgia; which having conquered, he deprived the great lords of their liberty, and obliged them to wear iron rings in their ears, as a mark of their slavery (H): to avoid which ignominy, many of them turned Mohammedans. However, the country was not so thoroughly subdued, but that there remained a great number of strong holds in the mountains, which

ⁿ ABU'LF. p. 227, & seq.

^o Univ. hist. vol. vi. p. 605, & seq.

(Y) According to Kondamîr, he had no more than 12,000, and the Greeks 300,000. But we prefer the account of Ebn Amîd, which gives room to believe, that he had near 40,000: because, from the relation given of the battle by Nicephorus Briennius, who commanded the left wing of the Roman army, the Turks seem to have been as numerous as the Romans, who, before the battle, were divided into two parts; and one of them sent to besiege Klat or Kalât. See Niceph. Bryen. hist. of Const. Ducas, & Romanus Diogenes, cap. 5 & 6.

(Z) In Persian Irâk, and then the capital of his dominions.

(A) Perhaps from hence called Ak Hân, or the white prince, according to the Greek historians, who write Axan.

(B) Yet Bryennius speaks as if the Soltân did not expose himself to danger in the battle; but, leaving the whole conduct of it to Tarang, an eunuch, one of his generals, gave his orders at a distance.

(C) According to Mirkhond and Kondamîr, the emperor was taken by Javaber, one of the Soltân's generals, who was sent to pursue the Romans. On this occasion historians relate, that the Soltân, reviewing his troops before the battle, had a mind to dismiss one of his soldiers, because he seemed to be very ill made: but an officer prevented it, by telling his majesty he was very brave; and that possibly that very man, whom he despised so much, might take the Greek emperor prisoner. As the officer foretold, so it happened; and the horseman, instead of being cashiered, was advanced to the highest posts in the army.

(D) Ebn Amîd says, 1,500,000, besides an annual tribute of 360,000, which the Lebtarîkh swells to ten millions. Kondamîr relates, that the emperor was obliged, by the treaty, to give his daughter in marriage to the Soltân's son; and that the condition was punctually performed.

(E) Niceph. Briennius calls it Dokia. It was in Armenia minor, probably towards the borders of Cilicia.

(F) Also a precious stone, worth 90,000 gold crowns, according to Ebn Amîd. This is possibly no other than the rich pearl called the Orphan, which was found in the emperor's tent after he was taken.

(G) The way of putting out the eyes, or blinding, with the Greeks and Asiatics, was not by pulling or cutting out the eyes, as some have imagined, but by drawing or holding a red-hot iron before them. This method is still in use in Asia.

(H) According to the Lebtarîkh, instead of the iron ring which was the mark of slavery before, he ordered them to wear a horse-shoe in their ears.

- a required much time to reduce; and as the Soltân was called away by other affairs, he left his son Malek Shâh to continue the war.

THE most famous siege undertaken by this prince, who, to finish the conquest which his father Famâs siege began, had the fortresses of mount Caucasus to subdue, was that of a place called, in the Persian, Mirîm Nishim, that is, the place, or dwelling, of Mary; on account of a monastery and church dedicated to the Virgin Mary, situated in the middle of a lake. Malek Shâh chose for the attack the best of his troops, whom he put into boats, with ladders and grappling irons for Dreadful scaling the walls: but just when they were going to make the assault, there arose so furious a storm and earthquake storm on the lake, and the sky was darkened to such a degree, that nothing could be done.

- b This storm was followed by so violent an earthquake, that both the besiegers and the besieged, the Turks and the Christians, expected to be swallowed up together. However, the latter suffered most by it; for part of their walls falling into the lake, when the elements were settled again, the Turks, without any difficulty, forced the place, and ruined the monastery, which was resorted to most of any in Georgia, on account of devotion ^p.

- THE affairs which called the Soltân away from Georgia, as is before remarked, were his pre- The Soltân's parations for the conquest of Turkestan: he set out, at length, with that view, in the year 465 forces (I), at the head of 200,000 men, towards Mawarâ'nabr. When he came to the Jihân, or Amî, Hej. 465. he laid a bridge over that river, for the passage of his army; which being so numerous, A. D. 1072. took up twenty days. Here staying to take in certain castles, he first attacked that of Berzem, attacks or Barzam (K), in which Yusef Kotbual, an intrepid Karazmian, commanded (L). This gover- Berzem castle. nor defended the place vigorously for several days; but being at last taken by force, the Soltân ordered him to be brought into his presence, and gave him very injurious language for daring to hold out so long against such an army as his. Yusef, who rather expected that the Soltân would have praised his valour, being provoked at such outrageous treatment, answered with a great deal of warmth, and at last lost all respect. Whereupon Alp Arslân ordered his hands and feet to be bound to four posts, that he might be put to a cruel death.

- YUSEF, upon hearing his sentence pronounced, took out a knife, which he had in one of his Is slain, boots; and threatening the Soltân, said, O wicked man, is this the treatment which a person of my merit deserves? and advancing at the same time to strike at the king, the guards would have d fallen upon him: but that prince, who had not his equal either for strength, or shooting with the bow, hindered them from stopping him; and let fly an arrow (M) at Yusef, which missed him. Yusef, hereupon, full of fury, ran at the Soltân with all his force, and mortally wounded him by the gover- (N); after which he defended himself a long time against that prince's guards, wounding several nor. of them, till one of the pages (O) of the Soltân's chamber felled him with a club^a. Another author relates, that, as Yusef sprang forward, the Soltân rose, in order to descend from the throne; but that, his foot slipping, he fell on his face: that then Yusef, leaping upon him, kept him down with his knee, and stabbed him in the flank: that the Soltân rising, went into another tent; and one of the pages knocked the murderer on the head^r.

- ALP ARSLAN lived for some hours after this misfortune: when, finding himself near his end, His reflections thereupon. he said to those about him, I now call to mind two pieces of advice which formerly were given to me by a wise old man, my master: the first was, Never to despise any person: the second, Never to have too great an opinion of one's self: nevertheless I have offended against these two important rules these two last days of my life: for yesterday, beholding from an eminence the great number of my troops, I imagined that there was not any power on earth able to resist me; nor any man who dared to attack me (P): and to-day, forbidding my guards to stop that man who was making at me with the knife in his hand, I believed I had both strength and skill enough to defend myself. But I now perceive that no force nor address can withstand destiny^s.

- THIS prince reigned nine years (Q) six months and twelve days, and lived forty-four years His age: and three months; for he was born in 421, and died in 465 (R). He was buried at Marâ f (S), one of the four cities of Khorasân, with this epitaph: All you who have beheld the grandeur

3d Soltân,
Malek Shâh.

MALEK Shâh succeeded his father Alp Arslân, according to his appointment before related, although he was not his eldest son. He was induced to declare him his successor by the counsel of his Wazîr Nezâm al Molk. The name and surnames of this Soltân at length are Moez-addîn Abu'lfetah Malek Shâh. Instead of Moez-addîn, some put Jalâl-oddîn, or Jalâl-oddawlat^a; others, Jalâlo'ddîn^b.

Names and titles.

ALP ARSLAN was no sooner dead, than he was acknowledged lawful heir and successor of his father, at the head of the armies which he had commanded (A). The Khalîfah also sent him his confirmation of the title and power of Soltân; adding thereto even the quality of Amîr al Momenîn, that is, commander of the faithful, which, till then, the Khalîfahs had reserved to themselves, without conferring it on any Mohammedan prince whatever.

He was likewise proclaimed throughout his dominions by the name of Jalâl-oddawlat waoddîn, that is, the glory of the state and religion. It was on the account of this title Jalâl, that the reformation of the Persian calendar, which was made in his reign, was called Tarikh Falâli, that is, the Jalâlean kalendar^c, of which an account will be given hereafter.

As soon as Marubil, son of Dawd, or Jaffar Bek, heard of Alp Arslan's death, he set out from Ray, in order to obtain the crown: but Malek Shâh meeting him on the fourth day of Shabân (B), near Hamadân, his forces were defeated, and himself taken prisoner^d. Kaderd, a son of Jaffar Bek also, another of his uncles, raised still a more dangerous rebellion against him. He was governor of the province of Kermân (C), and advanced with a considerable force even as far as Kurj, or Gurj. The Soltân sent the troops of Khorasân, which had always been victorious in his father's reign, to oppose him. The two armies, after harrassing each other for three days and nights, came to a general engagement; which proved one of the most bloody that ever happened in Persia. At length the victory fell to Malek Shâh; and Kaderd, being taken prisoner, was sent under a strong guard to a castle in Khorasân. On this signal success, which established the new Soltân's authority, the troops grew so insolent, that their principal commanders insisted on having their pay doubled, threatening otherwise to set Kaderd on the throne.

taken prisoner.

He is poisoned. MALEK SHAH, perceiving that the name of a competitor was sufficient to give occasion to his troops to revolt, had Kaderd poisoned the same night, in prison. Next morning, when the officers of the army came to know the Soltân's answer, the Wazîr, who probably had a hand in what was done, told them; that he had not been able as yet to present their petition to the Soltân, because he found him overwhelmed with grief the night before, on the unexpected death of his uncle, who, driven to despair, had taken poison, which he carried in one of his rings. This answer stopped the mouths of the officers and the whole army all at once: for they talked no more of the augmentation of pay, when they found the person was dead who only could have favoured their mutiny^e.

(B) The eighth month. So that this action seems to have happened the same year.

(C) He was properly Soltân of Kermân; being the founder of the Seijûk dynasty reigning in that country: by some called Kaderd.

a IN 468, Aksîs, the Karazmian (D), one of Malek Shâh's generals, marched to Damaskus; Aksîs subdued and, besieging it, constrained the inhabitants, by famine, to capitulate. He likewise reduced most ^{Syria.} part of Syria (E), and caused the oration to be made, in the name of Al Mostâdi, Khalîfah of ^{Hej. 468.} Bagdad (F): although that dignity had been enjoyed by the Khalîfahs of *Egypt*¹. Next year he marched into Egypt; which so frightened Al Mejianfir Billa, the Khalîfah, that he resolved to fly. A. D. 1075. But the citizens of Al Kabera (or Kayro) and Sawâda advancing against him, defeated his troops, though much superior in number. In his way back to Damaskus, he put great numbers to the sword at Ramla (G) and Jerusalem.

MALEK SHAH suspecting that Aksîs had been slain in his Egyptian expedition, wrote to his ^{Tatash sent} brother Taj oddawlat Tatash (H), in 470, to go and conquer Syria. When Taj arrived at ^{thither.} Diyârbêr, he found Aksîs, lord of Damaskus, was alive: who, hearing that the other was advance- ^{A. D. 1077.} ing against him, offered to pay an annual tribute. Malek Shâh, accepting thereof, wrote to his brother to retire to Manjeb (I). He did so, and went from thence to Halep, then possessed by Sabak Al Amin Ebn Mahmûd Ebn Nasr Ebn Mardas: but, not being able to take the place, returned by Harrân (K) to Diyârbêr; which put Moslem Ebn Korais, lord of Nasibîn and Senjâr, upon his guard².

IN 471, Malek Shâh undertook the conquest of the country beyond the river Jibîn or Amû; ^{Mawarâ'î} whose Khân, called Soleymân, he took prisoner, after defeating his army; and sent him guarded ^{nahr con-} to Ispahân, then the capital of his dominions. In this war, Nezam al Molk (L) gave the water- ^{quered.} men, who had ferried the Soltân's forces over the Jibîn, for their trouble, an assignment, instead ^{Hej. 471.} of money, on the revenues of the city of Antiokk. The men having made their complaint to ^{A. D. 1073.} Malek Shâh, he asked the Wazîr, why he had appointed a fund at such a distance for paying off those poor people? "It is not," replied that minister, to delay the payment, but to make posterity admire at the largeness and extent of the dominions which you possess, when they shall hear of money received at Antiokk for payment of sailors belonging to the Caspian sea, and of watermen who plied on the Jibîn." This fancy pleased Malek Shâh exceedingly; especially, when he saw that the Wazîr paid off the notes immediately.

THAT same year the Soltân married Turkân or Tarkân Khatûn, daughter of Tamgaj Khân ^{Malek Shâh's} (M), son of Bagra Khân; who, in 479, brought him a son, called Sanjâr (N), from a little city ^{marriages.} of that name in Khorasân, where he was born³.

ON the return of Ibrahim Ebn Massûd (ninth Soltân of the Gaznah race) from India, where ^d he had made considerable conquests, Malek Shâh made great preparations to invade him (O): but was prevailed on by his ambassadors to desist, and make an alliance, by marrying his daughter to Massûd, Ibrahim's son; who succeeded him in (P) in 481⁴.

IN 472, the army of Mesr, or Egypt, coming to besiege Damaskus, Afsîs sent for help to Taj ^{Afsîs slain.} oddawlat; on whose approach the Egyptians retired. Hereupon Afsîs, coming to visit him, was ^{Hej. 472.} seized, and slain, by his order. Then, taking the city, he became master of all his riches and ^{A. D. 1079.} effects. After this, the inhabitants, who had fled into Persia, to avoid the tyranny of Afsîs, returned, to enjoy the protection of the Seljukians (Q).

(D) Ebn Amid calls him Isâr, surnamed Afsîs.

(E) According to Kondamîr, Malek Shâh sent his cousin Soleymân; son of Kotolmîsh, the year before, with an army to subdue all Syria; which he did, in a short time, as far as Antioch, then a considerable city (1). But this is rendered improbable, not only by this expedition of Aksîs, or Aksîs, but also by the history afterwards, which puts that country in other hands. Besides, we are told by the same author, that Malek Shâh gave Asia minor to Soleymân; and find, from other quarters, that the latter did not enter Syria till the year 477 of the Hejrah.

(F) He succeeded Al Kayîm Bemrillah, who died the year before; after a reign of forty-four years and a half.

(G) The antient Ruma in Kanaan.

(H) In the copies of Erpenius and Vatier it is Nîsus, instead of Tatash; occasioned, doubtless, by the wrong pointing of the letters; a thing very common with the Arab scribes. The three letters, of which the name consists, are pointed three different ways in Abû'lfaraj (2). But, as the Greek writers call this prince Tutus, we make no doubt but Tatash, Tetesh, or Totosh for it may be read those three ways), is the true word.

(M) Ebn Amid, p. 356. calls him Terakk, king of the Turks, a descendant of Afrasiab.

(N) It ought to be Mahmûd; whom she wanted to be her husband's successor. For Sanjâr was by another venter, as will appear hereafter.

(O) As neither of our authors mention the date of this transaction, we choose to refer it to this time, when we find Malek Shâh marching northward.

(P) D'Herbelot, p. 480. puts his death in 492, or 1098: but as he makes him reign forty-two years, those joined to 445, when Abdal Rashîd was slain, amount to but 487 of the Hejrah, or of Christ 1094.

(Q) Mostâfa Haji Khalifah makes a fourth dynasty of Seljukians, which began this year in Hâlep, and other places of Syria, founded by Tatash above mentioned. It lasted about forty years, ending in the year 511, on the death of Soltân Mohammed. D'Herbel. p. 801, art. Seljukian.

THE same year, Sharf oddawlat Ebn Moslem Ebn Korais, lord of Musol, having obtained a leave of Malek Shâb to subdue Halep, on condition of paying him 300,000 gold crowns annually, marched against that city; and, after besieging it for some time, it was, with the castle, delivered up to him; paying to Sabak al Amîn, 20,000 crowns every year.

NEXT year, Sedîd oddawlat Abû'l-hassan Ali Ebn Mankâd took the castle of Shayzâr (R) from the Romans, with a great army; and it continued in the possession of his family till it was taken by Mahmûd al Adel Nur oddin Ebn Zika (S), after an earthquake which had destroyed the place. Sedîd oddawlat, who was an excellent prince, and eminent poet, dying in 475, his son, Abû'l-merhaf al Nafr, surnamed Malek oddawlat, succeeded him, at Shayzâr.

IN 477, Malek Shâb sent his general Kastakar (T) to Baghdâd, as his lieutenant there; at which time his Wazîr's son was in that city. The same year, his brother Takash (U) rebelled against him; and, having taken Marwa, gave his army leave to plunder it for three days, while he and his associates lay with the women, and drank wine in the great temple, in the month of Ramadhân (W). Malek Shâb marching against him, he retired into the castle of Berjes; which being taken, he was imprisoned elsewhere.

THE same year, Sharf oddawlat Ebn Korays, lord of Halep and Musol, marched to attack Antiokk, then in possession of Soleymân Ebn Kotolmîsh (X); who put his forces to flight, and he died of his wounds. Soltân Taj oddawlat, hearing of his death, marched towards Halep the next year, accompanied by Ortok, the Turkmân, who had subdued Holwân (Y) and Habelâ. Both these agreeing to invade Soleymân, prince of Antiokk, they fought several battles with him, under the walls of Halep; in the last of which Soleymân was slain, and his forces routed. By this means Halep (Z) fell into the hands of Taj oddawlat, who became master of all Syria^k.

THE Greek historians say, that the Great Soltân, being informed of the success of Tutus (A) (as they call Taj oddawlat), and fearing he should grow too powerful, to strengthen himself, sent to propose an alliance of marriage between a son of his and a daughter of the emperor Alexis^l: the success of which shall be related, in the history of the Seljûks of Rûm, or Asia minor.

Hej. 483.
A. D. 1090.*

IN 483, the Bathaniyah (B), that is, Batbanians, or Batanists, began to subdue castles in Persian Irâk and Dilem. The first they took was in this last province, and called Rudbir. It belonged to Kamak, a subject to Malek Shâb; and was delivered to Hassan Ebn Masbak, for 1200 crowns, by the governor, who turned Batanist. This Hassan was a native of Marwa, and had been secretary to Abdolrezak, at Haram. Afterwards going to Egypt, he met with a Batanist, who brought him over to their persuasion; and, by consent of the people, made him grand master, and head of the sect. He had many followers; and, growing considerable, Malek Shâb sent him a threatening message, requiring his obedience.

THE ambassador being brought before him, he sent for a company of his people, and commanded one of them, a young man, to kill himself; which he did, without hesitation. He ordered another to throw himself headlong from the top of the castle; which he performed that instant, and broke his neck. After this, he told the envoy, that he had no other answer to send the Soltân, than that he had 70,000 men at his command, who obeyed him in the manner which he had seen. The Soltân was surprized when these things were reported to him; and, having other affairs on his hands, let the Batanists alone. They afterwards took several other castles; and, among the rest, that of Al Mût (C); which was their strongest hold, and royal seat^m.

THESE bravoos quickly grew famous for their daring murders: one of which was perpetrated soon after, on the person of Nezâm al Molk, Wazîr to Malek Shâb, one of the greatest personages among the Mohammedans, who had been deposed a little while before.

the Wazîr,*

THE occasion of the Wazîr's disgrace is somewhat differently related by authors; though all agree, that it was owing to some imprudent or unguarded expressions of his, in answer to the

The Batbanians were absolutely devoted to the service of their prince; by whose order they either slew themselves, or any person whom they had a mind to destroy. They are known in our histories chiefly by the name of assassins. For a farther account of them, and their several dynasties, see D'Herbelot, art. Bathania, Ismaelians, and Hassan Sabah.

(C) Or Al Marwt; which signifies death.

- a Soltân's message to him, concerning the insolent behaviour of one or more of his sons : of whom we are told he had twelve. Kondamîr writes, that it was brought about by the Soltâna ; who, incensed against him, for opposing her design of getting her youngest son (D) declared Malek Shâb's successor, accused him of absolutely disposing of all places in the government, and dividing them among his sons.

THE Soltân, offended that he should act in such a manner without consulting him, sent to Nezam al tell him, that, if he did not alter his conduct, he would oblige him to resign the cap and ink stand; Mo.k. which were the marks of his dignity and power. Nezam, nettled at this menace, answered,

- b that the cap which he wore, and the post he possessed, were so united to the crown and throne by the eternal decree of providence, that those four things could not subsist without each other. This answer, tho' bold, will admit of a good meaning : but it was altered by the messenger, who was in the Soltân's interest, in such a manner, that Malek Shâb, exasperated to the last degree, deprived the Wazîr of his employment that instant, and gave it to Taj al Molk Kami, chief of the Soltân's counsellors ; with a commission to examine into the mismanagements of his predecessorⁿ.

ACCORDING to Abmed Ebn Mohammed, author of the Nigbiaristân, the cause of the Wazîr's The cause of it. disgrace was his son Mowîad al Molk, who had been made secretary of state, turning out Adîb, the first clerk in the office, an excellent writer, though put in by the Soltân's order ; and answering, when Malek Shâb sent to have him restored, that he had sworn never to employ that man ; and believed the Soltân would not have him be guilty of perjury. The Soltân replied, in anger, c if Mowîad has sworn not to employ Adîb, I have made no such oath : much less have I sworn to continue Mowîad in his employment : and at the same time ordered Adîb to be made secretary in his room. Mowîad, after that, having commenced a violent prosecution against one of Malek Shâb's chief officers, that prince sent the Wazîr word, that he could no longer bear the insolence of his sons ; and that, unless a stop was put to it, he should be obliged to take the government of the state out of his hands. It was on this occasion that Nezam al Molk made the answer before related, which brought on his sudden remove^o.

ABU'L-FARAJ writes, that the Wazîr's disgrace was the consequence of a very insolent answer (E) which he sent the Soltân ; who repented the ill treatment given by his grandson (son of the governor of Marwa) to one of his principal slaves^p.

- d WHATEVER the cause was, Nezam al Molk, after his remove, followed the court, which just He is assassinated. at that time set out for Baghdâd ; and, being gotten as far as Nahawînd, a boy of the Batânîst sect, approaching him under pretence of begging, or otherwise, stabbed him with a knife, by the procurement of Taj Ebn Molk Kami (F), who succeeded him in the Wazîrship ; of which wound he died soon after, in the year 485 ; aged 93 years (G). His corps was carried back A. D. 1092. to Ispâhân, where it was buried with pomp.

- MIRKHOND writes, that Nezam al Molk (H), when but twelve years old, knew all the Korân ; His character. and, when very young, acquired so great a knowledge of the civil law, according to the principles of Shafey (I), that he gained the admiration of every body. As he was very learned, he no sooner got into authority than he took men of letters under his patronage ; founding houses and colleges for them in the cities of Baghdâd, Basrah, Herat, and Ispâhân. But the most grand monument left by him is the famous college of Baghdâd, called, after him, Medrassat annezamiyat ; which hath produced some of the most learned men of their time.

As an instance to what a high pitch of dignity, authority, and esteem, Nezam al Molk was Honours paid risen, the same author relates, that when Malek Shâb went to Baghdâd, to be crowned by the him, Khalîfah Al Râdbi, to render the ceremony more solemn, he summoned all the doctors of the law, and other learned men, within the Mohammedan dominions, to be present at it. Being assembled, he ordered them to go on foot from his palace in the western part of the city, to pay their compliments in a body to the Khalîfah, whose imperial palace was in the eastern part. Al Râdbi by the Khalîfah.

- f being informed, that this learned troop was coming to salute him, with Nezam al Molk at their head, sent his officers to meet them ; and ordered, that the Wazîr alone should advance on horse-back. When they appeared before the Khalîfah, he commanded a seat to be placed for the Wazîr, and made him sit down, while all the other doctors stood, on his right and left : but what still more surprized them was, that he honoured Nezam with a vest (K), and conferred on him the title of learned, just, and director of the dominions of Râdhi, Kbalifah of the Moslems: for, till then, those spiritual monarchs never gave any title or dignity, which belonged to themselves, to any of their ministers.

(H) Nezam al Molk, as the Persians, and Nazâm al Molk, as the Arabs pronounce it, signifies the ornament of the state.

(I) One of the doctors, or heads, of the principal sect among the Mohammedans.

(K) Called Kafzân

His liberality. THE liberality which this great man exercised, vastly enhanced his other rare qualities: for, in the first progress which Malek Shâh made through his dominions, he distributed among the poor, out of his own coffers, no less than 200,000 crowns^a.

His origin. As to the original of Nodham or Nezâm al Molk, whose name was Hassan, 'tis said, he was the son of a peasant, near Tûsb (or Masbbad), who learned the Arabik, and was secretary to Bajer, lord of Bâlk: but that prince using him ill, he fled to Tagri Beg (L) Dawd al Mawa; who made him preceptor to his son Olâ Arslân. His way was, when any great men, either in church or state, came to visit him, to rise, and then sit down again; but a certain poor man of learning coming one day, he rose to meet him, and placed him in his seat. Being afterwards asked, why he made that difference? he answered, that the great folks, of both kinds, when they come, praise him for excellencies which did not belong to him; and this feeds his vanity and pride: whereas the other person puts him in mind of his faults, and whatever he did amiss; which made him humble, and reflect on man, failings he was subject to. His hard fate was lamented by many of the poets of that time.

Malek Shâh's death. AFTER the assassination of Nezâm al Molk, Malek Shâh proceeded to Baghdâd; where being arrived, he went a hunting on the third of Shawâl; and, eating some of the flesh of the game, returned sick. A vein being opened, but little blood came out; which increased his illness to a burning fever; so that he died about the middle of the same month^r, no more than eighteen days after Nezâm al Molk, oppressed with vexations^c. He lived thirty-seven years and five months; of which he reigned twenty, and some months over^t.

Greek account false. THE Greek historians relate, that this Soltân, whom yet they do not name, was assassinated. They tell us, that Tutus (or Taj oddawlat Tatafsh), his brother, having slain Amîr Soleyman (as above related), and his son-in-law, resolved to slay the Soltân also, before he should strengthen himself by an alliance with the Roman emperor: that, for this purpose, he hired twelve Kassians, being certain assassins, so called by the Persians; who, going to the palace, found that prince in liquor, and, pretending they had something to say to him from his brother, as soon as the guards were withdrawn, stabbed him with their poniards: that they were all put to cruel deaths; which, on such occasions, this kind of people glory in^d. 'Tis easy to see, that the murder of the Wazîr is here applied to the Soltân. Possibly there was such a rumour at first; and that prince's death happening so near the time of his minister's, might favour the mistake.

Blunder of Mestûfi. HOWEVER that be, Hamdallah Mestûfi has committed a greater blunder than this. He tells a formal story here, that the Soltân, in his second progress round his dominions, falling into an ambuscade of Greeks, was carried to the emperor, who had advanced to the borders with a powerful army: that, not being known to those who took him, Nezâm al Molk, on notice thereof, immediately feigned an embassy to the emperor; who, at his departure, made him a present of the prisoners, as he expected: that, afterwards, the two armies coming to a battle, the emperor was taken prisoner, but presently restored to his liberty, without ransom: lastly, that, dying soon after, Malek Shâh subdued part of his dominions, and gave the government thereof to his cousin Soleyman, son of Kotolmîsh^e. 'Tis plain, that the emperor here intended was Romanus Diogenes: for we read of no other Greek emperor who was taken by the Seljûk Soltâns; and, consequently, the author has confounded Malek Shâh with his predecessor Alp Arslân.

Malek Shâh's character. SOLTÂN Malek Shâh, as to his person, was very handsome, both in shape and features, besides being exceeding genteel in his behaviour^f. To give his due character; he was an excellent prince, wise, liberal, courageous; had fine parts; was remarkable for his sincerity and piety. He reduced the taxes, and put a stop to other vexations; repaired bridges, high roads, and canals; erected the temple of Baghdâd, called the Masjid of the Soltân; also the Hanîfean college (M), near the chapel of the prelate Abû Hanîfab, in the quarter of the city called Resâfa, and endowed it nobly. He likewise built markets and towns. He made great conquests; reducing under his power all the country from the borders of Turkestân to the Holy Land, and Yamman (N). He made the roads secure, and every thing plenty in all places. He was a terror to bad men, and a support to the innocent, the widow, and the poor; who had always justice done them in his courts^y.

(L) Or, as others, Jaffer Beg.

(M) Kondamîr says, he ordered colleges, hospitals, and houses of pleasure, to be built in several parts of his dominions. D'Herb. p. 544.

(N) Yamman is the country we call Arabia felix. Kondamîr says, his dominions extended from Antickh to Urkend (or Uzkend), a city of Turkestân. D'Herblot, p. 542.

THE Soltân took great delight in travelling; and 'tis reported, that he made the tour of his dominions, though so very extensive, as has been related, no fewer than ten times^a. Ham-do'llab Mestûfi, before cited, relates, that Malek Shâh made the pilgrimage to Mekka in 481 (O), with an incredible expence: for, besides abolishing the usual tribute which the pilgrims paid, he laid out very great sums in building towns in the desert; where he ordered a great number of wells and cisterns to be made, and water to be conveyed to them from all sides. He likewise commanded plenty of provisions to be carried, for subsistence of the pilgrims; and distributed immense sums among the poor, with an unparalleled liberality^a.

BUT Malek Shâh's greatest passion was for hunting. He kept 47,000 horses for his ordinary guard, and the chace (P); in which he spent a good deal of time. 'Tis said, that for every beast which he killed himself, he gave a piece of gold to the poor: and it happened sometimes that he slew a great many. In short, Malek Shâh is acknowledged to have been the greatest prince among the Seljukians; whether we consider his conquests, the extent of his dominions, or his magnificence, liberality, and other virtues.

HIS ambition seems to have been very moderate: for he disposed of great part of his dominions, in his life-time, among his relations and domestics. He gave to his cousin Soleymân, son of Kotolmîsh, the country of Rûm, or what he had taken from the Greek emperor, extending from the Euphrates a great way into Asia minor; of which part Azzerûm was then the capital. He established, or restored, Soltân Shâh, son of his uncle Kaderd, before-mentioned, in Kermân, or the Persian Caramania; of which he was the second Seljuk Soltân. He gave part of Syria to his brother Tebis (Q); Karazm to Tûshtekkin; the country of Halep, or Aleppo, to Aksankor; that of Musol to Chaghirmîsh (R); and Mardin to Katmâr.

SOME of the above-mentioned states became reunited in time to the dominions of the family of Malek Shâh, and others remained in the families of those to whom he gave them^b.

WE must not conclude this reign, without giving some account of the Tawarik al Jalâli, or the Jalâlean kalendar, already mentioned; which is a correction of the Persian kalendar, first made by order of Malek Shâh, and afterwards by Soltân Jalâl'oddin Mankberni, son of Mohammed Karazm Shâh.

THE Malekean epocha begins, according to some, on Sunday the fifth day of Sheban, or the eighth month, in the year of the Hejrah 464 (answering to that of Christ 1071) (S); according to others, on Friday the tenth of Ramadhân (or the ninth month) in 471 (or of Christ 1078) (T). So that there is a difference of 1097 days. The cause of this difference was unknown to our author Ulugh Beg. According to the second, and most received, opinion, the year, which is solar, begins on that day in which, at noon, the sun enters Aries, and the months are reckoned from the passage of the sun through the several signs: however, they consist of no more than thirty days each; but five are added to the last month, and a day intercalated every four years. But when the intercalation comes to be made six or seven times, the leap-year is put off to the fifth year. The Jalâlean year consists of 365 days, 5 hours, 49'. 15". 0". 48""; and is truly tropical, most exactly corresponding with the motion of the sun: for the sixth, and sometimes the seventh, leap-year being transferred to the fifth year, the equinoxes and solstices become constantly fixed to the same days of the month. This form of the year was contrived that the Newrûz, or new-year's-day, might always fall on the same day^c.

MALEK Shâh left four sons, Barkiarok, Mohammed, Sanjâr, and Mahmûd; which last he appointed for his successor, though but five years (A) and ten months old. This was done by the management of his wife Turkûn Khatûn, and the Wazîr Tajo'l Molk; who, concealing the Soltân's death, carried his corps out of Baghdâd; and, by distributing money, got the army to take the oath to her son. The Khalîfah also ordered his name to be published in the pulpits; and sending him the ensigns of investiture, he was clothed with the Soltân's Kaftân, or vest, the crown put on his head, and the sword girt to his side. On this occasion it is observed, that never prince so young behaved with better grace; and that, after the Khalîfah's Wazîr, who performed the ceremony, had made him his master's compliments, he returned thanks for the favours received in a very handsome manner. As soon as the ceremony was over, the Soltâna went to Nabrawân, and encamped ^a.

(A) Abû'l-faraj says but four years old.

WHILE Mahmûd was crowned at Baghdâd, Abu'l Modbaffer Kiffem, called Barkiarok, was acknowledged for legal successor at Ispâhân, where he then was: with whom many joined, as being the eldest son of Malek Shâb, and because he was thought more capable of governing the state than a child and a woman. ^b

HEREUPON Turkân Khatûn, who was a woman of great spirit as well as understanding, marched thither from Nabrawân, with such diligence, that she surprized him in that city, which she took: but some domestics of the late Nezâm al Molk found means for him to escape out of his mother-in-law's hands, and retire to Shirâz; where resided Takâsh Tekkîn, who had been made Atabek, that is, lieutenant-general of Pârs, or Proper Persia, by Malek Shâb ^b.

THAT grateful prince not only gave him protection, but conducted him to Ray, one of the capitals of Irâk; where he had him acknowledged the rightful successor. At the same time the Soltâna caused her son Mahmûd to be crowned at Ispâhân, the other capital, and sent troops to pursue Barkiarok: but many of them going over to his side, he defeated the rest. Among the prisoners taken on this occasion was Tajo'l Molk Kiami; who being brought to the Soltân, the friends of his predecessor slew him. He was a Persian, endowed with many virtues, and excellencies of every kind: but all his good qualities were defaced by the murder of Nad-hâm ^c.

AFTER this, Barkiarok marched to Ispâhân, and besieged his brother, with an army of 20,000 men. Turkân Khatûn, finding the people ready to revolt from her, came to an accommodation: by which Mahmûd and she were left in possession of Ispâhân, and its dependencies, on condition he divided with Barkiarok the treasure of his father, which was in that city.

THE Soltân, having received for his share 500,000 dinars in gold, raised the siege, and turned his arms towards Hamadân, where one of his uncles, named Ismael, commanded; who, allured by the Soltâna, with hopes of marriage, had made war upon his nephew. The two armies, which were pretty equal, met, in 486, near that city; where, after an obstinate battle, Ismael was defeated; and, being taken by the enemy, slain by them. The same year Takas Shân, son of Arslân Shâb, another of Barkiarok's uncles, declared war against him; and, having a much greater force, obliged him to retire towards Ispâhân, where he was very kindly received by his brother Soltân Mahmûd, whose mother was then dead. ^d

BUT those of Mahmûd's party, judging the opportunity of advancing his affairs ought not to be slipped, seized his brother; and, 'tis said, orders were actually given to deprive him of sight, when Mahmûd, being taken with the small pox, died in a few days. Hereupon Barkiarok was set at liberty, and saluted emperor, by the very people who just before would have ruined him. Being by this unexpected accident seated a second time on the throne, he chose for his Wazîr, or prime minister, Mowîad al Molk (son of Nezâm al Molk), mentioned in the former reign: but, in a little time, through some distrust, the Soltân turned him out, and put his brother Takr al Molk in his place ^d.

IN 487 Turkân Khatûn died (B), and Barkiarok, marching to Baghdâd, had his name mentioned in the pulpits, and the title of Rokno'ddîn given to him by the Khalîfah ^e: he also assumed that of Amîr al Momenîn, which no prince before Malek Shâb had been honoured with. Having settled his affairs, he applied himself entirely to war. His first expedition was against Takâsh, his cousin-german, who some time before had driven him to the extremes above-mentioned; and, after several battles fought between them, Takâsh was at length slain (C). After this he marched into Khorasân, where Arslân Shâb, father of Takâsh, who commanded there, had considerable troops: but he was delivered from his enemy by another of his sons (D), who committed that parricide, in order to seize his father's government; yet was disappointed: for ^f

(C) Abû'l-faraj, p. 240, says, he was smothered under water, and one of his sons slain at the same time. He also makes him the uncle of Barkiarok. If so, he must be the same Takâsh, who, according to Ebn Amid, rebelled against his brother Malek Shâb ten years before, as hath been related. If not, Abû'faraj must have ascribed to the son both the name and death which belonged to the father.

(D) According to Abû'l-faraj, Soltân Arslân Argûn (as he calls him) was slain by one of his domestics, in 450, to free mankind from his injustice.

a Barkiarok, being thus become master of it, gave it to his brother Sanjar, and returned to Irâk ^f.

BARKIAROK had still another uncle to vanquish before he could be at rest; and that was Tatash ^{aspiring} Taj oddawlat Tatash, sovereign or king of Damascus, and most part of Syria. This aspiring prince, as soon as he heard of his brother Malek Shâh's death, ordered the Kotbah to be made in his name; and sent to Moktadi, to desire that the same might be done at Baghdâd; but the Khalîfah refusing, he marched to Rababa (or Rabba), on the Euphrates, and took it. Hereupon Kasmar oddawlat (or Ak Sankar) (E) (whom Malek Shâh had made governor of Halep, after he had taken it from his brother Taj oddawlat), submitted to this latter ^g. But, in 486, A. D. 1093, going over to Barkiarok's side, Taj oddawlat fought several battles with him; who at length

By this means Tatash becoming lord of Halep, he prepared to march into Irâk. Accord- ^{vanquished,} ^{and slain.} ^{Hejrah 488.} ^{A. D. 1095.} ingly, in 488, Barkiarok met him near Ray; where a bloody battle was fought, in which his rebellious uncle was slain. Taj oddawlat, before the engagement, had sent Yusef, son of Ortok, the Turkmân, before-mentioned, to get him proclaimed Soltân at Baghdâd; but Yusef, hearing of his master's death, fled back to Halep ^h. The Greek historians mention the death of Tatash, or Tutus, as they call him. They say, that Pusan, who had been sent by the Soltân against Apel Kasem (or Abu'l Kassim) at Nice, as soon as he heard of his master's death, marched towards Khorasân, against Tutus, and was slain in battle: That, after this, Tutus expected to be acknowledged Soltân; but, being met by Barkiarok, the late Soltân's son, was

c routed, and slain ⁱ. According to this account, Putân should be Kasmar oddawlat Ak Sanker, or Ik Sanker.

BARKIAROK, whose reign was a series of rebellions, was no sooner freed from one, but ^{Another re-} ^{bellion.} another arose. Mowîad, from the time of his being turned out of the Wazîrship, did his utmost to revenge his disgrace, by fomenting new troubles. He began by spiriting-up Anzâr, who was formerly slave to Malek Shâh, and had a great influence in the province of Irâk. He enabled him to set a considerable army on foot; and Anzâr might have given the Soltân much trouble, if he had not been taken off by an assassin, in the city of Sawa; where he was already advanced to give his sovereign battle. Mowîad, after this, applied himself to Mohammed, ^{Mohammed} ^{rebels.} brother of Barkiarok (who had given him but a small share of his father's dominions, in the province of Adherbijân), and never ceased urging him till he had taken up arms against his

d brother ^k. Mohammed (surnamed Gayatho'ddîn) and Sanjer were Malek Shâh's children, by the same venter. Mohammed, after his father's death, followed the interest of his brother Mahmûd; and, after the battle, which the latter lost, obtained, from Barkiarok, Hamkha (F), and its dependencies, for his support: to which place he retired ^l.

THIS prince set forward in 492 to dispute the sovereignty with his brother; and, although Barkiarok he had only a small army at first, yet it soon became formidable, by the great credit and ^{flies.} influence which Mowîad had in that province. At this time the lords of the court, being ^{Hejrah 492.} ^{A. D. 1098.} incensed against Mojared al Molk Kiami, superintendant of the finances, by whose frugal management they found their salaries curtailed, attacked his house, and obliged him to fly for refuge e to the Soltân. The Soltân refusing to deliver him up to them, they took the palace by assault; cut Kiami in pieces, and would have treated Barkiarok in the same manner, if he had not escaped by a back-door; abandoning Irâk to his brother.

MOHAMMED, thus possessed of a great dominion without striking a stroke (G), made Mowîad ^{Assisted by Ay-} ^{al Molk} his Wazîr ^m; and sent an ambassador to Baghdâd, to get his name mentioned in the ^{Yaz,} Kotbah, or oration, made in the pulpits on Fridays: but, in 493, Barkiarok, repairing thi- ^{Hejrah 493.} ^{A. D. 1099.} ther, had it suppressed. Then, assembling a great army, marched to meet Mohammed: who, at Mahdan, defeated him; Barkiarok escaping with only fifty horse ⁿ. Hereupon, quitting Ray, he fled to Khûzestân; where Ayyâz, formerly slave to Malek Shâh, ruled with almost an absolute sway ^o: by whose assistance the Soltân found himself soon at the head of a powerful f army; with which, in 494, he defeated Mohammed's forces in several engagements.

In 495 they had another battle: but, as Barkiarok had 50,000 troops, and Mohammed only ^{defeats his bro-} ^{thers.} 15,000, the latter was put to flight. Hereupon, taking his way to Khorasân, to seek aid of ^{Hej. 495.} ^{A. D. 1101.} king Senjar, he stopped at Jorjân. Here Senjar coming to him with his forces, they went to Damegân; where the army laid waste the country to such a degree, that the inhabitants, for want of dogs and dead animals, eat one another^p. After this, marching against Barkiarok, they were put to flight; and their mother being made captive, was exchanged for the prisoners taken before by Senjar.

Hej. 496.
A. D. 1102. NEXT year Soltân Barkiarok besieged Mohammed in Ispâbân; but was obliged soon to depart, for want of forage and provisions. Mohammed hereupon raised troops, and met his brother: but, being defeated, was obliged to fly into Armenia^q.

It is observable, that the Kotbab was interchangeably made at Baghdâd, in the names of those two Soltâns, as often as they had the advantage one of the other. Of so great importance was that ceremony thought to be by the Mohammedan princes, so long as the race of the Khalîfahs subsisted; though, at this time, they were no more than shadows of what they had been formerly.

made prime Wazîr.

OUR readers, doubtless, will be curious to know what became of Mowîad, the author of these troubles. We shall therefore inform them. In one of the battles above-mentioned, in which Barkiarok had the advantage, he happened to be taken prisoner: but, instead of being punished, as he deserved, he, by his address, so gained the principal lords of the court, that the good-natured Soltân, at their intercession, pardoned him, and afterwards made him his prime Wazîr. However, he did not long enjoy that post: for one day Barkiarok, retiring to rest, overheard one of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber, who thought him asleep, saying to another, These Seljûkian princes are of a nature very different from that of most other princes: they neither know how to make themselves feared, nor to revenge the injuries done to them. For instance, added he, this Mowîad, who has been the cause of so many evils, is promoted by the Soltân to the employment of Wazîr, as a reward for all his treasons.

Put to death.

BARKIAROK, touched to the quick with these reflections on his conduct, not long after, sent for the Wazîr, and ordered him to sit down. Then, without saying any thing farther, with one stroke of the scymitar, which he held in hand, he cut off his head, with so much dexterity, that it remained on his shoulders till the body fell. This done, he said to his courtiers, See now if the princes of my house do not know how to make themselves feared, and take vengeance on their enemies.

The empire di-
Hejrah 498.
A. D. 1104.

WHILE this tragedy was acting at court, the armies of the Soltân and his brother often skirmished, without coming to a general engagement. At length, in 498 (H), a treaty was concluded; whereby Mohammed remained master of the provinces of Shâm, or Syria; Diyârbekr al Jazireh, or Mesopotamia; Musol, Adherbijân, Armenia, and Georgia. The rest of the empire; viz. Pârs, Irâk, Kermân, Khorasân, Mawarâ'lnabr, and part of Hindowstân, were to be possessed by Barkiarok^r. It was also agreed, that Barkiarok should not go to meet Mohammed with drums, nor be named in the pulpits along with him in the countries which were ceded to him^s.

THE civil wars, which for so many years together had afflicted the Seljûkian dominions, being thus at length brought to an end, by a partition of the empire between the brothers, let us now turn our eyes towards Syria, and see what was doing there, and in the neighbouring countries, during that interval.

A. D. 1094.

As soon as the news of the death of Taj oddawlat, king of Syria (who was slain in the battle against Barkiarok, as hath been before related), came to the ears of his son Redwân, at Damaskus, he repaired immediately to Halep, and took possession of it, with the title of Tabro'l Molk (†). His brother Dekâk Shems al Molk (I) following him from Diyârbekr, with part of his own and his father's army, there staid with him. Soon after, receiving letters from Sûbtekkîn al Hadîm, Taj oddawlat's lieutenant of the castle of Damaskus, he slipped away, without Redwân's knowledge; and, though hotly pursued, got thither, and took possession of the city. Dekâk made Sûbtekkîn his lieutenant, to govern his state; but soon after set in his place Atabek (K) Tegtekkîn, who had been governor before both of it and Mîyaserkîn, under Taj oddawlat, and preceptor to Dekâk himself. He was taken prisoner at the battle wherein that prince lost his life; and, escaping back, was received with great honour, and promoted by his quondam pupil, as hath been related; which Sûbtekkîn (L) resented so highly, that Dekâk put him to death.

a In 489, Dekák marching with his troops towards the sea-coast, his brother Redwán, who ^{sons of Tash.} longed to recover Damaskus, hastened with a great army, to surprize it in his absence. The citizens shutting the gates against him, he besieged the place; but Dekák returning he was ^{Hej. 489.} obliged to retire. Upon this he wrote to Mosía Ali, Khalífah of Egypt, promising to have his name published in the pulpits of Halep, provided he would assist him to take Damaskus; which Mosía Ali agreeing to, the Kotbab was accordingly made in his name: but failing to send him troops, he soon lost that honour again.[†]

SYRIA was thus scarce reduced under the power of the Seijúkian Turks, who took it from ^{The crusades} the Arabs; when she found herself invaded by an army of Franks (L) or Europeans, gathered from the farthest west. This was the famous crusade, or war of the cross, more commonly b called the holy war; wherein almost all the Christian princes, influenced by a mad zeal for devotion, excited in them by the artifices of the pope (more with a view to carry on his own ambitious designs (M), than to serve the interests of religion, which was the pretence), entered into a league of confederacy to rescue the sepulchre of Christ at Jerusalem from the Mohammedans, and drive them out of the Holy Land.

In prosecution of this extravagant undertaking, which may justly be termed a religious ^{Franks take} frenzy, or piece of knight-errantry, a vast army of Franks, with king Baldwin at the head of ^{Antioch.} them, entered Syria in the year 491, and sitting down before Antioch, took that city. We ^{Hej. 491.} shall say nothing of this siege from the Christian writers, an account thereof having been already ^{A. D. 1097.} given elsewhere[‡]; but shall, for the most part, confine ourselves to what we find related in c the oriental historians concerning this war.

As soon as Kawám oddawalat Kodbuka (N), who was in Mesopotamia, heard that Antioch ^{Blocked up} was taken by the Christians, he raised forces, and, coming into Syria, laid siege to it, with a ^{there.} design to recover it. There were then in the city five Christian princes; namely, Bardawíl, or Baldwin, Sanjil, Gonofri, Kumes the prince of Roba (O), and Báymánd prince of Antioch (P). These falling in want of provisions, sent to Kodbuka, offering to surrender the town, on condition that he would suffer them to depart: but he refused, saying, they should escape no otherwise than by making their way with the sword. While they were in this distress, a monk ^{Raise the siege:} of theirs told them, that the staff of St. Peter, strengthened with iron at the end (Q), was buried in the church of the priests; and that, if they found it, they should overcome their
d enemies in battle; if not, they should all perish. After three days fasting and praying, they dug and found the staff. Encouraged by this good omen of victory, they began to march out of the city, five or six at a time. Kodbuka's officers advised, that their soldiers might stand at the gates, and kill all who came forth: but he said it was better to let them all come out first, and then to put them to the sword. When they were all come out to the last man, they formed a great army, which put the Moslems to flight. The last who fled was Sokmán Ebn Ortok. Many thousands of them were killed: and the Franks, seizing their camp, got provisions, riches, horses, and arms^{*}.

THEIR affairs being thus restored, they went and took Moarro'lnomán, slaying its lords. ^{Take Jerusa-} Thence they proceeded to Ramla, or Rama, and took it. In 492, perceiving the weakness ^{lem.} of the Egyptian Turks, they went and besieged Beyt al Makdes, that is, Jerusalem; where Sok- ^{Hej. 492.} mán and Ilgazi, sons of Ortok the Turkmán, with their uncle Sunej, were shut up. Wherefore the Franks having erected two towers against the city, they took it on the north side (R), and put the people to the sword. They continued to kill the Moslems in the country round for several weeks together; and assembled all the Jews into their temple, burned them in it (S). They killed more than 70,000 Moslems (T), and took an immense

Next year they besieged Tripoli, whose lord Fakro'lmalek, son of Amar, sending to Shamso'ddawlat Dekâk, prince of Damaskus, and Husseyn Henabo'ddawlat, lord of Hems, they sent him troops, but were routed by the Franks. IT is time now to return to Persia, whither the course of our history calls us, to conclude the reign of Barkiarok. That prince, after the agreement made with his brother Mohammed, in 498, as before-mentioned, advanced towards Baghdâd, to visit his great benefactor Ayyâz, who had a sovereign authority in that city. But being afflicted both with a consumption and the piles together, he died by the way at Ispâhân, in the thirty-fifth year of his age (B), and thirteenth of his reign; appointing for his successor his son Malek Shâh, then but four years and eight months (C) old. He had him cloathed with a Kaftân, or vest, and appointed Amyr Ayyâz his Atabek, or governor, in the presence of his great officers, who all promised to obey d his commands ^a.

ABOUT the time that Barkiarok was on his way towards Baghdâd, Soltân Mohammed marched from Adherbijân, to take Mûsol from Jagarmîsh. The people of the country, on his approach, rose in their prince's defence, and killed the Soltân a great many men. But when the siege had lasted three months, Jagarmîsh, hearing of Barkiarok's death, sent to offer obedience to Mohammed, who received him with embraces ^b.

Fifth Soltân,
Mohammed.

AFTER this, the Soltân, who already possessed one part of the Seljûkian empire, prepared to wrest the other part from his nephew Malek Shâh, and unite it to his own. According to Ebn Amid, he, on the news of his brother's death, repaired without delay to Baghdâd; where Ayyâdh, or Ayyâz, had gathered 25,000 horse to oppose him: but that an accommodation taking place, Mohammed entered that city, and took possession of the Soltânat: the Khalifah Mestâdher Billah presenting him with the Kaftân, and delivering into his his hands the command of the palace. Yet when his affairs were settled, he seized Ayyâdh, and put him to death^a.

THE author, or authors, made use of by D'Herbelot, gives a very different account of this affair; viz. that Ayyâz and Sedekias, the tutors of the young prince, having assembled powerful forces to oppose Soltân Mohammed, the two armies met in 501: but that, while they faced each other, expecting the signal for battle, there appeared in the sky a cloud, in form of a dragon, which cast down so much fire upon the troops of Malek Shâh, that the soldiers, terrified with so strange an event, threw down their arms, and begged quarter of Mohammed; who, by this means, became master of the persons both of his nephew and his two generals, whom he sent prisoners to the castle of Lehed. Opposes his nephew. Hej. 501. A. D. 1107

b AFTER this unexpected victory, without a blow, he marched to Baghdâd, where he obtained the title of Gayâth, or Mogayâth-o'ddin (A); and in his patents was dignified with that of Amîr al Momenîn, or commander of the faithful; by which, in effect, the temporal power of the Khalifah over the Moslems was conferred on him. Obtains the empire.

THE same year the Soltân marched against Sayfo'ddin Sâdeka (B), prince of Hella, who was slain, and his forces routed, after he had enjoyed his state twenty-two years, and lived fifty-six.

MOHAMMED having finished this small expedition, returned to Baghdâd. During his stay there, he was informed, that one Abmed, surnamed Atthash, a pretended prophet, had not only gained over a great number of followers by his impostures, but also seized the fortress of Dizghodeh, after corrupting the minds of the garrison with his impious tenets. This important place had been built by Malek Shâh, near Ispâhân, to awe the inhabitants, who were very subject to revolt. On this advice the Soltân hastened thither, and formed the blockade of the castle; which was so strong, both by situation and art, that there was no reducing it but by famine. A false prophet rebels.

THE place not having been furnished with provisions, Atthash soon found himself obliged to send a man to inform Saad al Molk, surnamed Awji, the Soltân's Wazîr, whom he had also infected with his opinions, that he could not hold out above two or three days longer. The Wazîr answered, that he only desired him to stand his ground eight or ten days more, for that, within such time, he would find means to rid him of that dog, meaning the Soltân. Corrupts the Wazîr.

THIS prince, who was of a very sanguine complexion, and usually fell into great disorders occasioned by excess of blood, was accustomed to lose some every month. Awji hereupon went to the surgeon, who, for the reward of a thousand chekins, and a purple vest, promised to make use of a poisoned lancet the first time he bled the Soltân.

THE plot happening to come to the knowledge of one of the grooms of the prince's chamber, he discovered it to his wife, and she to her gallant, who communicated it to the Soltân himself. As soon as he was apprized of it, he pretended he wanted to be let blood; and accordingly the surgeon was sent for; who, having bound up the Soltân's arm, took out the fatal instrument: but while he was going to perform the operation, Mohammed cast so terrible a look at him, that the wretched phlebotomist, being seized all over with a trembling, which made the lancet drop out of his hand, fell at his sovereign's feet; and confessing his wicked design, declared who was the author of it. The Wazîr was immediately seized, and punished as he deserved: the surgeon was only sentenced to be bled with the same instrument which he had prepared to bleed the Soltân. His treason detected.

THE rebels finding that their treason was discovered, and being no longer able to resist, surrendered at discretion. Atthash their chief was conducted to Ispâhân, tied neck and heels upon a camel: there, after the prophet had been exposed for some days as a laughing-stock to the people, he was put to a cruel death: after which his body was burned, with a great number of his disciples, who had joined in the revolt. It is reported, that this impostor, who was well versed in astrology and geomancy, finding himself hard pressed by the besiegers, wrote to the Soltân, that he had found by his horoscope, that, in a few days, he should be surrounded with a great number of stars in the midst of Ispâhân, even in the presence of the Soltân: and when he was led through the city, accompanied with great crowds of spectators, to the place of execution, being asked concerning the accomplishment of his prediction, he answered, that nothing could be a clearer verification than the condition he then was in; but that he found the great number of stars, which he hoped to see, were not to serve, as he had believed, to do him honour, but to cover him with shame and confusion. The rebel punished.

f SOLTÂN Mohammed having settled his dominions in peace, marched into Hindowstân, and made considerable conquests there. The author of the Tarikh Ghuzideh relates, that this prince, who was very zealous for religion, having found, in one of the temples which he had demolished, an image of stone, weighing 400 kintals, he ordered it to be removed, as an Conquests in India.

object of idolatry. The Indians offered its weight in precious stones, and other things, for a its ransom; but Mohammed, rejecting their proposal, said to his officers, I would not have it reported hereafter that Azâ (C) was a maker of images, and Mohammed was a merchant of them. At the same time he ordered that great heap of stone to be transported to Ispâhân; where, after having been shewn as a trophy of his victory, it was condemned to serve for the threshold of the great gate belonging to the stately college which he erected there, and which contained his sepulchre ^b.

The news of his being taken coming to the citizens, they gave the command to his son Zenghi. Afterwards Al Jâwali, besieging Musol, had Jagarmîsh shewed to the people daily on a mule, offering to set him at liberty, in case they would surrender the city to him. When he perceived death approaching, he sent for his son Mahmûd Abu'l Kassim, but fourteen years old, whom he had declared his successor, kissed him, and wept: then ordered him to go and sit in the throne: but the young prince declined it, saying, it was an unlucky day. Death of Mo-

SOLTÂN Mohammed was eminent for gravity, justice, and clemency; was strong, and could talk well ^d. He left in the treasury eleven millions of gold, besides as much in furniture, and other effects. Historians do not tell us what method he made use of to fill his coffers: but by the following story, related in the Nighiaristân, it may be judged, that they were not more equitable than those which other princes have employed for the same purpose.

^c DHIA AL MOLK, son of the famous Nezâm al Molk, assassinated in the reign of Malek Shâb, apprehending himself injured by some ill offices of Alao'ddawlat, prince of Hamadân, who assumed the title of Saïd or Seïd (O), which word, signifying lord, is appropriated to the race of Mohammed; to be revenged on him, told the Soltân, that if he would permit him to call Alao'ddawlat to an account, he would engage to bring 50,000 crowns of gold into the treasury. The Soltân granted his request. But as the Saïd, who had many friends at court, was quickly informed of what was doing against him, he made such haste, that he was at Ispîhân before the Wazîr knew any-thing of the matter: and finding means to throw himself at the Soltân's feet, represented the injustice he would commit in giving up a prince of the house of his prophet into the hands of an infidel and heretic, as was the Wazîr. He added, that, if the desire of so much money was what had induced him to consent to his minister's injurious proposal,

The Wazîr is

^d he would pay down 800,000 crowns, which were 300,000 more than the malicious Wazîr had offered, provided his majesty would deliver Dhia al Molk into his hands; with leave to oblige him to render as exact and rigorous an account as he should require of him.

THIS proposal being accepted of (P), the Saïd returned, along with a person who was commissioned to receive the money. Being arrived at Hamadân, the officer, who expected that the prince would lodge him in his palace, and do him many other honours, was given to understand, that he must repair to the public Karawansaray, or inn, and live at his own expence, till the sum could be raised; and that then notice should be given him to come and take it away. The officer, offended at this treatment, began with complaints; but finding them of no avail, proceeded to menaces. But the Saïd, assuming an air of authority, told him,

firminess,

^e If you do not be easy, I will order you to be hanged up instantly, before the house where you lodge; after which I have only to add 100,000 crowns more to the sum which I have promised the Soltân; for with that money he might buy a thousand slaves, the worst of whom would be better than you. The officer, who was in fact one of the Soltân's slaves, hearing the Saïd talk in that manner, thought it best to bear all patiently, and waited at the inn forty days; in which time Alao'ddawlat raised the sum in question, without either borrowing money on interest, or selling any of his effects.

spirit.

ON the cash being paid into the royal treasury, the Wazîr was delivered into the hands of the Saïd, to do with him just as he should think fit: but that prince set, on this occasion, an example of virtue, the most eminent and rare to be found among men; for, instead of taking vengeance on his enemy, or even of making him pay the sum which he had been obliged to give the Soltân, he treated him with so much honour and generosity (Q), that Dhia al Molk became his best friend ^f.

Sixth Soltân,
Sanjar.

AFTER the death of Mohammed was known, Sanjar (R), son of Malek Shâb, who had governed the great province of Khorasân for twenty years, under the two preceding reigns of his brothers, raised a puissant army; and marched (S) into the province of Persian Irâk, where his nephew Mahmûd Abu'l-kassim, surnamed Mogayatho'ddin, had taken the title of Soltân: but the latter being defeated, after a bloody battle fought between them, he retired to the castle of Saveh, a place of great strength and importance.

empire,

MAHMUD, finding his affairs entirely ruined, was obliged to sue for peace to his uncle, and sent to him his Wazîr Kemalo'ddin Ali, a very eloquent person, who, by his address, brought about an accommodation. Hereupon Mahmûd went to visit Sanjar; and was so well received, that he obtained of him the investiture of the province of Irâk (T), with the following conditions: that the name of Sanjar should always be mentioned in the public prayers before that of Mahmûd; that this latter should not have the fourth veil, or curtain (U), in his apartments; that the trumpet should not sound when he went in or out of his palace; and lastly, that he should retain the officers whom his uncle had established in his province.

MAHMUD, according to Kondamîr, was obliged to receive these conditions with thanks, and resolved to spend his time in hunting, without meddling with any affairs. However that may be, this seems, from the course of the history, to have been an actual partition of empire, which took place soon after, if not from the time when the agreement was made; by virtue whereof Mahmûd and his descendants were to enjoy the share allotted to him, with the title of Soltân, in as absolute a manner as Sanjar enjoyed his. Accordingly we find that Mahmud was succeeded in his dominions by four or five princes, who claimed under him, during the reign of Sanjar * in Khorasân: nor does it appear that he gave any opposition to their succession; or that they applied to him for his consent. At the same time it must be confessed, that the histories and extracts which have come to us relating to these Soltâns, are very defective; and, to add to the misfortune, that of Ebn Amîd, which was one of our chief funds, descends no lower than the reign of Soltân Mohammed, Sanjar's predecessor ^m.

Kothbo'ddin.

THIS Soltân is called ⁿ Moazo'ddin, Abu'lbareth, and Moazo'ddin Borhan (X). The first thing remarkable that we meet with in his reign is the death of Kothbo'ddin, founder of a new monarchy, in the year 521. His father Bustekkîn was slave to Balkatekkîn, or Malkatekkîn, who was one of Malek Shâb's principal slaves, and possessed the employment of Teshîdâr, that is, great butler, or cup-bearer; on whose death the Soltân gave it to Bustekkîn: and, because the revenues of Karazm, a country on the east side of the Caspian sea, were annexed to that office, he easily obtained the government of that province. His son Kothbo'ddin succeeded him in all his places. As he was a man of spirit and valour, his credit grew so much during the reigns of Barkiarok and Sanjar, that he obtained the title of Karazm Shâb, that is, king of Kharazm, which descended to all his posterity, in that great monarchy of which he was the founder, and which proved at length the ruin of the Seljûkian dynasty of Irân, to which they owed their rise. However Kothbo'ddin, though very powerful, never departed from his obedience to the Soltâns; and, for thirty years, he did his duty of cup-bearer at court every second year, being relieved every other year by his son Atsiz ^o.

In the year 524, Sanjar passed the Jibûn, into Mawarâ'lnabr, to reduce Abmed Ebn Soleymân, governor of Samarkand, who refused to pay the usual tribute. Being obliged to surrender after a vigorous siege, the Soltân spared his life, only depriving him of the government, which he gave to one of his slaves: but Abmed, finding means to get into Sanjar's favour, was in a little time restored. After this Babrâm Shâb, Soltân of the Gazni family, whose kingdom extended from the province of Gazna, to the east of Khorasân, a great way into Hindostân, had a mind also to shake off the yoke of the Seljûkians. Hereupon, in 530, the Soltân entered his dominions with a large army: but Babrâm, not being able to resist so great a force, sent ambassadors to pay the tribute, and do homage for his crown, by which means he diverted the storm ^p.

(S) According to Abu'lfaraj, and the Lebtarîkh, this war began in the year of the Hejrah 513, of Christ 1119.

(T) In another place of D'Herbelot, p. 537, art. Mahmûd, it is said that he was made Sanjar's governor, and lieutenant-general, in both the Irâks; and p. 185, art. Barkiarok, the title of lieutenant-general is given him, as the signification of Atabek. The Lebtarîkh says, that Sanjar restored to him Irâk, as far as the borders of the Roman empire and Syria.

(X) This is the same mentioned by R. Benjamin, the lying Jew, in his travels, who calls him Senigar Shâb, son of Shâb (1), that is, Mulîk Shâb.

a favour at court, he got leave to retire to his government, where the people were inclined to revolt. The Soltân, at his departure, saying to those about him, I see the back of a man, whose face it is likely I never shall see again; they advised him to have him arrested: but Sanjar would not consent; alleging, that he should violate the acknowledgements due both to him and his father, for their services, if he should do any thing to offend him on a bare suspicion.

ATSÎZ verified the Soltân's prognostic; for he no sooner arrived in Karazm, than he put himself at the head of the rebels: so that Sanjar was obliged to reduce by force an enemy, whom he had suffered to escape, by having more regard to the maxims of amity than those of policy.

However, the expedition did not give him much trouble; for advancing in 533, with superior forces, he put the rebels to flight: and Il Kiliç, son of Atsîz, being taken, was put to death. The troubles in Karazm being thus effectually suppressed, Sanjar gave the government of it to his nephew Soleymân Shâh. But as he left him only a few forces, he was soon obliged to quit it to Atsîz; who advancing with a considerable army, re-entered Karazm. And this year is reckoned for the commencement of the dynasty of the Karazm Shâhs, or sovereigns in a proper sense ^a.

b Two years after, Samarkand rebelled again, in opposition to the governor; who, being afflicted with the palsy, was not able to act. The Soltân marched against them; and, after a siege of six months, the city surrendered; but Sanjar spared the inhabitants, according to his usual clemency; and displacing the feeble father, gave the government of the place to his son.

c DURING the Soltân's stay at Samarkand, he was solicited by some lords of his court to bend his arms against Gurjîsh, king of Karakatay (Y); alleging the glory that would arise from the conquest of a country deemed in a manner inaccessible. Sanjar, prevailed on by their instances, marched on that side (Z); but Gurjîsh advancing with his forces, cut in pieces 30,000 of the Soltân's troops, and seized his camp, where was all his equipage, and Haram, or women; among whom was Tarkhân Khatûn, his principal queen. Sanjar, in this distress, picked out 300 of his bravest men, and made his way through the middle of his enemies, in order to reach Termed (A), where he arrived with only twelve or fifteen followers. The rest of his scattered troops repairing thither by degrees, he passed with them into Khorasân, quite ashamed of his expedition; which convinced his people that he was not invincible, as before they thought him to be ^r.

d ATSÎZ continuing more and more to encroach on the Soltân's authority, he found himself obliged, a second time, to take the field against him; and, in 538, having reduced several passes and strong places in the way, came and besieged him in his capital city. Atsîz finding himself reduced to the last extremity, sent very rich presents to Sanjar, intreating pardon, which was granted by the generous Soltân: who, on his taking a new oath of fidelity, left him in possession of his government. But all this clemency had no effect on the ambitious mind of Atsîz. Sanjar, receiving advice from several parts that he was raising forces, and paid no regard to his orders, sent Adibfâber, one of his great lords, to inform himself of the conduct of Atsîz; who, on his arrival in Karazm, set guards over him, and sent assassins to Marû to kill the Soltân. But Adib coming to the knowledge hereof, gave notice to Sanjar; so that the bravoës were discovered, and put to death. Atsîz, concluding that the intelligence came from that lord, had him thrown head-long from the top of his castle into the Jihûn, or Amû.

e IN 542, the Soltân undertook once more to punish the treason of Atsîz; and invested Hazar Asb, the strongest place in Karazm, where Atsîz shut himself up; and, after making a vigorous defence, had the good luck to escape; the city having been taken at length by storm. Sanjar followed him to the city of Karazm, which he might soon have taken; but whether weary of the fatigues attending the camp, or through his aversion to shed blood, he listened to proposals of peace, negotiated by a Darwîsh, or religious man; by whose management Atsîz was obliged only to repair to the side of the Jihûn, opposite to the Soltân's camp, and there prostrating himself, kiss the earth. Atsîz came to the place appointed; but, without alighting off his horse, only stooped forward, and bowed his head to salute the Soltân; who, for all this arrogance, sent him the pardon he had promised: after which all hostilities ceased between them, till the time of the death of Atsîz, which happened in 551, the year before that of the Soltân ^s.

f ONE of the most remarkable events in the Soltân's reign is the signal victory, which, in 544, he obtained over Hussèyn Jèhânsûz, Soltân of the dynasty of Gaur, a country lying between between that of Gazna and Khorasân. *Hussey*n having entered this last province with a great army, in order to conquer it, Sanjar marched his troops, and, defeating them, took both him and Ali Cheteri, his general, prisoners. As Ali was born in the dominions of Sanjar, and had formerly been loaded with favours by him, that prince put him to death for his ingratitude; but soon after sent home *Hussey*n to govern Gaur under his authority.

Escapes by stratagem.

IN 548 the Soltân was led, against his inclination, to chastise the Turkmâns, who refused to pay the usual tribute of sheep (B); when his army was defeated, and himself taken prisoner by that rabble, to the great dishonour of the house of Seljûk; which was so much revered by all the Turkish nation (C). These Turkmâns, not knowing what to do with the person of so great a prince, placed him in the day-time on a throne, and shut him up at night in an iron cage. He spent four years in this confinement; till the Soltâna Tarkhan Khatûn, who governed in his absence, happening to die in 551, he resolved to deliver himself out of the hands of the Turkmâns.

To bring this about, he employed Amîr Elias, one of his confidants; who carrying on a correspondence with Abmed Komaj, governor of Termed, got him to provide boats ready in the river, against the Soltân passed by in hunting. This stratagem succeeded to Sanjar's wishes; and the governor, after entertaining him magnificently at his castle, gathered what troops he could, who conducted him to Marû, then the capital of Khorasân, where he usually resided. But the Soltân found that city, and all the country through which he passed, in so bad a condition, on account of the incursions which the Turkmâns had made during his absence, that he fell into a deep melancholy, and afterwards into a distemper (D) of which he died in the year 552^e.

Hej. 552.
A. D. 1157.

His death.

ACCORDING to the Lebtarîkh, the Soltân lived seventy-two years, and reigned sixty-two, in which must be understood to be included the twenty years, which the same author says he reigned in Khorasân before the death of Mohammed his predecessor.

Extensive dominions.

HE extended his empire from Katay and Kotan (E), to the end of Syria and Egypt, and from the sea of Khozâr, or the Caspian, to Yamman, or Arabia felix.

His character.

HE fought nineteen battles, of which he gained seventeen: was much feared by all; and famous for liberality and clemency to his subjects. He was diligent in matters of government, but hated kingly pride; wearing a coat of skins^u. Yet the Karazm Shab's serving the office of cup-bearer to him, is produced as an argument of the magnificence with which he lived.

Greatly beloved.

ALL the oriental historians praise this prince for his valour and justice, magnanimity and goodness. As a proof of this, they write, that he was so well beloved by his subjects, that they continued to publish his name in the temples for a whole year after his death, as if he had been still alive, and on the throne. They gave him also the surname of Esikander Tbani, that is, Alexander the second: and his name of Sanjar has passed for that of Alexander among his posterity^x.

IT is remarked that this Soltân established Saad Ebn Zenghi (F), who had been his governor, lieutenant-general of all his dominions, under the title of Atabek; which title signifying father of the prince (G), and given to the tutors or governors of the Seljûkian princes, became afterwards a title of dignity.

Reign of the Seljûks.

AFTER Sanjar's death, Mabmûd, his sister's son, by Mohammed Khân, descended from Bagra Khân, succeeded in Khorasân. But at the end of five years, one of his lords (H) revolted from him, and, after several battles, seized his dominions, and deprived him of sight. The Soltân of Karazm, whose dynasty rose during the reign of Sanjar, taking advantage of these divisions in Khorasân, made himself master of one part of that great province, while the other

(B) The cause of this war is represented somewhat differently in the Lebtarîkh. According to this author, the Gâz, or Turkmâns, crossing the Jibûn towards the end of Sanjar's reign, suffered great misery: yet the king resolved to march against them. The Gâz begged peace in the most suppliant manner; each family offering a piece of silver, with which the Soltân was content: but the grandees obstructing the treaty, the Gâz were attacked.

(C) This event, in the article of Atsiz, is placed in the beginning of Sanjar's reign; but on whose authority does not appear: for though D'Herbelot quotes Kondamîr, it is along with other authors, at the end of the whole article, and not at the particular facts or paragraphs, as he does in other articles. It is there said that Atsiz governed the state, in conjunction with Mabmûd, Sanjar's nephew, during the Soltân's captivity.

(D) According to the Nighiariştân (·) and Abûlfaraj, it was the cholic, attended with a looseness and vomiting.

(E) This is straining things too far; for, instead of conquering, he was defeated by the Karakitayans, as before related.

(F) This must have been Omado'ddin Zenghi, the first Atabek of Irâk, in 521, or the Modhaffero'ddin Moshaker, first Atabek of Pârs, or proper Persia, in 543, both being established during Sanjar's reign. He seems to have been the first; but D'Herbelot is very confused on this head. See the articles Atabek, Saad ben Mozaffer, and Salgar Shâb.

a remained in possession of the rebels (I). So that the Seljukian Soltâns, who still reigned in both the Irâks, no longer had any footing in Khorasân ^r.

We must now turn back to these Soltâns; the first of whom, Mogayatho'ddîn Mahmûd ^{extinct in Ebn Mohammed}, though beginning his reign at the same time with his uncle Sanjar, and dying ^{Khorasân} twenty-seven years before him (K), is yet reckoned his successor: Mahmûd, Sanjar's sister's son, before-mentioned, not being put in the list of Soltâns.

(I) The Lebtarîk says, the Soltâns of Gaur had also a part.

(K) Here we must take notice of a great mistake in Kondamîr, or his extractor D'Herbelot, who, in the article of Mahmûd, p. 537. says, he resided fourteen years in Irâk, as governor under Sanjar; but that, on the Soltân's death, he was proclaimed by the people for his fine qualities; yet in the same page (article Mohammed Khân), makes Mahmûd, the son of this latter, to succeed him twenty-six years after.

S E C T. IX.

b IT hath been observed before, in the reign of Sanjar, that Mahmûd, son of his brother Mohammed, surnamed Mogayatho'ddîn Abu'l-kassim, by the agreement made between them ^{Seventh Soltân, Mahmûd.} in 513 (A), was left in possession of the Persian and Arabian Irâks, with the countries westward thereof; tho', according to Kondamîr, he was only Sanjar's governor and lieutenant-general, yet he seems to have acted independently of him: nor does it appear that his uncle exercised any power within his dominions. It is true, none of the authors before us give any account of this Soltân's transactions, after his agreement with Sanjar. D'Herbelot's extracts from Kondamîr, and other oriental authors, end there ^{Defect of authors.}. Teixeira was in such haste to finish his abstract of Mirkhond, that he would scarce allow himself to look into the history of the Seljukian Soltâns, or even to know their names. The Lebtarîk only says, that Mahmûd married c two of Sanjar's daughters, and fought two battles with his brother Massûd, whom he defeated both times. In short, the particulars collected by Abû'l-faraj, relate almost solely to the affairs of Mesopotamia and Syria; which, in effect, are all the materials we have towards the history of this Soltân's reign.

THAT author informs us, agreeable to the account given by the western historians, that, in the year 512, as Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, was swimming in the Nile at Balbays, in Egypt, a wound, which he formerly had received, opened; whereupon returning to Jerusalem, he there died, after having recommended the care of his kingdom to Al Comes (B), lord of Roha. ^{Death of Baldwin. Hej. 512. A. D. 1118.}

d IN 514 the Gorj, or Korj, who are the same with the Khozars, the Kassâks, and other nations, invading the Mohammedan countries, Al Anîr Ilgâzi, lord of Mardin, Dobays ebn Sadeka, lord of Hellah, and king of Togrol (C), to whom belonged Arrân and Nakhjawân, advanced to meet them as far as Teflis, with 30,000 men. The armies being drawn up to battle, there came forth 200 Kassâks, who, as the Moslems thought, intended to surrender themselves: instead of that, they attacked their front so vigorously with arrows, as put them into disorder; which those in the rear taking for a flight, fled with such precipitation, that they stumbled over one another. The Gorj pursuing for twelve Persian leagues, slew most of them, and took 4000 prisoners; but king Togrol, Ilgâzi, and Dobays, escaped. The Gorj returning, besieged Teflis; and, after harrassing the inhabitants, took that city next year by storm. ^{The Gorj, or Khozars, invade the Seljûks.}

c IN 515 Soleyman, son of Ilgâzi, being just turned of twenty, rebelled against his father; but the latter coming upon him unexpectedly, seized those who had set him on, and punished them. Among the rest he ordered one Nafr, a commander brought up by his father Ortok, to have his eyes plucked out, and tongue cut off. He condemned another, whom he had made governor of Halep, first to be deprived of sight, and then to have his hands and feet chopped off, which occasioned his death. ^{Affairs of Syria.}

SOLEYMAN was brought before him drunk; but he was restrained from killing him, by natural affection. After this he fled to Damaskus; and Ilgâzi made Soleymân, son of his brother Abdo'ljabbar, governor of Halep, and named him Badro'ddawlat; after which he returned to Mardin.

A. D. 1124. Next year he took Manbej, but was slain by an arrow (E), in attacking the castle. Hereupon his army dispersed; and Okfenkar al Borsiki took Halep, as the Franks did Sûr, or Tyre.

Okfenkar assassinated. TOWARDS the end of the year 520, Okfenkar, lord of Musol, was assassinated in the royal temple of that city by the Batânists, and his son Ezzo'ddin Massûd took possession without opposition. The historian wonders how Ezzo'ddin should be informed of his father's death b by the lord of Antiokh (F), before a courier brought him the news: but Abû'lfaraj observes, that it was sooner known to the Franks, by the care they took to learn the state of affairs among the Moslems b.

Atabeks of Irâk. THE year 521 is remarkable for being the first of the dynasty of the Atabeks of Irâk, founded by Omado'ddin Zengbi (G), son of Okfankar, or Aksunkar, who was established in the government of the city of Baghdâd, by Soltân Mahmûd. His brother Ezzo'ddin Massûd dying the same year, Omado'ddin became possessed of Musol, and its dependencies. Next year he took Halep, with its castle; and the year following, the city of Hamab c.

Egyptian Khalifah assassinated. IN 524 Al Amir Beabkâmillab Abuali, lord of Egypt (H), was assassinated by the Batânists, as he returned from taking a walk. The same year there were seen at Baghdâd scorpions c with wings, and a double sting.

The Soltân dies. THE next year proved fatal to Soltân Mahmûd, who died at Hamadân, in Shawal, or the tenth month, having lived about twenty-seven years (I), and reigned thirteen d.

His character. HE was a handsome personage, and very generous; but the love of women, and hunting, by degrees, impaired his character. It is reported, that his hunting-equipage was so magnificent, that he kept 400 greyhounds and blood-hounds, each of which wore a collar set with jewels, and a covering edged with gold and pearls. He laid out so much in this expence, that he often wanted money to pay his troops, and for other occasions e. Yet he did not fleece his subjects to recruit his coffers: he likewise restrained his favourites from doing them any injury. He was merciful, good-natured, and prudent. He forbore to punish those who d spoke ill of him. No prince ever studied the art of reigning more. He was skilled in grammar, poetry, and chronology (K); was very eloquent, and wrote a fine hand f.

Eighth Soltân, Togrol. MAHMUD left for his successor his brother Togrol, surnamed Rokno'ddin (L); but his brother Massûd disputed the crown with him; and several battles were fought between them, in the space of three or four years, which he reigned. According to Kondamîr, he was the second Soltân of a branch of the Seljûkians who reigned in Persian and Arabian Irâk: which confirms our remark, that the agreement made between Sanjar and Mahmûd contained a division of the Seljûkian empire of Irâk, or Persia at large. However, it does not appear that oriental historians consider them as two separate monarchies, but as one and the same; making Mahmûd, the predecessor of Togrol, the successor of Sanjar; though both died some years before him, as e hath been already observed g.

His reign short. THIS Soltân, according to Abû'lfaraj, before he came to the throne, possessed the province of Arrân and Natchjawân (M). But the authors before us give no account of the transactions of his reign, excepting Abû'lfaraj; whose memoirs, in the preceding reign, are confined to Mesopotamia and Syria.

(D) A question may here arise, whether Soltân Sanjar, or Soltân Mahmûd, is to be understood?

(E) Fulcher Carnotens. says, Balak was slain in the battle against Josceline; that 3000 men were slain, and his head sent to Antiokh.

(F) Baldwin, king of Jerusalem, was at this time in possession of Antiokh, though he restored it to Boamond the younger the same year.

(G) He is, by the historians of the crusade, called Sanguin, which is a corruption of Zengbi.

(H) He was the tenth Khalifah of Egypt, of the family of Fatmah. They are called lords of Egypt, by the historians who lived within the dominions of the princes subject to the Khalifah of Baghdâd, because they acknowledged no other Khalifah.

(I) Our authors differ here: D'Herbelot, who quotes Kondamîr, says, he either governed or reigned alone twenty-seven years: the Lebtarîkh, that he lived but twenty-five years, yet puts his birth in 487, which extends his life to thirty-eight years: perhaps it should be 497, and that will bring it to twenty-eight. The numbers in this author are very incorrect; and D'Herbelot seems to make use of them sometimes, without quoting him; and even to substitute them for those of Kondamîr. In this uncertainty we must make Abû'lfaraj our guide, since Ebn Amîd has failed us.

(K) We were unwilling to fully so good a character, by inserting in the text, that he made a collection of the interpretations of dreams.

(L) According to the Lebtarîkh, his name is Rokno'ddin Abu'l Mutafer Togrol Bek. We are the more exact in giving the several names, because some authors mention only one, some another; which frequently confounds readers.

(M) Commonly called Nakhjuwân, Nakhchuwân, and Nakhjivân, in Armenia.

- a THIS annalist informs us, that in the year 526, Soltân Sanjar wrote (N) to Omâdo'ddîn Zengbi (Atabek of Irâk Arabi) and Dobays Ebn Sadekah (lord of Hellab), commanding them to march into Irâk, against the Khalifah Al Mostarshed. Accordingly they went, and encamped in a place called Manariyah, which belongs to Dojayl (O). The Khalifah Al Mostarshed, passing over to the west side (of the Tigris), pitched his tents in Al Abbasiya. The armies met in Hadra al Barâmakeh (P); when Zengbi, attacking the right wing of the Khalifah, where was Jamâl oddawlat Akbal, put them to flight. At the same time the Khalifah, supported by Nasr al Khadem (the eunuch), who commanded his left wing, fell on the right wing of Omâdo'ddîn and Dobays; and after a sharp conflict, put them to flight; killing and taking many of their men^s. The same year the Atabek al Shabîd recovered Moarrab Al Nomân, in Syria, from the Franks^h.

Hereupon Zengbi, arresting him, treated him very ill. Al Mostarshed, incensed hereat, departed from Baghdâd with 30,000 men; and, approaching Musol, Zengbi marched out of the city with part of his forces, leaving the rest under the command of his deputy Nasîro'ddîn, whom the Khalifah besieged; and, while he pressed the place closely without, a gang of plaisterers, or workers in lime and mortar, within, agreed to betray it to him: but being discovered, and executed, he retired, after three months leaguer to little purpose; and next year a peace was concluded between him and the *Atabek*ⁱ.

- c SOLTÂN Togrol died at Hamadân, in the first month of the year 529; lived twenty-five years, and reigned three. He was just and valiant, good-natured and liberal. He understood the art of governing, and did nothing unbecoming a prince^k.

MASSUD (P), surnamed Gayatho'ddîn Abû'lfetab, was at Baghdâd when his brother Togrol died: and while his friends sent a courier to hasten him up to Hamadân, then the capital of the Seljuikians of Irâk, the court party dispatched another to Dawd, son of Togrol, with the same view: but the uncle happening to get the start of the nephew, Massûd was unanimously saluted Soltân by the grandees, and Dawd no more thought ofⁱ.

- d HE was scarce seated on the throne, before he found himself obliged to make war on Al Mostarshed, twenty-ninth Khalifah of Baghdâd, of the family of Al Abbâs. It seems that, in the reign of Togrol, Dobays Ebn Sadekah, who was governor-general of Irâk Arabi for the Khalifah, plotted with that Soltân to surprize him in Baghdâd. But Togrol falling ill of a burning fever, hindered the execution: Al Mostarshed's army also got the better. This war lasted till Massûd came to the crown; when the Khalifah, at the instance of some court lords, had his name suppressed in the public prayers, and even deprived him of the title of Soltân.

- e MASSUD, being informed of this injury, set out instantly from Ray, where he resided, at the head of a powerful army, for the Arabian Irâk; from whence the Khalifah advanced, accompanied by a great number of his grandees. The two armies came to a battle in the seventh month of the year 529; when the Khalifah's left wing deserting to the Soltân, he was surrounded and taken; while his right wing, after a slight opposition, fled. After this defeat, Baghdâd opened its gates to Massûd without opposition. The Soltân having had another war in his head, carried Mostarshed with him into the province of Adherbijân. Being arrived at Marâgha, the Khalifah was confined in a tent, at a distance from the army, near the gate of that city: where messengers passed between him and the Soltân, relating to peace. At length it was agreed, that Al Mostarshed, besides paying yearly 400,000 crowns in gold, should remain in Baghdâd, and not raise any other troops besides his ordinary guards.

- f AFTER this agreement, that prelate was suffered to ride on horseback, with the covering of a saddle (Q) carried before him, in token of honour. In short, he was ready to return to Baghdâd, when news being brought that an ambassador was arrived from Soltân Sanjar, the people followed Massûd to meet him, and among the rest some of those who had the care of the Khalifah. Twenty-four Batanists took this opportunity to get into his tent, and murder him, by giving him above twenty wounds; then cutting off his nose and ears, left him naked, where he remained till the citizens of Marâgha buried him. Many believe, with good rea-

(N) If the name of Sanjar be not put here by mistake for that of Togrol, then the Soltâns of Irâk must have been dependent on him; and his successor Massûd, as well as his predecessor Mahmûd, must have done every thing they did by his orders or consent.

ment with him, on the terms above-mentioned, only to cover his design.

Dobays slain. NOT long after this, as Dobays ibn Sadekab was stooping, with his fingers on the ground, before his tent, near the city of Kbunej, a young Armenian, employed by the Soltân, cut off his head: for Massûd was jealous of his power, and had only made use of him as an instrument to oppose Al Mostafshed^m.

The provinces revolt. THE year following, the kings and lords of the provinces, assembled at Baghdâd, threw off their obedience to Soltân Massûd. On this, Dawd (or David), son of Soltân Mahmûd (R), marched from Adherbijân, followed by Omâdo'ddin Zenghi, from Musol to Baghdâd, where he was prayed for in the pulpits (S). The Soltân on this news hastens to that city, and besieges it: but finding, after fifty days leaguer, that he could do nothing against it, resolved to return to Hamadîn. He was actually on the road, when Tarentây, lord of Wâset, arriving with a great number of barks, he returned to the siege. At the same time, the princes who had assembled at Baghdâd falling out among themselves, king Dawd returned home, and the rest dispersed. The Khalîfah Al Râshed, with a few followers, passed over to Zenghi, who was on the west side (of the river), and retired with him to Musol.

Massûd enters Baghdad. HEREUPON Soltân Massûd, entering Baghdâd, fixed his seat there: then, assembling the judges, witnesses, and those learned in the laws, he laid before them the oath which Al Râshed had made to him, in his own hand-writing: I, in case I shall assemble forces, march out, or put to the sword any of Soltân Massûd's adherents, depose myself from the empire. Accordingly he was, by their sentence, deposed; and his name suppressed every-where in the pulpits, before he had reigned twelve months.

Deposits the Khalifah. Then the Soltân called another council, who, after declaring Al Râshed unworthy of the Khalîfat, elected Al Moktafi Beamrillah, son of Al Mostadber (or Al Mostadhaber), who was his friend. The deposed Khalîfah, leaving Musol, in 531, went to Hamadîn, where king Dawd then was; and from thence to Ispâhân, where he was slain by some of his domesticks (T), at noon, while he took a nap, after his recovery from a fit of sickness; being forty years of age. He was buried at Shâbrestân, without *Ispâhân*ⁿ.

A good minister. MASSUD, understanding that the governor of Pârs (or Proper Persia) made some difficulty to acknowledge Moktafi, the new Khalîfah, he sent his brother Seljûk Shâh, with the Atabek Karasankar, to bring him to his duty. But the Atabek had no sooner made one day's march, than he sent the Soltân word he would proceed no farther, unless he sent him Pîr Mohammed Khâzen, his prime Wazîr, whose death he sought. This Wazîr managed state affairs very well; but disgusted the courtiers by too firm and haughty a carriage. Massûd could not consent at first to so unreasonable a demand; but, as Karasankar had all his forces at his devotion, he was obliged at last to send him the Wazîr's head.

THE Atabek being satisfied, returned to his duty; but did not long enjoy the fruit of his revenge; for he died a few days after he had gotten rid of his enemy. The Soltân gave his command to Ildighîz, with the almost absolute government of Adherbijân (of which he was the first Atabek (U), and that of Kurdestân. He likewise gave him in marriage his sister-in-law, who had been promised formerly to Soltân Togrol, his brother and predecessor. Soon after this, Abbâs, governor of the city of Ray, with some other conspirators, rose, in favour of Soleymân Shâh, brother of Massûd, and set him on the throne. But this plot was soon quashed: after which the Soltân remained in peaceable possession till his death^v.

The Atabek Zenghi. As this is all we find in our authors relating to the remainder of his reign, we shall supply the defect with the Atabeks of Irâk, who resided at Musol, or Mosûl, and are called lords of that city, and of Syria.

Hej. 532. A.D. 1137. baul'd in marriage. In the year 532, the Atabek Omâdo'ddin Zenghi made a progress into Syria; and, on his arrival at Hamâh, sent to Shehabo'ddin, lord of Damaskus, desiring that he might marry his mother Zamorrod Khatûn, daughter of Al Jaweli; the same lady who built the college out of Damaskus, near the river Barada. By this means Hems, and its castle, came into his possession. His motive to the marriage was, that as the affairs of Damaskus seemed to be under her direction, he was in hopes thereby to gain the country: but, when he found himself disappointed in his expectations, he went away, and left her behind.

(R) Kondamîr, in D'Herbelot, calls him the son of Mohammed. For all this disagreement, he is doubtless the Dawd who is said before to have been a son of Togrol, and whom a court party would have advanced, in opposition to Massûd. According to the same author, this war was occasioned by the Soltân sending to demand of Al Râshed the sum which his father had promised to pay yearly. D'Herb. p. 710, art. Râshed.

(S) And, according to Kondamîr, had the title of Soltân given him by the Khalîfah.

a NEXT year, he took Baalbek (X) (in Syria); and, the year following, Shabrazîr, with its Takes several territory. In 539, he rescued Roba (or Edeffa) out of the hands of the Franks (Y); and laid Hejrah 539. A. D. 1144 siege to the strong castle of Bîr (Z): but when he had near taken it, an express arriving, with an account that Nasîro'ddîn, his deputy in Musol, was slain, he departed. However, the Franks, fearing his return, sent for Nojmo'ddîn (A), lord of Mârdîn, and delivered it up to him. Next year, while he was besieging the castle of Jabar (B), certain slaves slew him (C), in the night, Killed by slaves. and fled to the castle. The besieged on this, rejoicing, called out to let the army know their commander was slain; accordingly, entering his tent, they found him breathing his last. He was more than sixty years old when he died; behaved with great gravity both towards his army and his subjects; and was perfectly skilled in the art of governing. The city of Musol (D), before he took it, was, for the most part, destroyed; and the adjacent country, which now abounds with fruits and odoriferous plants, was the most barren in the world.

b NURO'DDÎN (E) Mahmûd, who was in the camp when his father was slain, drawing the ring off his finger, went straight to Halep; and, taking possession of it, remained there; while his brother Mahmûd Sayfo'dâîn Gazi, hastening from Shabrazîr, which had been assigned him, entered Musol; and Hejrah 541. A. D. 1149. thus became lord of that city, with Al Jazîreh (or Mesopotamia). He died there, after he had reigned three years, and was succeeded by his brother Kotbo'ddîn Maîddûd. His elder brother, Nûro'ddîn Mahmûd, who possessed Halep and Hamâb, in Syria, marching into Al Jazîreh, took settles in Senjâr, without any opposition, from Kot o'ddîn: but peace afterwards being concluded between Syria them, Nûro'ddîn resigned Senjâr, and took in lieu of it Hems and Rababa (F), in Syria. The same year, he invaded the Franks about Antiokh, and defeated them, after a bloody battle, in which the prince of that city was slain (G). His son Baymond (Boamond) succeeding, who being but an infant, his mother governed the kingdom during his minority.

c IN 546, Nûro'ddîn invaded the territories of Jûsîn (or Joscelin) (H), which lay to the north Defeated by of Halep; and being met by that wise and valiant knight (I), was defeated, after a fierce battle, and his armour-bearer taken; whom Jûsîn sent with Nûro'ddîn's arms to king Massûd Ebn Hej. 546. A. D. 1151. Kelî Arslân, lord of Koniya and A'sara; saying, This is your son-in-law's armour-bearer: after him, something more will come to you. Nûro'ddîn, greatly incensed at this conduct of Jûsîn, resolved to be revenged on him. Accordingly, sending for some of the chiefs of the Turkmâns, he, by large gifts, engaged them to seize Jûsîn, knowing he was not able to cope with him in battle.

d The Turkmâns therefore keeping a watchful eye upon him, surprized him one day as he was hunting, and brought him bound to Nûro'ddîn (K); who immediately thereupon went and Got him seized. took the castles of Ayn tâb, Azâz, Kûres, Al Râwandân, Borjo'l refâs (L), Dolûk, Marash, Nabro'l Jawr, and others belonging to Jûsîn.

THE year following, viz. 547, Soltân Massûd died at Ilâmâdân, after he had lived forty-five Massûd dies. years, and reigned eighteen, with six months over.

THIS prince was a great lover of pious and learned men; humble and affable: but, for religion, clemency, justice, and bravery, superior to all the Seljûkiâns. He often defeated armies at the first onset, and killed lions with one stroke. He frequently, when a boy, was in battles, and fought himself. He always came off victor in the wars with his brothers. The people lived His character. in great ease during his reign. He disregarded treasures, giving them among his courtiers; which was the reason that he almost always wanted money, and left none in the treasury.

e MASSUD was the last of these Soltâns who had any power in the Arabian Irâk; for, upon Seljûk domi- his demise, Moktafi, thirty-first Khalîfah of Baghdâd, of the family of Abbâs, deprived the nions. jûkiâns of all authority in that city. For this reason Ebn Shobnah makes this dynasty to end in the year 547; which was also fatal to the race of Gazni Soltâns.

IN the time of Massûd also a new dynasty of Atabeks arose, which carried away part of his Atabeks of dominions: for the Salgariâns, or family of Salgar, invading Pars, or Proper Persia, assumed Pârs.

The famous Togray.

WE should rob this reign of one of its greatest ornaments, should we omit to mention the famous Mowiado'ddîn abu Ismâil ebn Ali, surnamed Togray, who was reckoned the most excellent writer of his time (M), both in verse or prose. A celebrated poem of his, called Lamîyat al Ajem (because the last consonant of each rhyme is a Lam, or L), has been published by Dr. Pocock, with a Latin translation, under the title of Carmen Togray. According to Ebn Shohnab, he was first employed at court by Soltân Malek Shâb, and Maffûd made him his Wazîr (N): but being taken prisoner in the battle which that prince had with his brother Mahmûd, in 513, he lost his head; the Soltân alleging, that *he knew him to be an infidel, and a wicked man*². But Ebn Khalikan says, he was put to death by Mahmûd's Wazîr (or Vizier) *for no other cause, but that they feared him on account of his excellent virtues*³.

The reigns of Malek Shâh II. Mohammed Soleyman Shâh, Arslân, and Togrol, in whom the dynasty ended.

Tenth Soltân, Malek
Shâh II.

MALEK SHAH II. surnamed Mogayabo'ddîn (A) was, according to Kondamîr, the son of a Mohammed, son of Malek Shâb I. But Abu'l-faraj and the Lebtarîkh say that he was the son of Mahmud, son of Mohammed, and, consequently, great grandson of the first Malek Shâb. He succeeded his uncle Maffûd: but his reign was of no long continuance, as having been wholly unworthy of the crown; for he minded nothing but indulging his appetite (B), and left affairs intirely to his ministers.

Is deposed

by Kasbek.

NOTWITHSTANDING his incapacity, he grew jealous of the authority of Khasbek, surnamed Belingberi, who had been in great esteem with Maffûd, and passed for one of the most valiant men of his time. Malek Shâb wanted to have him arrested: but as the whole court thought such a proceeding unjust, Hassan Kandar, who was one of Khasbek's best friends, resolved to prevent the blow; and, under pretence of giving the Soltân a grand entertainment, kept him b three days in a continual debauch, in the midst of which he seized his person, and shut him up in the castle of Hamadân. After which they sent for his brother Mohammed, who was then in Kbuzestân, and set him in his place. Some time after, Malek Shâb, finding means to escape out of prison, fled to the province from whence his brother had been called to the throne; where he remained till the death of Mohammed, in the end of the year 554: when, hastening to Isfâhân, he re-ascended the throne; but enjoyed it only a few days, dying in the beginning of the year 555, at the age of thirty-two^b. According to the Lebtarîkh, he reigned the first time four months; and the second no more than nine days.

Khalifah
shakes off

yoke.

It is proper to take notice here, that as the Khalifah Moktafi owed his elevation to the credit and authority of Maffûd, he had no share in the government of his state during the life of that Soltân; but, after his death, he resumed the authority, and quite excluded that of the Seljûkians; for he would not allow Malek Shâb to have any power or command in the Soltânat of Baghdâd; but remained sole master in his dominions, which comprehended Babylonish Irâk (C), and Arabia: in short, it was under this Khalifah that the power of the Seljûkians, who had been masters of all the forces and possessions of the Khalifahs, began to decline, and, by degrees, became extinct^c. On this occasion Abu'l-faraj observes, that Al Moktafi was the first who reigned in Irâk Arabi without a Soltân, and governed his armies, as well as subjects, according to his own will (D), since the time that the Mamlûks, or slaves (E), first usurped power over the Khalifahs, under Al Mostansir^d (F).

(F) It should be Al Montasser, who was the eleventh Khalifah of the Abbâs family; under whom the Turkish militia began to usurp authority over the Khalifahs.

a As Khasbek, who was the chief instrument of the advancement of Mohammed, furnished Eleventh Gayatho'ddîn, would needs have the intire government of the state at his own disposal; and as Soltân, Mo- that lord's credit, as well as riches, rendered him powerful; Mohammed II. Mohammed soon perceived that he could never reign with authority, so long as such a person was alive. For this reason he resolved to get rid of him, according to the advice of one of his ministers; who, alluding to the youth of the prince, and age of Khasbek, told him, that no new branches shot from the foot of the vine, till the old ones were cut away.

UPON his death (G) the Soltân became possessed of all the wealth which he had amassed, Slays Khas- during the time that he had the management of the treasury. It is remarked, as a thing extra- bek. b ordinary, that he had in his wardrobe an infinite number of very precious moveables (H), among which were 13,000 scarlet and purple vests.

HOWEVER, the death of Khasbek had like to have been the ruin of Mohammed: for that great lord had made powerful friends at court, who were resolved to revenge it. With that intent the Atabek Ildigbîz (I), and Aksînkôr, lord of Marâgha, having revolted, deposed Mohammed, and proclaimed his uncle Soleyman Shâh, son of Mohammed I. The young unexperienced Soltân was so frightened at this news, that not knowing whether to fight or accommodate matters, Flies for fear. he fled to Ispâhân, while Soleyman Shâh took peaceable possession of his capital Hamadân.

THE new prince might have preserved the crown with as much ease as he obtained it, if he Soleyman had not been intirely destitute of counsel, and very unhappy in his conduct. Among other indif- Shâh ad- c crete actions, he took the employment of the great chamberlain from Mohammed Karazm Shâh vanced. (K), and gave it to Alp Argûn: he likewise turned out his Wazîr Fakro'ddîn Kashi, and put Abû'Inejib in his place. These two great officers, to revenge their disgrace, plotted to restore Mohammed: but as that could not be done without deposing Soleyman Shâh, and the militia seemed to be attached to him, they contrived a stratagem, which succeeded to a wonder.

MOHAMMED KARAZM SHAH tells his sister, who was the Soltân's wife, as a great secret, Flies in his that there was a plot on foot to bring back his nephew; and that her husband's person was to be turn. seized that very night. The too credulous and fearful Soltân, without staying to enquire the least into the matter, immediately mounted horse, with a few of his intimates; and took the road to Mazanderan, a province on the Caspian sea.

d NEXT day every body was strangely surprized to hear of the Soltân's flight. The soldiers immediately mutinied, and running to the palace, plundered it. Mohammed no sooner received Mohammed advice of his uncle's flight, which was so like his own, that he made haste to Hamadân, and returns. re-ascended the vacant throne.

SOLEYMAN SHAH, perceiving too late that he had been duped, resolved to attempt the recovery of his dominions, by the assistance of his friends. The Khalifah Moktafi, and the Atabek Ildigbîz, joined their troops to those which he gathered in Mazanderân: but being met by his nephew Defeats his on the banks of the river Arras, or Araxes, was overthrown, and obliged to retire to Musol. uncle. Mohammed, after this victory, was inclined to have attacked the Khalifah, who gave protection to his uncle: but considering that he had another enemy, his brother Malek Shâh, to fear, he was e obliged to make up matters with Moktafi, who gave him his own daughter in marriage.

THIS princess, named Kermân Khatûn, set forward with a splendid equipage, and the Soltân His death. went to meet her; but an hectic fever which attended him put an end to his life, on the road to Hamadân, in the year 554 (L), after a seven years reign, aged no more than thirty-two.

THIS Soltân has always passed for a most accomplished prince, who possessed all the virtues His character, military and civil. He was a great patron of men of learning, piety and merit: in which, say the historians, he was the very reverse of his brother Malek Shâh.

It is said that this prince quitted life with much reluctance; that, before he expired, he ordered his troops, his court, and all his treasures, to pass before him, as it were in review; and that, after he had considered all these things, he said, How is it possible that a power so great as mine f is not able to lessen the weight of my disorder one single grain, nor prolong my life but for a moment?

He left his dominions to his brother Malek Shâh, who survived him only a few days, as hath been said before. He was succeeded by his uncle Soleyman Shâh, the other competitor of Moham- and successors: med.

SOLEYMAN SHAH, surnamed Moazo'ddin Kassef (M), was the son of Soltân Mohammed, a son of Malek Shâh I. This prince being at Musol when his two predecessors died, the great lords, after some debate among themselves, sent for him, and placed him on the throne. But as he gave himself up intirely to voluptuousness, and the company of women, without minding the affairs of the kingdom, they seized and imprisoned him, at the end of six months; advancing, in his room, his nephew Arslân, in the year 555. Setting aside his bad conduct, for which he was deposed, he did not want some good qualities: he was very familiar with those about him; and excelled as to his behaviour, person, and eloquence. He died in the second month of the year 556, at the age of forty-five^f. This is all the account we have of Soleyman's short reign, and taken from the Lebtarikh; for D'Herbelot says nothing of it. As for Abû'lfaraj, he does not mention the Soltâns of Persian Irâk, after the death of Mohammed II. when the Khalifah b threw off the Seljûk yoke, and resumed the dominion in Irâk Arabi.

ARSLAN was the son of Togrol, son of Mohammed, son of Malek Shâh I. and surnamed Abû'l Modhaffer Zeyno'ddin, according to Kondamîr; but the Lebtarikh styles him Rokno'ddawlat. He is commonly called by historians Malek Arslân. He was proclaimed Soltân in Hamadân, by the influence of the Atabek Ildighîz (N): but from the beginning of his reign, Kimâr, governor of Ispâhân, and Enbanej, or Inanj, governor of Ray, revolted against him; setting up for Soltân one of his cousins, named Mohammed Seljûk Shâh; with whom, at the head of a great army, they advanced to Hamadân. Arslân went to meet them as far as Kazvîn, where he got the victory; for the new Soltân was killed in the battle, and his two supporters fled to Ray, and from thence to Mazanderân.

ARSLAN had no sooner put an end to this war, but he found himself engaged in another; for the prince of the Abkhâz, situated between Georgia and Cherkassia, who was a Christian, entering Adherbijân, ravaged that province as far as Kazvîn. The Soltân, turning his victorious arms on that side, defeated him near the strong castle of Kâk, which he had taken and fortified; but, being afterwards forced by the Seljûk troops, was demolished.

TOWARDS the end of the year 559, Soltân Arslân made a progress to Ispâhân: the Atabek Zengbi Salgari, who commanded in that city, went out to meet him, and took the oath of allegiance. The Soltân confirmed him in his government, of which he extended the bounds as far d as the province of Fârs, or Pârs.

ENBANEJ (O), who still stood out in Mazanderân, in 561 made alliance with the Karazm Shâh, by whom being assisted with a great body of troops, he entered Persian Irâk, and ravaged the country about Abker and Kazvîn: but Arslân, accompanied with the Atabek Ildighîz, coming on him by surprize, obliged him to fly to his old retreat. Two years after, the same rebel, invading the country about Ray, defeated Mohammed, the son of Ildighîz, who was sent against him. Hereupon Ildighîz himself marched; and, being come to that city, made several propositions to Enbanej, who thereupon agreed to go with him, and make his submission to the Soltân: but the night before this ceremony was to be performed, Enbanej was killed in his lodgings. The Soltân, on this news, gave the government of Ray to the son of Ildighîz, who soon e after married the only daughter of Enbanej; the fruit of which was Kutluk (P), surnamed Enbanej.

IN 568 the mother of the Soltân, a princess of great virtue, died in the house of Ildighîz; and this great man followed her not long after. The Soltân himself, afflicted at two such great losses, fell sick of a languishing illness, which yet held him till the year 571, when he died; after he had lived about forty-three years, and reigned about fifteen (Q).

HE was a prince not only valiant and generous, but also patient, and good-natured to such a degree, that he would not suffer any body to be spoken ill of in his presence^g; nor ever treated any of his domestics with severity or contempt; being eminent for modesty and clemency. He never denied any-thing to a man of good address and parts. He was very nice in his diet f and apparel; for he had very rich vests, of every kind and colour, wrought with gold, such as no king before him ever wore. His conversation was familiar, and perfectly sincere^h.

a governed his dominions happily enough, under the direction of his maternal uncle the valiant Mohammed (S), son of the Atabek Ildighîz.

At the beginning of his reign Badanjar attacked the province of Adherbijân; and Mohammed, son of Soltân Togrol ebn Mohammed, that of Persian Irâk: but Mohammed ebn Ildighîz, with his brother Kizil Arslân (T), marching against them at the head of a great army, soon obliged them to sue for peace.

In the tenth year of his reign there was one of those great conjunctions of the seven planets, Grand conjunction, which very rarely happen. It appeared in the third degree of Libra; which, according to the rules of judicial astrology, is a very airy sign. All the astrologers of that time, and among the Hej. 581. A. D. 1185. rest Anvâri, surnamed Hakîm, or the philosopher, foretold, from this phænomenon, that such violent winds would blow the forementioned year, and such dreadful hurricanes arise, that most of the houses in the country would be blown down, and the mountains themselves shaken. These predictions had such an effect on many people, that they provided places under-ground, to retreat from such horrible calamities.

NOTWITHSTANDING all this, to the utter confusion of the astrologers, there did not blow, during the whole time assigned by them, any wind to hinder the farmers from threshing and winnowing their corn¹. Yet the Lebtarîkh, as if to save the credit of these pretenders to foreknowledge, would persuade us, against the testimony of other historians, that they from thence prognosticated the great devastations which attended the irruption of the Moguls under Jenghîz Khân, into the countries of Turân and *Irâk*², twenty-nine or thirty years after: for although he began his conquests in the east of Tartary about that time, viz. in 599, yet he did not move westward, to subdue provinces, till the year 614, or that following. Why then might not the phænomenon in question have related rather to the fall of the Seljuk monarchy of Irâk? Was it too small an event for so great a congress of the heavenly bodies? Or could the astrologers see the more distant evil, but not that near at hand?

In the same year 581, the Atabek Mohammed, son of Ildighîz, dying, a breach began between the Soltân and Kizil Arslân Atabek (U), brother of the deceased; for this ambitious lord, taking upon him to dispose of all things without Togrol's orders, gave great umbrage, both to that prince, and his whole court. The Atabek, perceiving the Soltân to be displeased with him, to prevent the consequence, marched of a sudden with a great army towards Hamadân, from whence Togrol, having no forces to oppose him, retired. Kizil Arslân entered the city without resistance; and, after he had continued there for some time, content with having given this insult to the Soltân, withdrew home to Adherbijân.

AFTER his return, Togrol re-entered his capital; but the Atabek did not let him remain long in quiet: for drawing several discontented lords of Irâk to his party, he persuaded them to send proper persons to let the Soltân know that they were ready to come and ask his pardon, if he would have the goodness to grant it them. Togrol, well pleased with their submission, appointed a day to receive it, when he was to play at mall in the great square of the city. The lords did not fail to appear there before him; but, instead of asking pardon, seized his person, and imprisoned him in the strong castle named Kalât al Najû, or the castle of refuge.

As soon as this scheme was executed, Kizil Arslân left Adherbijân, and came to Hamadân, with design to set Sanjar, son of the late Soleymân Shâh, on the throne. But, on receiving advice from Baghdâd that the Khalifah should say, the Atabek had a good pretence to become Soltân himself, he resolved to assume that title, and ordered money to be coined in his own name. This proceeding changed the face of affairs: for Fakro'ddin Kûtlûk (X), his nephew, and several other great lords, who thought themselves his equals, entering into a conspiracy, slew him, and divided Togrol's dominions among them.

At this juncture the Soltân escaped from his confinement, by the intrigues of Hoffamo'ddin, general of his troops; among whom there were many attached to his interest. As soon as he was at liberty, he raised an army; and defeating the rebels, punished them as they deserved.

YET did not this put an end to their treasons; for, in 588, Firmab, widow of the Atabek Kûtluk rebels: Mohammed, son of Ildighîz, who lived in the Harâm, among the Soltân's women, was prevailed on by her son Kûtluk Enbanej to poison the Soltân. But that prince having notice thereof, prevented the blow, by making her take the dose which she had prepared for him. After this, he ordered Kûtluk to be seized; and would have secured his own life, if he had not restored him to his liberty; which was the cause of all the evils that afterwards befel him.

IN short, this ungrateful wretch was no sooner released out of prison, than he sent to persuade Takash, fifth king of Karazm, to conquer Persian Irâk. Takash came; and joining his forces, went and took the castle of Thabrek (Y): but after remaining for some time about Ray, retired on the Soltân's approach, leaving Tafaj to take care of his new conquests (Z). But next year Togrol recovered all, and punished Tafaj, whom he took prisoner.

IN 590 Kûtluk, acting in concert with Takash, marched with a powerful army into Persian Irâk; but being defeated by Togrol, was obliged to fly into Karazm to his assistance. The Soltân, after this, thinking he was delivered from all his enemies, abandoned himself to women and wine, with boundless excess. And though he was told, that Takash was raising a formidable army to invade his dominions, yet intoxicated with his success and delights, he continued his debauches, and neglected affairs to such a degree, that the grandees of the court wrote themselves to Takash, to make haste, assuring him that he might easily surprize Togrol in the midst of his revels.

TAKASH, following their advice, made such expedition, that he arrived at the gates of Ray, while the Soltân was still buried in liquor. However, he put himself at the head of his troops, and marched toward the enemy, repeating certain verses out of the Shâb Nameh (A), spoken by some warrior, boasting of what he would do: but raising his mace, as if he was going to strike, in conformity to the words he had pronounced, he discharged such a blow on one of the fore legs of his horse, that the beast fell under him, and he was thrown himself by the fall. Kûtluk, seeing him on the ground, immediately ran, and with one blow of his scymitar, put an end to his life, and the power of the Seljûks in *Irâk*¹.

Takash

TAKASH, not content with the downfall of this prince, whose dominions he joined to his own, sent his head to the Khalifâh at Baghdâd, and had his body fastened to a gibbet at Ray^m. It is surprizing, that neither of these two remarkable circumstances, which are related by the Leb-tarikh, are mentioned by D'Herbelot, in either the article of Togrol ben Arslân, or Takash, wherein the death of that prince is spoken of; and yet, if we mistake not, he takes notice of them in some other place: on which occasion he observes, that some of the Persian historians ascribe the ruin of the Karazmian empire, not many years after, by Jenghîz Khân, under Soltân Mohammed, son and successor of Takash, as a judgment on that family, for their ingratitude to the Seljûkians, to whom they owed all their fortune.

ACCORDING to Kondamîr, Soltân Togrol reigned eighteen years ten months and a halfⁿ. The Leb-tarikh has twenty-nine years, by mistake for nineteen; as appears by collating the year of his death with that of his predecessor, marked by the same author. What children he left (B) does not appear.

Togrol;

THIS prince had a great many noble qualities; for he was not only remarkable for his courage, which made them compare him to Rostam and Isfandiar (C), but also for his wit and knowledge. He excelled so much in poetry, that some compare him to Anvari and Dbahir^o. He often disputed with the learned; had a majestic mien; and was very handsome. He surpassed all the Seljûkians in goodness and justice, as well as in managing his arms both on foot and on horseback^p.

Of the Soltâns
in general.

THE Seljûkians of Irâk were, for the general, a race of very accomplished princes, eminent for their good-nature, courage, liberality, justice, and other virtues, both civil and military. They owed their ruin chiefly to their too great bounty, and indulgence to their favourites; particularly in vesting governors with so much dignity and power, as the Karazm Shâhs and Atabeks, by whom their own was at length extinguished.

Defects of Greek

THUS we have completed the history of the first and principal Seljûkian dynasty, compiled almost wholly from the oriental historians; on which occasion it may be proper to observe, that, of the fourteen Soltâns whereof this monarchy consists, none but the two first are mentioned (under the corrupt names of Tangrolipix and Axan) by any of the Byzantine historians, excepting Anna Commena, who speaks of the two next, Malek Shâh and Barkiarok, but names only the latter; after which they pass to the Seljûkian princes, who settled in Asia minor; seeming to confound the two dynasties together.

(B) We only find an account of one son, who, on the irruption of the Mogols in Karazm, in the year 1220, was put to death, with eleven other children of sovereign princes, by the bloody Turkan Khatûn, widow of Takash, who had so unworthily treated his father. De la Croix hist. Gengh. p. 242.

(C) Two Persian heroes of antiquity.

^a AYTON, or Hayton, the Armenian, whose memoirs, in conjunction with those of the Greeks, the other European historians have hitherto made use of, does much the same thing. He gives some account of the four first Soltâns; after which he says, the Turks cut to pieces the brother of Barkiarok, who attempted to ascend the throne; and then falling out among themselves about the choice of a successor, the Georgians and Greater Armenians invaded, and drove them out of, Persia. That hereupon they removed, with their families, into the kingdom of Turky [meaning Ikonium]; and thus increased the power of the Soltân, so that he became the most potent of all the Soltâns ¹.

^b This false information, or defect in the before-mentioned authors, is doubtless owing to the grants made by Malek Shâb I. of the countries west of Persian Irâk; which thus becoming in a manner independent, under their own princes, the Greeks heard no more of the great Soltân, as they called him, of Persia, or of his commanding in Asia Minor: and therefore concluded the empire of the eastern Seljûks was at an end. It must likewise be considered, that, by this alienation of the provinces, the intercourse with Persia was much interrupted; which might be one reason why Hayton, though living in the very midst between those two monarchies of the Turks, appears to be so utterly ignorant of the affairs of Persia, from the time of Barkiarok, to that of Jenghîz Khân.

^c To this cause may be added his want of reading, and being of a different language, as well as religion, from the Turks; which might have hindered him from conversing with his neighbours, or consulting their histories. It is true, Abû'l-faraj, as having had the advantage of the Arabic, and more erudition than his countryman Hayton, carries down the Irâk dynasty through a succession of eight Soltâns more: but after Irâk Arabi comes to be severed from the Seljûk dominions, by the Khalifâh Moktâfi, on the death of Mohammed II. in the year 554, as if that dismemberment had cut off all correspondence with Persia, he speaks no more of the succeeding Soltâns of the Seljûk race.

The Soltâns of the second branch, or dynasty, of the Seljûkians, called that of Kermân

^d K ERMÂN, the country from whence this race of Soltâns takes its denomination, is a province of Irân, or Persia at large, the same with ancient Karamania. It has on the west Pârs, or proper Persia; on the north Sejestân, or Sistân; on the east Mekrân; and on the south the straits of Harmûz or Ormûs. The principal city is called Kermân, or Sirjân, situate near the borders of Pârs. Besides which, we meet with several others, as Tuberân, Gab-bis, Barsîr, or Berdasîr, Mastib, or Masrib, Bemnasîr, or Kermasîn, Bam, Giroft, or Sireft, &c. To which may be added the ports of Jasbes, Minâ, and Gomrûn, or Bander Abbâsi; with the islands of Harmûz and Keshom, which lie off the southern part of it, at present called Mogostân.

^e This dynasty takes the name of Kermân, because it was founded in that province: but the power of its princes was not confined within the bounds of that single country; for they enlarged their dominions not only by the acquisition of Pârs, on the west, but of the countries eastward, as far as the river Send, or Indus ²; comprising, as it should seem, the province of Mekrân, or Makrân, with part of Sajestân, and Sablestân, and possibly so much of India as lay between those provinces and the Indus.

^f ALL the oriental historians agree, that this dynasty commenced in the year 433 of the Hejrab, and ended in 583, subsisting 150 years, under eleven Soltâns, viz. 1. Kaderd. 2. Soltân Shâb, 3. Turân Shâb. 4. Irân Shâb. 5. Arslân Shâb. 6. Mohammed. 7. Togrol Shâb. 8. Arslân Shâb II. 9. Baharâm Shâb. 10. Turân Shâb II. 11. Mohammed Shâb. Of whom, from the scantiness of the extracts given by D'Herbelot, who is our only assistant as to the history of this branch of the Seljûkians, it appears that the orientals themselves have spoken very little.

KADERD, or Kadherd, the first, and founder of this race of Soltâns, who, from him, are, by way of distinction, called Kaderdians, was the son of Dawd, or Jaffar Bek, son of Mikaël, son of Seljûk. In the year 433, his uncle Togrol Bek, founder of the dynasty of Irân, made A. D. 1041.

- him governor of the province of Kermân, the Persian Karamania of the Greeks, where he became so powerful, that he assumed the authority of a sovereign prince, and added to his new dominion the province of Fârs, or Pârs (A), adjoining to it on the west. So that, in the year 455, he had formed a considerable state, with which he might have been satisfied; but the desire of possessing more, which generally encreases with many acquisitions, having pushed him on to attack the dominions of his nephew Malek Shâb I. third Soltân of the Seljûks of Irân, he was defeated at Gurj, in the year 465; and being taken prisoner, was confined in a castle in Khorasân; where, not long after, he was poisoned, by order of Malek Shâb^b, as hath been already related^c. This prince reigned thirty-two years, and left for his successor a son named Soltân Shâb.
- Second Soltân, Soltân Shâh.* MALEK SHAH, on the death of his uncle Kaderd, restored his dominions to his cousin-german Soltân Shâb, son of Kaderd, who reigned there under his authority. But he enjoyed the throne no more than two years, according to Kondamir, who places his death in 467; although the Tarikh Khozideh gives him a reign of twelve years, which ends in 477^d.
- Third Soltân, Turân Shâh.* TURAN SHAH, EBN KADERD succeeded his brother Soltân Shâb, under the authority likewise of Malek Shâb. He reigned with the reputation of a very just and wise prince, applying himself solely to repair the ruins made in his dominions by the former wars. He died in the year 489, after he had reigned thirteen years; and left for his successor his son,
- Fourth Soltân, Irân Shâh.* IRAN SHAH, who had not the good qualities of his father: besides, his cruelty was so great, that his subjects, no longer able to endure it, in general conspired against and slew him, in the year 494, and fifth of his reign. He was succeeded by Arslân Shâb, son of Kerman Shâb ebn Kaderd^e.
- Fifth Soltân, Arslân Shâh.* ARSLAN SHAH, during the life of his uncle Irân Shâb, kept himself concealed in a shoemaker's shop, for fear of falling into his hands: but as soon as he heard of his death, he made himself known, and was proclaimed Soltân the same year, by the unanimous consent of the grandees of the kingdom. So that the Seljûkians of Pârs, his relations, who had given much uneasiness to his predecessors, durst not attack him. By this means he reigned in peace for forty-two years, and left the crown to his son Mohammed^f.
- Sixth Soltân, Mohammed.* MOHAMMED, surnamed Mogoyatbo'ddin, succeeded his father Arslân Shâb, in the year 536; and, the better to secure himself on the throne, put out the eyes of all his brothers. All that Kondamir relates of him is, that he was much addicted to judicial astrology, and was very fond of building. He reigned fourteen years, and died in the 551st year of the Hejrab^g. Some call this prince Turân Shâb^h.
- Seventh Soltân, Togrol Shâh.* TOGROL SHAH, surnamed Mohio'ddin (B), succeeded his father Mohammed, and died after reigning twelve years. He left three sons, Arslân Shâb, Babarâm Shâb, and Turân Shâb, who made war on each other for twenty years together, with alternate advantages; so that he who gained a victory was acknowledged for Soltân, till such time as he was driven out by one of his two brothersⁱ. These succeeded one another, as set forth in the list of Soltâns, at the beginning of this chapter: but the duration of their reigns is so uncertain, that authors have marked only that of Turân Shâb, to which they give eight years.
- Eleventh Soltân, Mohammed Shâh.* HE was succeeded by his nephew Mohammed Shâb, son of his brother Babarâm, or Beberâm Shâb, who was the eleventh and last Soltân of this second branch of Seljûkians: for Malek Dinar, a descendant of Ali, son-in-law of the prophet Mohammed, having conquered Kermân in the year 583, this dynasty, according to Kondamir, and the Tarikh Khozideh, became extinct. But the reigns of the four last Soltâns are so confounded one with the other, that the Tarikh al Tawarikh reckons no more than nine princes in this Kermân succession^k.

C H A P. IV.

History of the third dynasty of the Seljûkians, called that of Rûm.

S E C T. I.

Their dominions, conquest, establishment, and succession.

THIS dynasty of the Seljûkians takes its name of Rûm from their having reigned in the country of Rûm, that is, of the Romans, or rather of the Greeks; whose emperors, being the successors of the Roman emperors, preserved the title of emperors of the Romans, although they had changed the seat of their empire from Rome to Constantinople; and consequently were more properly or immediately sovereigns of the Greeks; who besides, at this time, of the two nations were only subject to them; Italy, and the western provinces, having being torn off from their dominions many ages before.

IT is not to be presumed, from the denomination which this dynasty or race of Soltâns bears, that they were lords of all the then Roman empire, or country of the Romans. No: that was a glory reserved for the Othmân or Osmân Turks, who rose out of the ruins of these Seljûkians; and succeeded them first in their dominions, which were confined for the general to Asia minor, or rather a part of it, during the reigns of all the Soltâns of the Seljûk race, excepting two or three of them, who extended their conquests beyond its bounds, to the east and south, which yet continued as part of the Rûmean monarchy, but little longer than their respective lives.

THE Arabs, who were the great reigning power before the Turks, had wrested from the Roman emperors all their dominions in Africa and Asia, excepting Asia minor; the eastern parts of which, towards the Euphrates, had been in their hands for the space of more than 150 years: but, for some time before the appearance of Seljûkians, the emperors had recovered from most of the cities they were possessed of within that province, besides some part of the Greater Armenia; which, however, they soon lost again; being taken from them by those new invaders.

ASIA MINOR, called more commonly by the latter Greeks Anatolê (A), that is, the east, is a large peninsula in the western part of Asia. It is bounded on the north by the Euxine sea and Propontis, on the west by the Archipelago, on the south by the Mediterranean sea and Syria, on the east by the country of the Lazi or Kurti, and the river Euphrates. It is situated between the 36th and 42d degrees of latitude, and between the 44th and 58th degrees of longitude, reckoning from Ferro; being in length, from west to east, about 640 miles, and in breadth, from south to north, 360 miles.

AT the time when the Seljûk Turks first invaded Asia minor, it was divided much in the same manner as in former times, in twelve large provinces: all these, excepting four, are maritime; and, beginning with the most eastern, lie round the peninsula in the following order: Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bitthynia, along the Euxine sea: Mysia, in which is Æolis; Ionia and Caria, are washed by the Archipelago: Lycia (containing Mylia), Pisidia (including Pamphilia), and Cilicia, by the Mediterranean. The four inland provinces are Lydia, Phrygia (containing Lycaonia and Isauria), Cappadocia (including Armenia minor and Cataonia), and Galatia; the three first run eastward, in the same parallel, from Ionia to the river Euphrates; and the fourth lies to the north of Phrygia, and part of Cappadocia.

FROM the account which has been given, the reader may form an idea of the manner in which these provinces are situated, in respect of one another; but, to make it still more clear, it may be proper to observe, that Cappadocia, which extends from Phrygia, eastward, to the Euphrates, lies between Pontus on the north, and Cilicia, with part of Syria, on the south; Galatia has on the north Paphlagonia and Bitthynia; Phrygia, which is the middle province of all, and whose north-west corner is covered by a skirt of Bitthynia, is bounded on the west by Mysia, Lydia, and Caria; and on the south by Lycia, Pisidia, and part of Cilicia.

OF these provinces, Pontus, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, are very large; Paphlagonia, Bitthynia, Mysia, Pisidia, Cilicia, and Galatia, of a middle size; Lydia, Caria, and Lycia, still less: and Ionia, least of all. It is not necessary to give a description of these provinces, according to the state they then were in ; for that will appear sufficiently from the history of the Soltâns, wherein we shall have frequent occasion to speak of the principal cities and places in each.

history ;

THERE is scarce any piece of history among Europeans in greater confusion than this of the Seljûkian Soltâns of Rûm ; or any which deserves more to be set in a clear light, on account of the great connection which there is between the affairs of those Soltâns, and those of the latter Roman or Greek emperors, as well as the Othmân Turks, their successors, reigning at present. This is owing to the imperfection of the Greek account of their affairs, full of chasms and errors ; from whence alone Leunclavius, Knowles, and all the other western writers hitherto, have compiled their histories of this dynasty.

It may be presumed, that the defects of the Greek authors might be supplied, and their errors corrected, from the oriental, especially those of Rûm, or the countries subject to this third branch of the Seljûkians, if any of them yet remain. But the misfortune is, that very few particular histories of the eastern monarchies have as yet come to our hands ; and fewer still of the general ones been translated.

Want of helps,

With respect to these latter, no translation has been published which treats of the Soltâns of this dynasty, excepting that of the compendium of Abu'l-faraj, who speaks only of the first eleven, and mentions no more than the names of some of them. For this author, digesting his materials by way of annals, gives no compleat or connected account of any of them. However, so much as we find in him has been of great use to us, in compiling our history of this third branch of the Seljûkians ; nor could we possibly have cleared up the chief difficulties, and settled some of the most important facts, without his assistance.

authors.

As to the extracts from the oriental authors which D'Herbelot furnishes, they are very considerable ; for though in the articles under the names of the respective Soltâns, he cites Kondamir, Ebn Shobnah, and other Persian historians, and has given a table of those princes, from one or more of them ; yet the account he gives of the first Soltân is copied almost wholly from Abu'l-faraj : as if the other authors had inserted nothing relating to them, but their names ; which, in such case, he ought to have acquainted his readers with, in order to account for so strange an imperfection, and prevent their imputing it to his own neglect.

Greek
writers,

THE Byzantine historians afford no small fund of materials : but then they relate almost intirely to such princes as they had wars or other transactions with ; and extend very little beyond those affairs, in which themselves were concerned : so that you neither find in them a regular series of the Soltâns, nor often the true names, if the names at all, even of those with whom they had to do. In short, they have related matters very imperfectly, often erroneously, and in great confusion, both in point of history and chronology ; nor have the orientals been free from the same faults, which we shall point out as we go along. However, as scanty as our memoirs are on every side, yet the authors often supply the defects of one another : and if, from the oriental writers, we have received a more compleat succession of the Soltâns, and better account of their transactions in the east, yet we should be at almost an entire loss for their conquests in the west, but for the Greek historians.

It has been already remarked from those writers, in the reign of Togrol Bek, first Soltân of the Seljûkian dynasty of Irân, that the Turks penetrated very early into the Roman empire. They tell us, that Tagrolipix (B), so they call Togrol Bek, having slain Pisares, or Basasiri, and subdued the Babylonians, that is, the people of Irâk Arabi, named also Babeli, sent his nephew Kutlu Moses (C) against the Arabians ; but, being defeated, he fled into Baas, or Baasprakan, in Persarmenia, and, forcing his passage through the country, returned into Persia ; where, for fear of the Soltân, who was enraged at his bad success, he retired to the city of Pasar, and rebelled against him, while he was in an expedition against the Arabs.

invades

TAGROLIPIX, having finished that war, marched against Kutlu Moses ; and while he held him besieged in Pasar, sent part of his army, under the command of Affan, or Hassan, surnamed the deaf, another of his nephews, to subdue Persarmenia ; but he miscarrying in that design, the Soltân dispatched his half-brother Abraham Alim, or Halim, with a great force, on the same expedition, which succeeded better than the former : for Abraham burned Artze, or Arzerûm, and took the Roman general prisoner. Tagrolipix generously gave the general his liberty ; and some time after, sent an ambassador to summon the emperor Monomakhus to become his tributary. The emperor, for this insult, treating the ambassador ill, the Soltân invaded Iberia, at a time when the Romans were at war with the Patzinake Scythians, which happened in the year of Christ 1050.

Not long after, discord arising between the Soltân and Abraham Alim, the latter fled to Kutlu Moses, and joined in the rebellion : but the Soltân defeated them both near Pasar before-a mentioned; and Abraham being taken prisoner, was put to death. Kutlu Muses, with his cousin Malek, son of Abraham, followed by 6000 men, fled to the borders of the Roman empire, from whence he sent for protection to Monomachus, a little before his death, which happened in 1054: but instead of waiting for an answer, he marched into Perfarmeria, and took Karfe, now Kârs; when hearing that Tagrolipix was advancing towards him, he fled to the Arabs, who were the Soltân's enemies.

HERE Kutlu Muses remained during the life of Tagrolipix: but as soon as Axan, so the Greeks call Alp Arslân (D), had ascended the throne, he returned from Arabia with considerable forces; and advancing to Re (E), laid claim to the sovereignty. But while the two armies were on the point of engaging, the Khalifâh of Babylon (F) of a sudden appeared, and, interposing his authority, which he still retained in spirituals, brought the contending parties to this agreement: that the Soltân should hold Persia; and that Kutlu Muses, and his children, who were five in number, though not particularly named, should possess all the countries which they were able to take from the Roman emperor; and that Axan should assist them with troops for that purpose.

THE Soltân having, in performance of this agreement, furnished Kutlu Muses with forces, that prince, and his five sons, invaded the Roman empire; and, in the reign of Michael Ducas and his successor, made himself master of all Perfarmeria, Lycaonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia.

ACCORDING to Cedrenus and Zonaras, who have been followed by all the western historians; Kutlu Muses lived at least sixteen years after that battle; for they say, that he actually commanded a body of troops which came to the assistance of Botoniates, when he usurped the empire^a in the year 1078.

THIS account, given by the Greeks, of the conquests made in Asia minor by the Seljukian Turks, under the command of Kutlu Muses, it must be confessed, contains several errors; which having remarked elsewhere^b, we shall not repeat here. It will be sufficient for our purpose to take notice, in this place, that those writers were misinformed as to the event of that battle; which, according to the oriental historians, was fought in the year of the Hejrah 455, Hej. 455. and proved fatal to Kutlu Muses, who was killed by a fall from his horse, as he was going to engage Alp Arslân, against whom he rebelled, in the province of Damagân^c, in Persia. A. D. 1052.

Now this being supposed to be fact (and the authority of historians ought to be allowed, when speaking of an affair which concerned themselves, and happened in their own country), all which the before-mentioned Greek authors relate, concerning the actions of Kutlu Muses after that battle, must be false: and this seems, in good measure, confirmed by Nicephorus Bryennius, a more correct historian than the former, who relates, that the emperor Michael sent an ambassador to Soleymân, son of Kutulmes (G), in the year 1074, desiring his assistance against Botoniates^d: which implies that his father was then dead. And this may explain what he says afterwards; that, in 1078, the same usurper sent to demand succours of Masur (H) and Soleymân, sons of Kutulmes, prince of Nice^e, that is, late prince of Nice.

THE single remark touching the death of Kotolmîsh is all which has been yet transmitted to us from the eastern writers concerning that prince (I), corruptly called Kutlu Muses by the Greeks; excepting another, which seems to be taken from them, made by a late author, who informs us, that he established himself in Asia minor, about the year of the Hejrah 442, of Christ 1050^f; which is not at all improbable; since, according to Cedrenus, the Greeks became acquainted with the Turks about the year 1040; and ten years was time sufficient for making considerable conquests in that country.

HOWEVER that be, the Greek history seems to clash again with the oriental in this article: for if Kotolmîsh had settled himself in Asia minor so early as the year of Christ 1050, how can it be imagined, that he should repair two or three years after to the borders of the Roman empire, suing for protection, as the Greeks relate the case? for this supposes him either to have been driven out of his new possessions in that country, almost as soon as he acquired them, which we hear nothing of from either quarter; or else that he had not as yet made any conquests there; which is contrary to the authority of the eastern historians.

settled

It would be in vain to pretend to solve the above difficulties, till we are sufficiently furnished with memoirs from the eastern writers, relating to Kotolmîsh. In the mean time it must be observed, in behalf of the account given by De la Croix, which we only suppose to have been taken from some oriental author or authors, that there is an error in the Greek relation, which seems to lessen its authority. For the application made by that Seljûkian prince to Monomachus, is said to have been made after the battle against Togrol Bek, wherein Ibrahim, his cousin, and partner in the rebellion, was taken and strangled. Now this could not possibly be the case; since that battle, by the testimony of the oriental writers, was fought in the year 1059, which was five years after that emperor's death: and if the Byzantine historians have been mistaken in one circumstance, they might in another; especially when it relates to an event which happened at so great a distance from the capital of the empire.

ON a presumption therefore that Kotolmîsh had established himself in Asia minor about the year 1050, he will have a kind of dominion in that country for the space of thirteen years. However, it is not this prince, but his son Soleymân, who was the first of the Seljûkian Soltâns of Rûm: nor does it appear that Soleymân, who did not begin his reign till nine years after his father's death, derived any title to those territories from him.

BUT before we enter upon the history of that prince and his descendants, it will be proper to settle the number of them, with the beginnings and lengths of their respective reigns; about which there is no small disagreement, as well between the oriental authors and the Grecian, as among the oriental authors themselves.

IN order to do this the more effectually, and to the satisfaction of our readers, we shall insert two tables, or lists, of the Soltâns of the Rûm dynasty: the first according to the Persian authors, as communicated by D'Herbelot, with our remarks thereon; the second as rectified by the assistance of other oriental authors, compared with the Greeks.

THIS table is taken from D'Herbelot, who, in his article of the Seljûkian dynasty, has given a list of the Soltâns, with the length of their reigns; and we have added the years in which they ascended the throne, from the particular articles inserted in his bibliothèque, under their respective names. The figures within hooks, resulting from the other numbers, have been inserted by us, to fill up the vacancies; that our readers may better judge of its real imperfections.

Its imperfec-
tions

THOSE which occur upon the face of the table are two very material ones. First, the sum of the years which all the princes reigned amounts only to 189, being 31 short of the duration of the dynasty (reckoning from its commencement in 480, to its conclusion in 700), which makes 220 years. The second apparent defect is in the interval between the second and fifth Soltâns: for, as that interval appears to be 88 years, and the years of the reigns of the three Soltâns within that period make but 47, which fall 43 short; either those reigns must have been considerably longer than they are represented by the table, or else there must be an omission between Dawd and Rokno'ddin of one or two princes, whose reigns are necessary to fill up the vacancy. Besides these great defects, you find that the number of years reigned do not always tally with the years when the reign began: thus Rokno'ddin, the fifth Soltân, is made to reign 24 years; yet the distance betwixt the beginning of his reign and that of his successor is but 22 years. By the same rule Gayatho'ddin, the seventh, ought to have 8 years to his reign instead of 6; while Alao'ddin, the ninth, has two more given him than come to his share.

IN effect, D'Herbelot acknowledges there is a great difference between Kondamîr, whom he seems to follow, and the author of the Nighiariştân, as to the length of the reigns; though he only mentions two instances, with regard to the second and fourth Soltâns; the Nighiariştân allowing a allowing the first but four years to his reign, and giving 20 to the latter ; which widens the gap, taken notice of above, between the second and fifth Soltân, by four years.

WITH regard to this chasm, as it is evident, from what has been said, that there is some defect in the numbers, so D'Herbelot gives us room to believe there may be a Soltân wanting to compleat the list : for this author farther informs us, that Kondamîr and the Nighiaristân differ also in the names, succession, and number, of the Soltâns.

As to the number (which is the article of the three at present most to our purpose), he says, oriental that the Nighiaristân makes these Soltâns the 14th and 15th, whom Kondamîr reckons the 13th historians and 14th², as in the table. Hence it appears, that, according to the first author, there were fifteen Soltâns in the dynasty of Rûm, or Asia minor.

b D'HERBELOT, indeed, has not told us either the name of the additional Soltân, nor his rank in the succession ; but with regard to the latter, where is his reign more likely to come in, than in the interval or chasm before-mentioned ? Nay, that author seems to point out the very place ; for though in the table he reckons Massûd the third Soltân, in the article of Massûd, he makes him the fourth (K).

Now this being supposed, we have found out a Soltân to supply the place of the third ; which, by his setting Massûd a descent lower, becomes vacant. And there is the more reason to believe that there ought to be more Soltâns than three within the interval in question ; because, according to our computation, that interval is larger by twelve years than what the foregoing table makes it. fairly stated.

c As to the disagreement which D'Herbelot says there is among the oriental historians, with respect to the names of the Soltâns of Rûm, he has furnished us with no instance thereof : but we shall mention some hereafter, particularly in the history of Azzo'ddîn, our twelfth Soltân ; and perhaps some authors put his name in the succession instead of Rokno'ddîn's, as we ourselves have done.

In these remarks on the foregoing table, the reader sees the grounds for the alterations which are made in that which follows ; the particular proofs in support of which will be produced, as we go along, in the history of the Soltâns. It may be sufficient to intimate here, that as the chasm before-mentioned has been supplied from certain occasional remarks left us by the Byzantine historians and Abu'l-faraj ; so, in settling the chronology, we have been chiefly obliged d to the last author, who has inserted in his annals the deaths of three our four of the Soltâns : which serve as so many fixed points to guide us into our enquiries, and justify our dissenting from the authority of other oriental writers. Reasons for the

(K) Accordingly, Alao'ddîn, who in the table is the ninth, in the article of Caikobad is said to be the tenth. It is true, he is not uniform in this respect ; for Gayatbo'ddîn, the seventh in the table, is made the fifth or sixth in the article : in like manner Kaykaws, the eighth in the table, is only the seventh in the article under his name. But it must be observed, that D'Herbelot not only made use of authors who disagreed on this subject, but also that his Bibliothèque is very incorrect ; he not living either to fit the work for the press, or to see it printed.

Defects of Greek authors

pernicious to
history.

THE dates of the reigns, which are inserted only according to the years of Christ, are computed the best we could from the little light given by the Byzantine historians, who seldom mark the time of actions ; which is almost an inexcusable fault, as it gives great perplexity to a compiler, and makes it very difficult to connect the history of the Greeks with that of other nations.

It has been already observed, that no compleat series of Soltâns, or continued account of their transactions, much less the dates of them, is to be gathered from those writers. Leunclavius, misled by Cedrenus and Zonaras, makes two dynasties of Soltâns : one at Nice, which lasted only during the reigns of Kutlu Muses and his son Soleymân Shâh, as they call him : the other, at Iconium, which commences with Alao'ddîn, whom he makes to be the son of one Kai Kosroes, but of a different family from that of Kutlu Muses, and newly come out of Persia, from whence he was expelled by the Tartars ^a. And tho' the defect of the Soltâns, between Soleymân and Alao'ddîn, may be supplied in some measure from other Greek historians, who had better opportunities of being acquainted with affairs than the two above-mentioned ; yet, with regard to the Soltâns who succeeded Alao'ddîn, you meet with scarce any thing besides their distorted names, according to the corrupt custom of the Grecians. What little there is of history is very erroneous, and delivered in great confusion.

WHATEVER conquests Kotolmîsh made in Lesser Asia, or whatever power and authority he exercised there during his life ; yet the Persian historians, who make his son Soleymân the founder of this Seljûkian dynasty, are so far from deriving any right of possession to him from his father, that they speak as if the Turks had no dominions in Asia minor for him to reign over, till they were conquered by his uncle. Hamdallab al Mestîfi, author of the Tarîk Khozideh, says, that Malek Shâh, third Soltân of the Seljûkians of Iran (or Persia at large), on advice that the Greek emperor (A) was dead, sent Soleymân, son of Kotolmîsh, to make war on the Greeks in Asia minor ; and that this prince, having made conquests there, settled himself entirely in the year 480 ^a. Kondamîr more particularly informs us, that Malek Shâh gave to his cousin Soleymân the country of Rûm, or what he had taken from the Greek emperor, extending from the Euphrates a great way into Asia minor, of which part Arzerûm ^b was the capital ^b.

It is not said when this conquest or grant was made ; but it may be presumed to have been done three or four years after his accession to the throne, when he began to carry his arms westward of that river : and we meet with a passage, taken from the same historian, which helps to countenance this opinion, namely, that in the year 467, Malek Shâh sent his cousin Soleymân into Syria, with an army sufficient to reduce that province ; and that, in a short time, he subdued the whole country as far as Antiokk ^c. It is true, Syria is the country said in this passage to be conquered, and not Asia minor ; but that might have happened through a mistake in Kondamîr, or his translator D'Herbelot, both of whom are pretty subject to such failings : and there is the more reason to believe so ; because, first, we find Soleymân in that very year 467, or of Christ 1074, actually at the head of the Seljûk forces about Nice, when Botoniates the Roman emperor sent to him for succours (*). Secondly, It appears from two other oriental authors, of equal credit with Kondamîr, and, in our opinion, more accuracy, that the conquest of Syria was not undertaken till the year following, viz. 468, when Atsîs, or Atkîs, was sent by the same Soltân to conquer that province ; and accordingly did conquer it, and settled there ^d. Nor do the same authors speak of Soleymân's entering Syria to make any conquest, till about the year 477, when he took Antiokk from the Romans or Greeks ; which was the only city he ever possessed in Syria, and which he did not long hold, as will be related hereafter.

FROM hence we think it highly probable, that the beginning of Soleymân's reign ought to be placed much earlier than the year 480 of the Hejrah ; although D'Herbelot affirms that all the oriental historians unanimously agree to fix it to that year ; excepting one, who puts it three years higher ^e. But whether the first be the true commencement of the dynasty or not, we may a venture to affirm, that the latter must be erroneous, because we have proof that Soleyman died in 478, which was two years before : and, indeed, from the disagreement which D'Herbelot confesses there is among the oriental authors, concerning the number and reigns of these Soltâns, as well as from his giving little or no account, from them, of the actions of either Soleyman or several of his successors, it appears, that the historians he made use of (who seem to be chiefly, if not solely, the Persian, excepting Abû'l-faraj), had in their hands very few memoirs relating to the Seljukian princes of Rûm, at least the first of them ; which might have happened thro' the distance of place and confusion of affairs during those times. his reign fixed.

HOWEVER that be, on a supposition that Soleyman began his reign in the year 467, it will be a farther confirmation that he derived nothing in succession from his father, who, in that case, died nine years before (and twenty-two, according to the account which puts the commencement of the dynasty in 480) ; whence it may be presumed, that whatever territories Kotolmish might have been possessed of in Asia minor at his death, whether by usurpation, or grant from Togrol-bek, they fell into the hands of his nephew Alp Arslan, against whom he had rebelled ; nor did his son Soleyman enjoy any part of them during the life of that Soltân, according to the oriental historians, who affirm, that the countries which he possessed were conquered from the Romans, and given to him by Malek Shâh, who succeeded Alp Arslan, in the year of the Hejrah 464, and of Christ 1072. Settled by grant, not by conquest.

THE Greek writers are not acquainted with this grant, or the Soltân who made it : but the best of them agree very well with the account of this conquest, and the commencement of the reign of Soleyman, as delivered by the oriental authors whom we follow : for they tell us, that, soon after the death of the emperor Romanus Diogenes, the Turks broke into the territories of the empire. Michael Ducas, his successor, being alarmed at this irruption, sent against them A. D. 1072. Isaac Comnenus ; who, after gaining a few advantages, was defeated, and taken prisoner on the frontiers of Cappadocia, not far from Cæsarea. His brother Alexis, on his return, having passed the river Sangarius, was attacked by a party of Turks, who had already made incursions thro' Bithynia as far as Nice. Early progress Hej. 466. A. D. 1073.

ANOTHER army was soon dispatched against them under the command of John Ducas, the emperor's uncle, and Cæsar ; but, while he strove to reduce Ursel, who had revolted, the Turks took the opportunity to pursue their conquests. He himself was afterwards taken by Ursel ; and both of them by Artuk (C) (who then commanded the Turkish forces) at Trikeum, near the above-mentioned river. About the same time a new army came from Persia under Tutak, who ravaged the country about Amasia. To him Ursel, after being dismissed by Artuk, applied for assistance ; but Tutak betrayed him, for a sum of money, to Alexis Comnenus, who had been appointed general in Asia. In his return, Alexis was attacked near Heraklea in Bithynia by a party of Turks, but escaped by his courage and address. About the same time Isaac Comnenus, newly made governor of Antiokh, was slain in an engagement with a party of Turks, which had made an irruption into Syria ^f.

AFTER this, several persons aspiring to the empire, Michael sent an ambassador to Soleyman, son of Kutulmes (or Kotolmish), desiring his assistance against Nicephorus Botaniates, general of the armies of the east, who had revolted ; and being joined by Kbrysofules, a Turkish commander, who in the reign of Diogenes had taken part with the Romans, had marched from Phrygia into Bithynia, with a design to get into Nice. Soleyman, being gained by the emperor, seized all the passages, and watched the motions of Botaniates ; who, having but three hundred followers, took the by roads, and travelled by night to avoid the Turks, and reach that city before they knew of his march : but they, getting intelligence of it, sent a party of horse to harass his men. These, however, he repulsed ; but, fearing to be surrounded, sent Kbrysofules, who for a small sum of money prevailed on them to withdraw, and leave the way to Nice open. When he came near to that city, to his great surprize he found a numerous army drawn up in order before the suburbs, whom he took to be enemies ; but, to his greater surprize, he found they had proclaimed him emperor ^g.

It appears from this passage, that Soleyman was in Asia minor in the year 1074, which we suppose to be the first of his reign ; and the abrupt manner, in which Nicephorus Bryennius here speaks of him for the first time, gives room to conjecture that he had been in the country for some considerable time before, which farther supports our hypothesis. What follows, from the same author, seems to confirm it still more. Botaniates, being in possession of the empire, raised forces to oppose Nicephorus Bryennius, who aspired to the throne ; and having demanded succour of Mas'ûr (D) and Soleyman, sons of Kutulmes, prince of Nice in Bithynia, they sent him 2000 men, and promised him more. But after he had, by the conduct of Alexis Comnenus, who succeeded him, quashed the rebellions of Bryennius and Basilacius, he had likewise that of Nicephorus Melissenus to suppress. This lord, during the two former rebellions in Europe setting up for emperor, had gotten together some Turkish troops in Asia minor, with a which he overran the country; putting all the towns which he took into the hands of the Turks. By this means, in a little time, they became masters of all Phrygia and Galatia: in short, he reduced Nice in Bitbynia, and struck terror through the empire^h. And thus, probably, that famous city came to be possessed by Soleymân (E), who afterwards made it the seat of his new empire.

BOTANIATES, greatly alarmed at these successes, sent an army against the enemy under the command of John, an eunuch, who went and encamped near Fort Basileum, about forty stadia from Nice; and marching along a lake (F) came to Fort St. George, and took it. It was then debated if they should besiege that city, or go to Doryleum (G) and fight the Soltân (H). The former being resolved on, they sat down before it; but hearing of the Soltân's approach to relieve the place, the eunuch retired for fear, while the Turks pursued and harraſſed them extremelyⁱ.

WE are informed by the princess Anna Comnena (I), that when Botaniates obtained the empire, the Turks were possessed of the countries between the Euxine sea and the Helleſpont, between the Egean sea and the sea of Syria, and between the gulfs which are along the coasts of Pamphilia and Cilicia. As he had gained the empire by help of the Turks, so he used their aid to overcome Nicephorus Bryennius, who aspired to the throne^k. But those adventurers, who were ready to join with any party to serve their own turns, afterwards assisted his competitors Meliffenus and Alexis to dethrone him. At length he resigned the crown to Alexis, in 1081. During these disputes, the Turks made use of their opportunity, took Cyzicum, and ravaged the country of Anatolia^l.

AT the time when Alexis ascended the throne, as above-mentioned, Soleymân, who commanded in Anatolia, had fixed his seat at Nice in Bitbynia, and daily made inroads with his Turks as far as the Bosphorus, then called Damalis (K); but Alexis, by ordering armed barks to scour the coast, obliged them soon to abandon it. Pursuing his advantage by land, he retook Bosphorus, Thynia, and Bitbynia; whereupon the Soltân sued for peace; which was granted the Turks, on condition that they kept on the banks of the river Draco, without ever passing the borders of Bitbynia^m.

BUT while Alexis was engaged in war with Robert and his son Boemond in Illyrium, Apelkassem (L), governor of Nice, in the absence of Soleymân, ravaged the east, with the coast of Propontis, and the sea.

THE occasion of Soleymân's leaving Nice was this: one Filaretus, an Armenian, who for his courage and conduct had been made grand domestic by Diogenes, was so touched at his master's hard fate, that he resolved to be revenged; and, in order thereto, seized Antiokh; but not being able to live in quiet for the continual inroads of the Turks, he embraced Mohammedism. He had a son, who, because he could not divert him from his design, rode in eight days to Nice, and persuaded Amîr Soleymân (M) to come and take Antiokh. Soleymân, leaving Apelkassem to govern in his absence, set forward, and in twelve nights, which he chose to march in to prevent discovery, arrived at that city, and took it by assault; at the same time that Karatice reduced Sinopé, where he was told there were great richesⁿ.

THE precise time of this event is not to be collected from the Greek historian; altho' we know it must have happened between the years 1081 and 1084: for we are informed by Ebn Amîd, an oriental historian, that Antiokh was in the hands of Soleymân, son of Kotolmîsh, in the year of the Hejrab 477. This is mentioned by that author, on occasion of the death of Sharfo'ddawlat ebn Korays, lord of Halep and Musol, who advancing with troops to take Antiokh from Soleymân, was routed in battle and slain^o. We are obliged to the same historian for the exact time of Soleymân's death, which happened in the year following. For Soltân Tajo'ddawlat (lord of Damaskus), hearing of Sharfo'ddawlat's misfortune, marched with his forces, accompanied by Ortok the Turkmân, to attack Soleymân prince of Antiokh, who fought several battles with them under the walls of Halep; in the last of which he was slain, and his forces routed^p.

(E) This must have happened between the years 1074 and 1078; perhaps in 1076.

(F) Doubtless the lake of Nice.

(G) The regal seat of Soleymân seems, from this circumstance, to have been at Doryleum.

(H) The author should have told us who the Soltân was, whether Soleymân or Kotolmîsh. This would have helped to clear up some doubtful points. But such perplexing omissions frequently occur in the Byzantine historians, who too often attend more to the perfection of their style than their history. However, from what follows, the Soltân here meant must be Soleymân.

(I) She was daughter of the emperor Alexis (who succeeded Botaniates), and wrote his life.

(K) Or Skutari.

(M) Sometimes he is called Soltân, which is equivalent to King; sometimes Amîr, which signifies only a simple commander or general of troops.

- a THIS event is confirmed by the Greek historian Anna Comnena, tho' she differs somewhat in the manner of his death. She says, that Tutuse (so the Greeks call Tatash, surnamed Tajo'd-dawlat), brother of the great Soltân (N), who possessed Mesopotamia, with the cities of Jerusalem, Halep, and Baghdâd (O), having a great desire to be master of Antiokh, advanced with his forces against Soleymân; who being defeated, and finding he could not rally his troops, retreated himself: but the officers of the other party coming to tell him, that his uncle Tutuse sent for him, and fearing to trust himself in his hands, to avoid being constrained, he drew his sword and ran himself through. Hereupon his soldiers, who had escaped from the battle, joined the army of *Tutuse*¹. Here you have the death of Soleymân circumstantially attested by two cotemporary historians, one an Asiatic.
- b SOLEYMAN, dying in the year above-mentioned by Ebn Amîd, will have eleven years to his reign. But this time of his death, as well as that which we have assumed for the commencement of his reign, is contradicted by other historians both eastern and western. D'Herbelot assures us, that Kondamîr, and almost all the oriental historians (at least whom he had consulted), agree to place the death of this Soltân in the year 500 of the Hejrab, or 1106 of *Christ*², which is twenty-one or twenty-two years later; and give him a reign of twenty years, in consequence of fixing the beginning of it in 480. This is a wide difference, and the more irreconcilable, as Kondamîr begins his reign two years after his death, as related by Ebn Amîd; and if we follow the computation of Hamdallab al Mestîfi, who puts the commencement in 477 of the Hejrab, that date will indeed coincide with the years of Soleymân's life, but will afford him only about one year of reign, if we fix his death according to Ebn Amîd; tho' it extends the same to twenty-three by the system of the other oriental writers. In short, Cedrenus, Zonaras, and other western historians, confirm the supputation of Kondamîr, &c. against Ebn Amîd, by speaking of Soleymân (P) as making conquests, and fighting battles, many years after the year 1085³. The Jerusalem Chronicon, in particular, recites the words of a letter sent by Soleymân in the year 1098 to the Soltân of Khorassân, to desire succours against the Franks, who had taken from him Nice and Romania; meaning the country of Rûm, or Asia minor.
- c BUT notwithstanding the majority is against us in this point, yet we have very good reason to suspect their authority in favour of Ebn Amîd and Anna Comnena, if it be only considered that the historians whom D'Herbelot consulted, seem to have been very little acquainted with the affairs of the Seljukians of Rûm, for the reasons before offered; and that all which he has produced from them, relating to the death in question, is a naked date, without any concurrent circumstances to support it; whereas Ebn Amîd, and Anna Comnena, not only relate the manner of Soleymân's death, but that event is connected with foreign transactions; which is the strongest proof that the date of it, given by the former of them, must be exact. As to the other Greek historians, after what has been said, it is enough to say, that they could not have so good an opportunity of being rightly informed about such matters, as a princess of the imperial family.

I N T E R R E G N U M.

- e SOLEYMAN, according to Kondamîr, and the other Persian historians consulted by D'Herbelot, left for successor his son Dawd (or David) surnamed Kilij Arslân (Q), who ascended the throne in the year 500, immediately after his father's decease⁴. But it appears, from the history of Anna Comnena, that the sudden and violent death of Soleymân was attended with an interregnum, or usurpation of the governors in the dominions of Rûm; and that Kbli-ziastlan (as the Greeks corruptly name Kilij (R) Arslân) was in Persia till about the year 1093, when he returned to Nice; which will make a vacancy in the throne of nine years.
- f As there has been nothing transmitted to us from the east, relating to the affairs of the Seljukians in Rum, from the death of Soleymân to the death of this warlike Soltân, excepting his last expedition, in which he died, our sole recourse must be to the Greek historians, particularly the princess before-mentioned; who has given a pretty full account of the proceedings of the Turks against the Roman empire during that period.

Apelkasssem
seizes Nice.

WHEN the news of Amîr Soleyman's death reached the ears of his governors in Asia minor, a they divided his territories among themselves. Apelkasssem by this means became lord of Nice, famous for the palace of the Soltâns. He had before given Cappadocia to his brother Pulkas; but, being naturally active, he thought it unbecoming the dignity of Soltân to sit idle, and made incursions into Bithynia as far as the Propontis. The emperor, finding he could not be brought to a treaty, sent a powerful army, under the command of Taticius, to besiege Nice, which encamped at a place twelve stades distant.

Visits the emperor.

THE night following a peasant brought advice, that Prosius, sent by a new Soltân called Barkiarok, approached at the head of 50,000 men. Taticius, not able to cope with such a force, retired towards Nikomedia. Apelkasssem pursued and attacked him at Preneste; but the French, who were in the army headed by Taticius, couching their lances with their usual alert- b nefs, fell on them like lightning; and defeating them, gave Taticius leisure to retire.

APELKASSEM, with a design to conquer the islands, built ships, intending to take the city of Scio (S), seated on the sea side: but the emperor sent and burnt them in the harbour. At the same time Taticius fell on the Turks at Alykas, called also Cyparissium; and after skirmishing with them for fifteen days, at length routed them. The emperor on this wrote an obliging letter to Apelkasssem, desiring him to desist from his fruitless attempts, and invited him to come to Constantinople. That prince, understanding that Prosius had taken many lesser towns, and intended to besiege Nice, accepted of the invitation, and was received with extraordinary honours.

THE politic emperor took the opportunity, while Apelkasssem was at Constantinople, to build c a fort by the sea-side to secure Nikomedia, the capital of Bithynia (T); making the Turks, who would have opposed that design, believe that he had their Soltân's order for it, whom all the while he amused with diversions. When the fortress was finished, he loaded him with presents, gave him the title of Most August, concluded a peace with him, and sent him home by sea. The sight of that fabrick in his passage gave him much displeasure; but he thought it better to dis- semble his resentment than complain.

Nice besieged.

PROSUK soon after besieged Nice; and, having attacked it vigorously for three months, Apelkasssem sent for succour to the emperor, who sent him the flower of his troops, but with orders to act for his interest; both parties being in effect his enemies. The Roman troops, hav- ing taken the city of St. George, were admitted into Nice, and dislaid their standards. Here- d upon Prosius, believing the emperor had entered the city, raised the siege, and retired.

Alexis by artifice,

IT will be proper to observe in this place, that as soon as the great Soltân (U) (who reigned in Khorassân) was informed of the success of Tutus against Soleyman (as has been related in the life of that prince), he was alarmed; and fearing he might grow too powerful, sent a Chaus (X) to the emperor Alexis, to propose an alliance with him by way of marriage; offering, on that occasion, to withdraw the Turks settled near the sea-coasts; to abandon a certain number of small towns, and furnish him with troops, in case of need.

cities.

THE emperor, desirous to recover the places without the marriage, prevailed on the Chaus to turn christian: after which, as he had a written order from the Soltân, for the Turkish gar- e risons to quit all the maritime places as soon as the marriage was agreed on, he went to Sinopé, and shewing the order to Karatik the governor, obliged him to depart without taking any thing away (Y), and left in the hands of Dalassenes for the emperor. Having by the like artifice gotten the Turks out of other towns, and put in Roman garrisons, he returned to Constantinople, where he was baptized, and received the title of duke of Ankbiulus, with other great rewards.

again:

THE Soltân was extremely vexed when he came to hear how the Chaus had served him. Notwithstanding this, he sent a letter to the emperor, assuring him, that, provided he gave his daughter in marriage to his son, he would assist him with troops to prevent Apelkasssem's incursions, and take Antiokk (Z) from him: at the same time he sent Pusan with forces against Apelkasssem. The emperor wrote an answer, which, without granting his demand, flattered f his hopes, and sent it away. Mean time Pusan attacked Nice several times; but being repul- sed by means of the emperor's succours, drew off to Lopadion (A), on the river Lampe. As soon as he was gone, Apelkasssem, loading fourteen mules with gold, set out for Persia to obtain

After a long and fruitless solicitation he set out to return ; but was not gotten far, before he was met by 200 men, who, by the Soltân's order, strangled him. The ambassador, who carried the emperor's letter, proceeded on his journey ; but hearing, before he got to Khorassân, that the Soltân himself was assassinated (C), he returned to Constantinople.

AFTER Apelkassem had set out for Khorassân, as above-related, Pulkas, his brother, took possession of Nice ; which the emperor, by large offers, tempted him to deliver up : but he still put him off, under pretence of expecting the return of his brother. While this matter was in agitation, the two sons of Amîr Soleymân, escaping on the death of the murdered Soltân, by whom they were detained in prison, arrived at Nice ; where they were received by those who had most power with the people, and acknowledged by Pulkas, who delivered up the city into their hands. From this revolution, or restoration (which, according to the course of the Greek history, happened about the year 1093), we date the commencement of the reign of Kilij Arslân I.

(C) This was Malek Shâh, as appears from the course of time, as well as the mistaken account of his death, given in this place by our historian, as we have else

a NICE having thus, after an usurpation of several years, been restored to the heirs of Soley- Second Soltân mân ; Kilij, or Klij Arslân the eldest, whom the Greeks call Kbliziaftlan, or Kliziaftlan, assumed the reins of government. His first care was to repeople the city, by calling home the wives and children of the old inhabitants, as he designed to honour it with the ordinary residence of the Soltâns. Then, displacing Pulkas, he made Mahomet (A) governor : after which he marched towards Melicene. What was the occasion of his departure, what part of his dominions he went to, or what he did for some time after, we are intirely strangers to ; the Greek writers, to whom we are obliged for all this Soltân's history, excepting the last transaction of his reign, treating no farther of the Turkish affairs than as they concerned themselves. For this reason the reader will not be surprized if he meets frequently with chasms in the history, and sometimes the matters abruptly introduced.

b THE emperor Alexis, having been informed that Elkân, prince of the Satrapas (B), had taken Apoloniade and Cyzicum, maritime cities, and ravaged the sea coast ; sent Euphrbene, who besieged Apoloniade, and reduced the exopolis, or out-town. The Turks defended the citadel vigorously till succours arrived ; on which the Roman general withdrew, and put his men on board the ships : but Elkân having seized the mouth of the river and the bridge, they were forced to re-land, and most of them were cut off in battle. After this, Opus, being sent against him, took Cyzicum and Poemanenon by assault ; then besieging Apoloniade, forced Elkân to surrender ; who, being sent to the emperor, was very kindly received, and turned Christian *.

c WHILE Alexis was engaged in war with the Patzinacians (C), he received advice that the son of Apelkassem, governor of Nice (called Satrapa by the old, and Amiral, by the modern Persians (D), was inclined to besiege Nikomedia. At the same time Tzakas, a Turk, resolving to set up a naval force, employed a native of Smyrna for that purpose ; who having built him several vessels, and forty barks, he went and took Clazomene and Phoceæ, without much resistance ; then sending a threatening message to Alopius, governor of Mitylene, he fled : but Tzakas, finding the inhabitants of Metymne, a city of the isle seated very high, prepared to receive him, he passed on to the island of Kbio, which he took by force.

d THE emperor, on this news, sent a fleet against him, which was defeated. Then he sent another under Constantine Delassenus, his relation ; who, desirous to take Kbio while Tzakas was absent, made a breach in the wall, which obliged the Turks to implore mercy : but while the general delayed taking possession, to prevent the soldiers from putting them to the sword, the besieged repaired the breach in the night. Tzakas arrived from Smyrna at the same juncture on the other side of the isle, and marched at the head of 8000 men, followed along the coast by his fleet ; then, going on board, he encountered the Greek ships in the night : his own the Romans: Tzakas followed him slowly, and at length landing, began the attack. The French, on their approach, marched briskly against them with their lances: but the Turks, having discharged arrows at their horses, obliged them to retire in disorder to the camp, and thence openly to the ships. The Romans, dismayed by this defeat, fled likewise, and ranged themselves along the walls of the town. This emboldened the Turks to go and seize some vessels: but the sailors, cutting the cables, went and anchored with the rest at some distance from the shore. Mean time Delassenus retired to Bolissus, a town situated on a cape of the isle; and Tzakas, knowing his valour, sent to propose an accommodation.

Proposes peace: NEXT day they met; and Tzakas demanded, that what the emperor Botoniates had given him, should be delivered into his hands, and a marriage take place between his son and a daughter of the emperor; in which case he promised to restore all the islands he had conquered. It seems this Turk had been taken prisoner when young in Asia, and presented to Botoniates, who honoured him with the title of Most Noble, and with rich presents; on which he took an oath of fidelity to him, but thought himself not bound by it to Alexis. Delassenus referred him for an answer to John, the emperor's brother-in-law, who was expected with forces in a few days: but Tzakas, not caring to wait his coming, returned in the night with his fleet to Smyrna, in order to raise new forces for the conquest of the island. After which Delassenus took Bolissus, and the city of Kbio itself^b.

Augments his fleet: MEAN time Tzakas, while the emperor was at war with the Scythians, increased his fleet with an extraordinary number of ships, gathered from several ports, wherewith he resolved to plunder all the isles which refused to submit, and ravage all the western coasts. He endeavoured to excite the Scythians to subdue the Kbersonesus, and to oblige the succours to return which came from the east; making great offers to draw the Turks to espouse his cause^c. After this he assumed the name of king at Smyrna, which he made his regal seat; and fitted out a fleet to ravage the isles, and penetrate as far as the very capital of the empire.

Surrenders Mitylene: AT the beginning of spring (E) the emperor sent an army and a fleet to Mitylene; the former under the conduct of John Dukas, and the latter of Constantine Delassenus. The place was commanded by Galabatzes, brother of Tzakas, who came also in person to defend it. Dukas battered the place for three months, and often fought the enemy from morning till night without any advantage; but at last Tzakas thought fit to surrender the city, on condition that he might have liberty to return to Smyrna. This was granted him: but as he endeavoured to carry off the inhabitants of Mitylene, contrary to the treaty, Delassenus attacked him by sea, and took several barks; Tzakas himself with difficulty escaping in one of the smallest vessels. After this, Dukas retook Samos, and the other isles which that Turk had seized.

He is slain: Tzakas, as soon as he returned to Smyrna, ordered barks to be built, and galleys of two and three tire of oars, besides other light vessels, with a design to send them out as corsairs. Hereupon the emperor dispatched Delassenus with a puissant fleet, and at the same time wrote to stir up the Soltân (F) against his son-in-law, whom he represented as aspiring to the empire of the Turks. The Soltân immediately set forward with his forces, and was at Avido, which Tzakas had besieged, almost as soon as Delassenus. Tzakas having no ships with him (for his fleet was not yet equipped), and finding himself unable to oppose both the emperor and the Soltân, resolved to meet the latter, not imagining how much he was incensed against him. The Soltân received him with a great shew of friendship, and kept him to dine with him; but as soon as he found him overcome with liquor, drew his sword, and killed him with a stroke on his side^d.

Care of Alexis: THE emperor was scarcely delivered from this enemy, before he found himself obliged to march against the Komâns, who continued to make incursions into his territories: mean while the Turks took that opportunity to ravage Bithynia. When the war therefore was over, he applied himself to secure the country inclosed by the sea between the river Sangarius and a place called Cele, which was exposed to their frequent incursions. Having found a deep canal, which had been formerly dug by the emperor Anastasius to drain the marsh of Baanom, he ordered it to be cleansed and extended: but considering that in time it might become fordable, he built on the side of it an exceeding strong citadel, thence called the Iron Castle, which served for the defence of Nikomedie.

Crusaders; their cruelties: THE emperor had scarce rested from this fatigue, when Peter the hermit, author of the crusade, or holy war, arrived at Constantinople at the head of 80,000 men, devoted to the recovery of Jerusalem from the Turks. The emperor advised him to wait till Godfrey of Bul-loin, and the other princes, arrived: but Peter, confident of his own success, passed the sea, a and encamped near a small city called Helenopolis. From hence ten thousand Normans, who were among them, made an incursion as far Nice, committing the most horrible cruelties; but the garrison of that city sallying out upon them, they were obliged to retreat. After this they took Xerigorda; but Elkan (G), being sent with some troops by the Soltân, recovered that place.

THAT general, knowing the Franks to be very covetous, contrived the way how to ruin ^{justly punished:} them. He first laid his ambuscade; and then commissioned two artful persons to give out in Peter's army, that the Normans had taken Nice, and seized an immense booty. On this report they ran without any order toward that city; and falling into the ambuscade which had been laid for them near Dragon, were cut in pieces. The number slain on both sides was so great, b that their bodies being laid together made a mountain. Peter retired with a small number of his men to Helenopolis, where the Turks besieged, and would have taken him, had not the emperor sent some troops to relieve the place^c.

SOON after the rest of the western princes arriving, all crossed the strait to Civiotot, except Boemond, who marched through Bitbynia towards Nice, which the confederates invested. The Soltân sent some troops to annoy the christians; but they were defeated; as was the next day A. D. 1097. the Soltân himself; who, seeing the multitude of enemies he had to deal with, gave leave to the inhabitants of Nice to act just as they thought best for themselves. The emperor Alexis, who was encamped at Mesampele, near the town of Pelekane (for he did not care to join the Franks, whom he looked upon as a treacherous faithless people), finding that the Soltân supplied the city with both men and provisions by means of the lake (H), he advised them to attack c it on that side: and having provided proper vessels for the purpose, the lake not being deep, filled them with men, under the command of Bitumites, and set off from the side opposite to the isle of Kbio.

THE Turkish commanders were so alarmed at this unexpected sight, and the Franks making ^{def. at the Sol-} a general assault at the same time, that, on Bitumites promising a general pardon, with honours ^{â :} to the Soltân's sister and his wife (said to be the daughter of Tzakas), they delivered the city up to him; who sent off the garrison, by way of the lake, to the emperor.

PRESENTLY after, the army set forward for Antiokk in Syria; with whom the emperor sent a body of troops commanded by Taticius. Being arrived in two days at a place called Leuka, d they thought fit to separate, and let Boemond go before, as he desired. The Turks discover- A. D. 1097. ing him in the plain of Dorylaeum, fell upon him vigorously, and killed forty of his best men; whereupon, being also himself dangerously wounded, he retreated to the army. As they advanced in companies, they met, near a place called Ebraik, the Soltân Tanisman (I) and Hassan, who alone was at the head of 80,000 men. The battle was very obstinate; when Boemond, perceiving the Turks fought with more vigour than their enemies, fell with the right wing like a lion on the Soltân Kliziaslân (K), or Kilij Arslân, and put them to flight. Soon after, they met the Turks near Augustopolis, and defeated them a second time. After which they suffered them to continue their march to Antiokk, without daring to appear.

THE emperor thought this a good opportunity to recover other places from the Turks. The emperor e Tzakas had seized Smyrna; Hangripermes was in possession of Ephesus: other robbers were ^{recovers} masters of different places: Kbio, Rhodes, and several other islands, were in their hands, from whence they scoured all the adjacent seas. To prevent these depredations, he fitted out a large fleet, under the command of John Dukas, who carried with him the daughter of Tzakas, to convince the pirates that the city was taken. Being come to Avido, he gave the command A. D. 1097. of the fleet to Kaspaces, in order to attack Smyrna by sea, while he besieged it by land. The Smyrna, inhabitants, terrified, immediately surrendered upon terms, and Kaspaces was made governor, but did not long enjoy his post: for having ordered a Turk before him, who had stolen a sum of money; the fellow thinking they were carrying him to execution, in despair drew his sword, and stabbed the governor in the belly, mixing himself at the same time with the croud. The f soldiers and seamen were so enraged at this murder, that they put 10,000 inhabitants to the sword.

FROM Smyrna Dukas marched to Ephesus, where, after a bloody battle which lasted near Ephesus, and the whole day, he defeated Tangripermes and Maraces. The remainder of the Turkish forces fled up the Mæander to Polybotum. Dukas pursued them; and in the way took Sardes and Philadelphia by assault. Laodicea submitted to him. Then, passing by Kome, he forced other places. MEAN time the emperor Alexis prepared to succour the Franks, who were besieged by the Turks in Antiokk; and being arrived at Filomelion, cut in pieces a great number of their troops, and recovered several places out of their hands. But hearing that Ismael (L), son of the Soltân of Khorassân, was advancing at the head of a vast army; he thought it most prudent to return with his prisoners and plunder, after he had given notice to the inhabitants in and about Polybotum to provide for their safety. Ismael advancing, laid siege to the fort of Paipert, which the famous Theodorus Gaurus had taken but a little while before, with a design to observe the passage of the Turks, and make incursions upon them.

Army of Normans. ABOUT that time there arrived at Constantinople an army of Normans, 100,000 foot and 50,000 horse, commanded by the two brothers of Flanders. The emperor would have had them taken the same road which the other Franks had followed; but their design was not, it seems, to join the confederates of the crusade, but to march into the east, and conquer Khorassân itself. Having passed the straits of Civitot, they went and took Ancyra. After they had crossed the Halys, they came to a little city belonging to the Romans; where the priests coming out to meet them, with the cross and gospel in their hands, they were so barbarous as to put them all to the sword. The Turks, who are very skilful warriors, took care to carry off all the provisions in the country thro' which they passed; and being near Amasia, after defeating, hemmed them in so closely, that they had no opportunity to pasture their horses.

slain by the Turks. THE Normans in despair rushed upon their enemy: but the Turks, instead of engaging them at a distance with the bow or lance, came to close fight with their swords, and made a dreadful slaughter. Upon this, they asked the Count of St. Giles and Tzitas, whom the emperor had sent with them for their assistance, if there was not some country belonging to the empire near at hand, which they might fly to; and being informed that there was, immediately abandoned their camp and baggage, flying to the maritime parts of Armenia and Pauraca. The horse for haste leaving the infantry behind, they were all slain by the Turks, excepting a few, whom they reserved as it were to shew in Khorassân. The Count and Tzitas returned, with the horse which escaped, to Constantinople; from whence the emperor sent the Count by sea to Tripoly in Syria, where he proposed to continue the siege; but died soon after he landed, leaving his possessions to his nephew William ^d.

Rebellion of Gregory. IN the fourteenth indiction, Gregory, governor of Trebizond, who had revolted two years before, intended to shut himself up in the castle of Kolonia, which was reckoned impregnable, and to implore the protection of Tanisman the Turk before-mentioned; but being pursued by John Comnenus the emperor's nephew, and his cousin, was taken, and sent to Constantinople ^e.

WE must now quit the Greek historian, to close this reign with an account of the last action and death of Kilij Arslân, which the Greeks were strangers to; and altho' it is the only matter relating to this Soltân which has been communicated to us from the oriental authors, yet it serves to give us a greater idea of his power than all the transactions already recited.

Soltân takes Musol. THE inhabitants of Musol (Mausel, or Mosul) having been besieged by Al Jaweli (M), who had taken their prince Jagarmish prisoner, sent to offer Kilij Arslân, lord of Konia, or Ikonium (N) and Aksara, the possession of their city, in case he would come to their relief. Hereupon Kilij Arslân, hastening with his forces, took possession of Musol, Jaweli retiring on his approach. He pitched his camp in a place called Al Mogreka, where Zenji, son of Jagarmish, with his friends, repairing to him, he honoured them all with kaftâns or vests. Then sitting in a throne, he ordered the name of Soltân Mohammed (O) to be suppressed in the pulpits, and his own mentioned in place of it.

is drowned. THIS done, he marched against Al Jaweli, who was at Roba; but being met by him at the river Khabîr (P), was put to flight. Kilij Arslân plunged into the river, with an intent to cross it; but, while he defended himself with his bow against the enemy, his horse carrying him out of his depth, he was drowned. Some days after his body was found floating on the water, and buried at Al Shamsânia (Q). This event is placed, by our author, in the year 500 of the Hejrah ^f, which answers to that of Christ 1106.

Defects of authors. IT is remarkable that D'Herbelot, under the name of this Soltân, has given only an abstract of the foregoing transaction from Abû'lfaraj ⁱ; which seems to shew, that there is nothing to tals call Ikonium; and the latter Greeks, Kogni, or Konni.

- a be found in Kondamir, and the other authors whom he made use of, concerning that prince. But in supplying their defect from the Syrian annalist, he has also adopted his chronology, which contradicts theirs: for Abû'lfaraj makes the reign of Kilij Arslân, to end in the same year that they will have it commence; and we prefer his authority to theirs, for the same reason which induced us to give the preference to Ebn Amîd, with regard to the year of the death of his father Soleymân. respecting this prince.

ACCORDING to their reckoning, Kilij Arslân reigned eighteen years; according to ours, fourteen: but the Nigbiaristân gives him only four years to his reign. The same authors also make his son Massîd to have been his immediate successor; whereas we have taken the liberty, on what we judge to be sufficient authority, to put in one between them.

S E C T. IV.

The reign of Soltân Sayfan.

- b T H E R E is no mention of a Soltân with the name of Sayfan, among the oriental historians; Third Soltân, but we have already shewn, from their inaccuracy, and other imperfections with regard Sayfan; to this dynasty, that there are sufficient grounds to believe, that there were more princes in the succession than those of whom they give us the names. It is confessed also, that some of them reckon fifteen Soltâns; and if so, the chronological chasm, which has been remarked between the reign of Kilij Arslân I. and Rokno'ddin Soleymân, leaves room for introducing one here. Although Abû'lfaraj agrees with Kondamir in naming the first ten Soltâns, yet, as he does not mentioned only tell their number or rank in the succession, and but barely mentions some, and that only occasionally; so he may possibly have omitted the name of one or more, especially in this interval we are speaking of; which appears, from his dates of facts, to be very wide, at the same time that they help to fill up the chasm, by giving a much greater length of reign to the princes he mentions, than the other oriental authors have assigned them. In this he agrees with those Greek historians whom we have chosen to follow in our account of the Soltâns. In short, as the eastern historians afford us scarce any memoirs relating to the first Soltâns of this dynasty, it is but just that we should be governed by the authority of the Byzantine writers, to whom we are almost wholly beholden for our materials.

- IT is true, we find Kbliziaftlan, or Kilij Arslân, spoken of by Anna Comnenâ, as Soltân of Kogni, or Ikonium, till the very last action of this reign: but then the sudden transition, in the account of that action, from Kbliziaftlan to Sayfan, as Soltân of Kogni, shews that the historian was all the while speaking of one and the same person; for there could not be two Soltâns of Kogni at the same time: nor do we find any farther mention of Kbliziaftlan. It cannot be thought that by this latter is meant Kilij Arslân, the former Soltân, according to the Greek custom of prolonging the reigns of princes; because he is said to be in the vigour of his youth; and as the same quality is ascribed to Sayfan, it is a farther proof that those two names are given to the same person. However that was, Sayfan must have been the son of the former Soltân, since he is called the brother of Masûd, or Massîd; who was the son of Kilij Arslân, according to the unanimous consent of the oriental historians.

HAVING premised these few remarks, which are necessary both to justify the innovation we have introduced, and obviate what at first appears to be a very great difficulty, if not a sort of contradiction, we shall proceed to the history.

- e T H E coast of Asia having, by the late wars, been ruined, from Smyrna to Attalia, and those Greeks, their once populous and stately cities become heaps of rubbish, the emperor sent Filokales to restore barbarity; them. That nobleman first rebuilt Endromit, or Adromitium (which had been so totally destroyed A D. 1106.] by Tzakas, that there remained no signs of its habitations), and peopled it with the peasants and strangers (A). After this, being informed that the Turks were gathering near Lampis, he sent thither some troops, who cut part of them in pieces, and took a great number prisoners, using their victory so cruelly, that they boiled children to death. The Turks who remained put on mourning clothes, and went over the country to excite their companions to vengeance.

- AT the same time Filokales reduced Philadelphia without any trouble: but soon after Hassan, take Phila- one of the prime commanders, who governed almost absolutely in Cappadocia, hearing of the delphia. barbarities exercised by the Romans, came at the head of 24,000 men, and besieged the place. Filokales, who was a man of stratagem, not having forces to take the field, forbade the inhabitants either to open the gates, appear on the walls, or make the least noise. Hassan, having been before the town three days, and seen no person appear, concluded that the besieged had neither forces nor courage enough to make sallies: hereupon he divided his army; sending 10,000 men to Kelbiana, another party toward Smyrna, and a third towards Cliara and Pergamus.

with orders to ravage the country; and followed with another party himself. As soon as a Filokales saw the Turks parted into bodies, he sent troops to attack them one by one: they accordingly came up with, and defeated, the two first detachments, killing a great number of men; but could not overtake either of the others, who were gotten too far before.

Sa; fan makes peace.

A. D. 1108.]

SOME time after, Amîr Sayfan marched from the east, with a design to ravage Philadelphia, and the maritime cities. The emperor, on this advice, sent a small body of troops up the river Skamander to Endromit and Tbrakesion, to wait his orders. Gauras commanded at that time at Philadelphias, with a strong garrison, and Monastras at Pergamus. The army sent by the Soltân of Khorasân advanced in two bodies; one of them crossed mount Sina, and the other marched into Asia minor. Gauras went out to meet these latter; and coming up with them at Kelbiana, routed them. When the Soltân (B), who had sent them, heard of this defeat, b he dispatched ambassadors to the emperor; who, after he had put several questions to them concerning their master (C), concluded a peace with them.

Turks new ir-

HE had not been long at rest, before he was alarmed with a new irruption of 50,000 Turks, come from Anatolia, and even from Khorasân. The emperor, on this news, passed the strait from Constantinople to Damalis (†); and though in the gout, got into a chariot, which he drove himself. In three days he arrived at Aigyla, where he embarked for Civitol (D). As soon as he landed, he was informed that the commanders of the enemy had divided their forces into separate bodies; one was to scour the country about Nice; and Monolikus to ravage the sea-coast: other parties had done the like about Prusa, Apoloniade, and Lopadion; and had taken Cyzicus by assault; the governor making no resistance. The two prin- c cipal Soltâns, Kontogma and Amîr Mahomet, were gone to Pæmanene, by the country of the Lencians, with infinite women and children (E), whose lives they had saved: and Monolikus, having crossed Barene (which, like the Skamander, the Augilocometes, the Ampelle, and many other rivers, descends from the mountain Ibibes), was turned towards Pæreon, having passed by Avido, Endromit, and Cliara, with a great number of slaves, but without shedding blood.

Kamytzes.

HEREUPON Alexis ordered Kamytzes, governor of Nice, to follow the Turks, with 500 men, to watch their motions, but to avoid fighting. The governor came up with all the Soltâns (F), and forgetting his orders, attacked them briskly. The enemy having heard of the emperor's march, and concluding that he was fallen upon them with all his forces, betook themselves to flight: but being made sensible of their mistake by a prisoner they took, rallied their forces; d and having met with Kamytzes, who stayed to divide the spoil, instead of getting into Pæmanene, attacked him at break of day. His soldiers all fled, except the Scythians, the French, and a few Romans, who fought valiantly: but most of them being at length slain, and his horse killed, he set his back against an oak, and laid about him incessantly with his poniard, killing or wounding all who came within his reach. The Turks surprized at so much valour, and being desirous to preserve him, Amîr Mohammed alighted off his horse, and putting aside those who fought with him, said, Give me your hand, and prefer life to death. Kamytzes, unable to resist such a multitude, gave his hand to Mohammed, who ordered him to be tied on horseback, that he might not escape.

His bravery.

Alexis.

THE emperor mistrusting the road which the Turks had taken, took another. He passed e by Nice; then crossed Malagna and Bosilicus, two very narrow passes of the mountain Olympus. After this he marched to Aletines, and thence to Acrocus, with design to get before the enemy. There being informed that they were incamped in a valley full of reeds, where they thought themselves in no danger from him, he fell upon them with his forces, killed a great number, and took a great number prisoners. The rest thought to escape by lying concealed among the thick reeds: nor could the soldiers come at them for that reason, and the marshiness of the place: but Alexis having ordered the reeds at one end to be fired, the Turks flew from the flames into the hands of the Romans, who killed one part of them, and carried off the other.

surprised.

AMIR MOHAMMED, having been joined by the Turkmâns, and some other people of Asia minor, appeared at the same instant to give the emperor battle; and though Alexis opened a f way for himself, by defeating those he pursued, yet Mohammed came up with the rear, commanded by Ampelas and Tzipureles; who running full speed against the Turks, Mohammed, who well knew how to make use of an advantage, finding them at a distance from their soldiers,

(B) In the title of the chapter he is called Soltân Sayfan; but he was not Soltân of Khorasân: and just before he is called only an Amîr, or commander.

(C) Yet the historian gives no account of this Soltân, nor even his name.

(†) The Bosphorus was called Damalis from thence. It is the same with Fskudar, or Skutari.

(E) These were reprisals for the cruelties committed before by the Greeks.

(F) As if there were many Soltâns at this time in Asia minor. But we have already observed that the Greeks made no distinction between Soltân and Amîr, king and commander; for they often miscall or mistake one for the other.

a shot not at them but their horses; which bringing them down, they were surrounded and slain. For all this, his troops were put to flight by those left to guard the baggage and the horses; in which confusion Kamitzes made his escape^a.

Not long after this, Soltân Soleymân ordered his troops of Khorasân and Halep to over-run Succers of the and plunder all Asia minor. The emperor, to prevent him, intended to carry the war to the Turks, gates of Kogni, or Konyab, where Khliziaftlan (G) commanded: but while forces were raising, A. D. 1114] he was seized violently with the gout, which hindered his design. Mean time Khliziaftlan ravaged the country seven times over. The Turks, who judged the emperor's disorder to be only a pretence to cover his want of courage, made game of him over their cups, and acted comedies, wherein they represented Alexis lying in his bed, surrounded with physicians, upon the em- b who sometimes consulted, and sometimes went about to give him ease; after which they set up peror. a horse-laugh. The emperor at length, landing at Civiotot, came to Fort St. George, near the lake of Nice; then proceeding three days march, he encamped near the bridge of Lopadion, on the rivulet of Karyceum. The Turks, who had ravaged the plain which is at the foot of the Leuciennian mountains and Kolerecia, on the news of his approach, retired with their plunder. The emperor followed them to Pæmanene, and then sent some light troops after them. These overtaking them at Kellia, killed many, and recovered part of the spoil.

ALEXIS returning, went to take the air at the pass of Malagna, on the top of mount Olym- pus; whither the empress came to him from the Prince's Isle (†). There being informed that the Turks were at hand, he marched towards Nice; but the enemy, without waiting for him, c fled. However, being overtaken by two of his generals, who from the top of the Germinian mountains observed their motions, they were defeated.

THE emperor being arrived at Fort St. George, passed on to the town of Sagydeum, and thence to Helenopolis, where the empress waited for a wind to return to Constantinople. Presently news being brought of another irruption of the Turks, Alexis marched to Lopadion, and thence to Kbio; where being informed that the enemy were at Nice, he retired to Miskura: but understanding afterwards that they were only flying parties, who appeared about that city and Doryleum to observe his motions, and not thinking himself yet sufficiently strong to follow them to Kogni, he turned towards Nicomedia. The enemy judging, by this motion, that he had no design to attack them, took their former posts, and renewed their incursions; which d was what the emperor had in view: however, it gave occasion to his enemies at court to reproach him with doing nothing, after raising so considerable an army.

WHEN the spring was past, Alexis judged it time to put his first design in execution, and march to Kogni. From Nice he passed to Gaita, and the bridge of Pithicus; then having in three days advanced to Armenocæstra and Leucas, he arrived in the vast plain of Doryleum, where he reviewed his army, and contrived a new method of drawing up his forces in battle. He found that the Turks did not fight like other people, joining their bucklers and bodies close together; but divided their troops into a main body and two wings, like three different armies: that when one was attacked, the others ran to its assistance with extreme ardour: they did not make use of lances, like the French, but endeavoured to inclose their enemies, and e kill them with arrows: that their usual way of fighting was at a distance; and, whether pursuing or pursued, they made use only of the bow, which they drew with such force, that, even though they shot when flying, they never failed to pierce either the man who followed them, or his horse.

For this reason the emperor ordered his army to be drawn up in such a manner, that his soldiers should oppose their bucklers to the side from whence the Turks shot; and that others should shoot on that side which the Turks laid open to them in shooting. Having arrived at Santabaris in this new disposition, he divided his forces, in order to execute several different designs. He sent Kamytzes, with one party, to Polybote and Kedreum, where Pulkbeas was governor; and Stypeotes with another, to attack Amerion (H). When Kamytzes arrived at f Kedreum, Pulkbeas and his soldiers were fled. Then marching to Polybotum, he slew the garrison, and retook the spoil. Stypeotes had the like success at Pæmanene.

THE emperor, being ready to set out from Kedreum to Polybote and Kogni, was informed that Soltân Soleymân had set fire to all the forage through Asia minor; and that another army of Turks was coming to oppose him: he consulted God, to know whether he should march towards Kogni, or give battle to the Turks, who were coming from Filomilion. Having written

It is observable here, that he who was actually Soltân is styled only a commander, governor, or general; while Soleymân, who was only a commander, is called Soltân. Or did Soleymân, called the son of old Soleymân by the crusade writers, reign at the same time in the west, about Nice?

(H) The same, we conceive, with Amurium, or Amorium.

these two questions on two pieces of paper, he laid them in the evening on the altar, and ^a spent the night in prayer. In the morning the bishop entered, and taking up the first paper which came to hand (I), unfolded it, and read it aloud, whereby he was determined to go to Filomilion. Mean time Badrâs, having passed the bridge of Zompi, defeated a large body of Turks in the plain of Omorion; while another pillaged his camp. Being pressed hard afterwards by a third party, the emperor came up timely to rescue him. Alexis, having passed Mesonæte, near the lake of forty martyrs, arrived at Filomilion, which he took by force. From hence he detached divers parties to ravage the towns and villages about Kogni; which they did, bringing away vast multitudes of Turks, and a prodigious quantity of plunder: they were followed by infinite crouds of peasants, who came to take refuge in the emperor's dominions.

^b Turks attack him. THE emperor returning by the same road he went, in order of battle, for a long time met with no Turks, although Monolykus kept on one side of him with some troops. But being come to the plain between Polybote and the above-mentioned lake, the enemy appeared. Monolykus (K), who was a man in years, and of great experience, began the attack, and continued it all the day, without making any impression on the Roman ranks. Next day Soltân Kbliziaftlan arrived; and though he was no less surprized at the new disposition of the Roman army than Monolykus, yet being in the heat of youth, he reproached that old man with fear, for not giving them battle. At the same instant the Soltân attacked the rear, and sent two bodies to fall on the van, and one of the wings.

^c Soltân's narrow escape. THE Turks fought bravely. Andronicus Porphyrogenitus, the emperor's son, who commanded the left wing, was killed. Nicephorus Bryennius (L), who was at the head of the right, fearing the van would be defeated, ran to its assistance: upon which the Turks, with Soltân Kbliziaftlan, turned their backs, and reascended the hills. As those who escaped fled different ways, the Soltân, with his cup-bearer, got into a chapel, upon a mount planted with cypress, where they were followed by three Scythians and a Greek, who took the cup-bearer; but Kbliziaftlan, not being known to them, had the good fortune to escape. The night being come, the Turks assembled on the tops of hills, lighted a great number of fires, and barked like dogs (M).

^d Proposes a treaty. NEXT day the baggage, women, and children, being placed in the middle, the army marched towards Amprus; but on the way, the Soltân having assembled all his forces, inclosed and attacked them courageously: however he could not break their ranks, which stood as firm as a wall of adamant. Being vexed and ashamed that he was not able to get any advantage against the emperor, he held a council in the night; and at break of day sent to treat of peace.

^e Peace concluded. ALEXIS, who was then in the plain between Augustopolis and Aoronium, caused his army to halt, in the order they then were, and went to the place of interview, with his relations and chief officers, guarded by some soldiers. The Soltân came presently after, accompanied by all his officers, with Monolykus at their head; who, as soon as they came in sight, alighted and saluted the emperor. The Soltân would have done the same, but Alexis hindered him: however, when he was near, he alighted, and kissed the foot of that prince, who presented him his hand, and ordered a horse to be brought for him. Then taking off his mantle, he put it on the Soltân. After this, entering on the subject of peace, Alexis agreed that he should remain in possession of all the territories which the Turks were masters of before the reign of Dio- genes, and the battle in which he was taken prisoner. Next day the Soltân and his officers signed the treaty; after which the emperor made them rich presents.

^f Massîd conspires WHILE this affair was transacting, Alexis having discovered that Massîd had conspired to assassinate Soltân Saysan (N), his brother, he advised him to stay with him till the plot was blown over: but trusting in his own power, he resolved to return: nor would so much as accept of a guard to escort him to Kogni; although he had a dream the night before which might have made him less rash. He thought a great swarm of flies surrounded him while at dinner, and snatched the bread out of his hand; and that, when he went to drive them away, they changed into lions. Next morning he asked a Roman soldier the meaning of his dream; who told him, that the insults of the flies and lions seemed to denote a conspiracy of enemies. For all this the Soltân would believe nothing, but continued his journey with more obstinacy than before.

against his brother; HOWEVER, he sent his spies abroad, who indeed met with Massîd at the head of an army: but having espoused his interest, they went back, and told Saysan that they had seen nobody

(I) Were the emperor and bishop in earnest, or was it a contrivance to reconcile the army to his measures?

(M) The author often throws reflections of this kind on the Turks.

(N) Here is a sudden transition from Kbliziaftlan to Saysan; whom, for the reasons already alleged, we take to be the same person. Although he is introduced in such a manner, that, at first sight, he seems to be a different Soltân.

a on the road ; so that the Soltân proceeding forward without any mistrust, fell into the snare. As soon as he came in sight, Gazi, son of the commander Hassan Katuk, whom Saysan had put to death, set spurs to his horse, and gave him a stroke with his lance ; which Saysan snatching out of his hands, said with an air of contempt, I did not know that women carried arms. Pulkbeas, who was in his train, and held a correspondence with his brother Masût, pretending great zeal for his service, advised him to retire to Tyganion (O), a small city near Filomilion, where he was very kindly received by the inhabitants, who knew he had made peace (P) with the emperor, under whose obedience they were.

MASUT came presently after, and invested the place ; on the walls of which Saysan appeared, ^{who is be- trayed.} and reproached his subjects with their perfidiousness ; threatening them with the coming of the Romans, and a punishment suitable to their crime. These menaces were supported by the vigorous resistance made by the besieged. It was then that Pulkbeas discovered his treachery : for, coming down from the wall, as if with design to encourage the inhabitants to defend the place, he assured them, that there was a powerful army on the road to assist the besiegers ; and that they had no other way to prevent being plundered, than to surrender at discretion. The citizens, following his counsel, delivered Saysan up to his enemies ; who having no instrument with them fit for putting out his eyes, made use of a candlestick (Q), which the emperor had given him, to deprive him of his sight. When he was brought to Kogni, he declared to his foster-father that he could see. The foster-father told this to his wife ; who kept the secret so well, that it became public in few days ; so that coming to the ears of Masût, it put him in such a rage, that he forthwith ordered Elgam, one of his commanders, to go and strangle ^{and strangled.} his unhappy brother ^b.

ALTHOUGH this account of Saysan is but lamely introduced, and, for want of some identical marks, he may seem to be a different person from Kbliziaftlan, yet, from the circumstances of the whole, we presume, they appear clearly enough to be the same Soltân, under two different names : or rather that, through inadvertence in compiling from two different memoirs, the name of Kbliziaftlan has been put, in some places, for that of Saysan.

THIS event happened about the year of Christ 1116 (R), which gives a reign of ten years to this Soltân.

^b ANN. COMN. in Alex. l. xv. c. 1—7.

(O) Where was his army ? where was Monolykus, the great Soltân (as he is called), and the other Soltân, who were with him the day before ? did they all desert him in this time of danger ? or did he put more confidence in Pulkbeas than any of them ?

(P) This is a farther argument that Saysan is the same with Kbliziaftlan.

(Q) Ey making it red hot, and holding it before his eyes.

(R) This date we gather from the death of the emperor Alexis. For we are told by his daughter and historian, Anna Comnena (1), that a year and a half after his return from the above-mentioned expedition against the Turks of Kogni, he was seized with a grievous distemper, brought on by a wrong treatment of the gout, which held him six months, at the end whereof he died.

The reign of Soltân Massûd.

a ALTHOUGH D'Herbelot, in his table of Soltâns, taken from Kondamir, places Massûd ^{Fourth Soltân,} as the third Soltân, yet in the article under his name, or rather another prince of the Massûd, same name ^a, he says he was the fourth. This is conformable to the author of the Nighiaristân, who makes the number of the Soltâns to be fifteen, contrary to the general opinion of the Persian historians : these historians connect the beginning of Massûd's reign, as the third Soltân, with the year of the Hejrah 500, or of Christ 1106 : but in case he was the fourth, it must fall lower of course : and on a supposition that he succeeded his brother Saysan, after putting him to death, according to the testimony of Anna Comnena, his reign will commence in the year ^{begins his reign,} of Christ 1116. ^{Hej. 613.}

D'HERBELOT has imparted nothing more from the oriental authors (if they afford any- thing more) than the single circumstance inserted above, which serves only to contradict the system he has adopted, and support ours. Nor has Abû'lfaraj mentioned more than two facts relating to this prince : but the Byzantine historians, as hitherto, have supplied us pretty well on their side, with materials for a history of his reign.

THE emperor John Comnenus, who succeeded Alexis, finding that the Turks (A), instead of ^{Emperor takes} keeping their treaties made with his father, sacked several cities of Phrygia, about the Meander, ^{Sozopolis;} ^{A. D. 1120.}

marched against, and defeated them; after which he took Laodicea, and inclosed it with walls; ^a then returned to Constantinople; but soon after departed, in order to recover Sozopolis, in the same country. As the city was defended by a strong garrison, and surrounded with precipices, he ordered some troops to hover at a distance, and shoot at the inhabitants. This drawing them into the plain, as the emperor expected, and while they pursued the Romans who fled, they were cut off by an ambuscade; by which stratagem the city fell into his hands. He reduced likewise a fort called the Spar-hawk, and several other lesser places, which the enemy had mastered ^b.

also Kastamona;
A. D. 1122.
A. D. 1124.] SOME time after this he marched into Paphlagonia, and took Kastamona: but, upon his return to Constantinople, Tanisman, a Turk of Armenia, mentioned in the former reign, who commanded in Cappadocia, recovered it, and put the garrison to the sword. On this advice ^b the emperor set forward the second time: and when he came before the city, was informed that Tanisman was dead, and that Mohammed, who was at variance with Masût, governor of Kogni (B), was in possession of it. Hereupon he made an alliance with Masût; and having received a reinforcement from him, marched against Mohammed: but the latter, by his persuasions, prevailed on the Soltân to withdraw his troops; so that the emperor was obliged to make use of his own forces. With these he retook Kastamona, and then besieged Gangra, a very powerful city of Pontus, which had been subdued not long before by the enemy. Having battered the walls for some time in vain with his engines, he removed them to a little eminence, which commanded the place: and, by beating down the houses about their ears, obliged the inhabitants to surrender. Then leaving 2000 men in garrison, returned with many prisoners to his capital. ^c

Invades Armenia,
A. D. 1130.] HE had not been long at home, before he marched against Leon, king of Lesser Armenia (C), who had taken several places, and besieged Seleucia. The emperor gained the pass into that country without opposition; and not content with reducing Adana and Tarsus, resolved to conquer the whole kingdom. He took, either by force or capitulation, a great many forts; and, among the rest, Boka, strongly situated on a steep rock. Then he proceeded to Anazarba, a very populous city, standing on a steep rock, and inclosed with strong walls. After battering the first wall, and entering by the breaches, much blood was spilt in forcing the second wall; the principal Armenians, who had fled there for refuge, making a very brave defence: but the place was taken at last. ^d and Syria.

A. D. 1132.] AFTER this he marched into Syria, where he took Pisa, on the Euphrates, Serep, Kasferda, and Istria; but was obliged to raise the siege of Sezer (D), and so returned to Antiokk. From thence he marched back, in order of battle; and, in the way, sent part of his army to ravage the country about Kogni, in reprisal for invading his territories during his absence ^e.

Defeats the Turks
A. D. 1135.] SOME little time after, the emperor crossed over into Asia, to disperse the Turks, who laid waste the country adjoining to the river Sangarius. This done, he marched into Armenia, to put a stop to their incursions in that province, and curb the insolence of Constantine Gauras, who had seized on Trebizond, and erected a kind of tyranny. Mohammed, before-mentioned, at that time commanded at Cæsarea; and, having reduced Iberia, with part of Mesopotamia, was grown very rich. He boasted of being descended from Arfaces, and the modern family of the Tanismans, who were the greatest enemies the Romans had in the east in that age. The emperor suffered great inconveniencies in the enemies country, from the severe cold, and want of provisions, which destroyed most of the horses in his army. Of this the Turks took some advantage; but being at length repulsed, the emperor returned to Neocesarea (E), where he had several skirmishes with them, but did not recover that city; which was owing, in great measure, to John Comnenus, his brother Isaac's son: who repenting that his uncle should order him to give one of his horses to an Italian, who had lost his own, went over to the Turks, and changing his religion, married, as it was said, the daughter of Masût, at Kogni. ^e

Recovers some places.
A. D. 1138.] THE same year he marched into Phrygia, to Attalia, a famous city (F), in order to repress the incursions of the Turks, who had, amongst the rest, seized Palus Pugusianus. This is a lake ^f of vast extent, with many isles in it; whose inhabitants, by trading with the enemy, had become so much their friends, that they joined in opposing the emperor. But by means of vessels, and engines, with which he battered the isles, he reduced them at last, though not without the loss of some barks and men ^d.

Massûd takes Mulatayah. WHILE these things were doing in the west, it may be presumed that Massûd was extending his dominions in the east: but we are informed of none of his exploits on that side, but one,

Now let us return to the affairs of the Greeks. John Comnenus dying in 1143, his son Emperor Manuel succeeded him. One of his cares was to march against the Turks, who ravaged Thrace, and attempted to take the fort of Pithecana. Having put them to flight, he crossed Lydia, and freed the cities of Phrygia, near the Meander, from their fears. Near Pilemelion he engaged the enemy, and was wounded in the heel by a soldier whom he had pierced with his lance; for he exposed himself to danger even more than his father. From thence he pushed on directly for Kogni, at which time Mas'ut was gone to encamp at Taxara, formerly called Colonia (G). Being set down before the city, the wife of John Comnenus, before-mentioned, spoke very notably from the wall, in behalf of her father Mas'ut. The emperor retired, after going round the town; and was forced to fight several battles on the road, to open a way back for his army. ^{A. D. 1144.}

In the year 1146, Conrade, emperor of Germany, and other Christian princes who had taken the cross, came to Constantinople, in the way (by land) to Syria, intending to pass through Lesser Asia. The Greeks were in such haste to get rid of them, that the whole maine was employed to ship them over. The emperor Manuel took some care about their subsistence: but, at the same time, ordered snares to be laid for them in the difficult passages; by which means a great number of them perished. The inhabitants of cities in their march, instead of receiving and supplying them freely with provisions, from the top of the walls drew up their money in baskets, and then let down as much bread for it as they thought fit themselves: there were even some, who spoiled the flour, and mixed it with lime. But our author is not sure that all this was done by the emperor's order, as was given out; although it was certain that he had ordered base silver to be coined, wherewith to pay them for the goods they sold. In a word, there is no mischief which Manuel did not contrive, or cause to be contrived against them; that their posterity might, by the misfortune of their ancestors, be deterred from ever setting foot on Roman ground.

The Germans and French had not marched far into Asia, before they were met by the Turkish army, commanded by one Pamplan; who, excited by the letters of Manuel, and animated by his example, fought and defeated them. They afterwards appeared at the Meander, to oppose their passage: but Conrade spurring his horse into the river, his army followed; and getting over, fell on the Turks with such fury, that scarce any escaped. The slaughter might be judged by the vast mountains of bones in that place, which our author Nicetas had himself beheld with astonishment. The same historian tells us, that after this famous victory, the Germans met with no enemy to oppose them, during the remainder of their march. But we are informed by the western writers who should know best, that the disappearance of the enemy lasted only till the Franks came to Ikonium, the capital of the Turkish dominions in Lesser Asia. This city they closely invested: but it was so strongly fortified both by nature and art, as well as bravely defended by the Turks, that though they had lain a long time before the place, they made no progress in taking it. At length provisions failing in their camp, such a mortality ensued among the soldiers, that the emperor Conrade was glad to raise the siege, and return home. The cause of this mortality, and overthrow of the whole expedition, is generally ascribed, by the said writers, to the Greeks, mixing lime with the meal which they brought to sell, by the connivance of their emperor; whom they charge likewise with betraying the designs of the Christians to the Soltân Mas'ut, or Mahmût, as some name him ^f.

THESE are all the transactions mentioned by the Greeks, during the reign of Mas'ut: to which we have only one more to add, from Abû'lfaraj; namely, that in the year of the Hejrab 546, Juslin (H), having taken Nuro'ddin's armour-bearer prisoner, sent him to Mas'ud, who was Nuro'ddin's father-in-law, with a threatening answer ^e. This fact is of little significance, but as it serves to settle the length of this Soltân's reign; which is thus brought down with certainty to this period; and, from circumstances produced hereafter from the Byzantine historians, it is probable that he lived two or three years longer. But, supposing that he died at the end of the year 1152, this will bring the end of his reign fifteen years lower in the century than a calculation made from the years of his reigning assigned by the Persian historians; and gives it a length of thirty-seven years, which is double, within one year to what they have given it: but on a supposition that he, and not Saysan, immediately succeeded his father, he will then have a reign of forty-seven years. This goes a great way to fill up the chronological chasm which those historians have left in the succession of these Soltâns; and, by the still longer reign of his son and successor we shall be able to accomplish it.

The reign of Soltân Kilij Arslân II.

Kilij Arslân II.*

IT is agreed, both by the Greek and oriental historians, that Kilij Arslân II. succeeded his father Massûd in the Soltânat of Rûm: but this circumstance is all the account which we have received from the Persian authors, relating to this prince, except the length of his reign; which they have made shorter by three-fourths than it ought to be. This confirms the suspicion, that they have no memoirs relating to the first Seljûkian Soltâns of Rûm. In effect, D'Herbelot, as before, has given nothing under the article of Kilij Arslân II. but what he takes from Abû'lfaraj^a; and that is no more than a short account of the troubles which befel him, on dividing his dominions among his sons a few years before his death, and which is to be found in the Byzantine historians: so that our readers may be said to be indebted to them for every thing concerning this Soltân, excepting only the time of his death, which is fixed by Abû'lfaraj.

Jagupasan.
A. D. 1161.]*

MASUT, or Massûd, emperor of the Turks, at his death divided his dominions and provinces among his sons. He gave to Kbliziaftlan, or Kilij Arslân, his capital Kogni, with the places depending on it; to his son-in-law Jagupasan (A) the cities of Amasia and Ancyra, with Cappadocia, that fruitful country: and to Dadun the cities of Cæsarea and Sebaste. The three brothers did not long live in unity: for the Soltâns of Kogni and Cappadocia, envy each other's possessions, carried their complaints before the emperor Manuel, who secretly widened the breach between them; though he openly agreed to assist Jagupasan, through the aversion which he had to the Soltân, a prince of a dark and gloomy disposition, who studied the death of all his kindred, and often made incursions on the Roman territories.

JAGUPASAN, elated with this reinforcement, attacked the Soltân, who fought several battles, with pretty equal success; but victory at length declaring for the former, he laid down his arms, and continued for some time in repose.

Manuel.*

THE Soltân, after this, went to meet the emperor on his return to Constantinople, from his expedition to the west (B), and was received with joy; as he imagined his presence would serve to settle his affairs in the east. A triumph was ordered on that occasion; but the people were so affrighted with an earthquake, which threw down the best houses in the city, and darkened the air with vapours, that this pageantry was but little minded. During the long stay which the Soltân made at Constantinople, he often diverted himself with public shews. One day a Turk, who at first passed for a conjurer, but turned out to be a fool, got on the tower of the Hippodrome (C), pretending to fly across it. He was dressed in a white gown, very long and wide: the sides of which being stuck with ozier twigs, were to serve for wings. He stood a long time stretching out his arms to gather the wind. The people impatient called out to him often to fly. The emperor would have dissuaded him from that vain and dangerous attempt; while the Soltân was divided between hope and fear. At last, when he thought he had brought matters to bear, he launched off like a bird; but his wings deceiving him, he was carried down headlong by the weight of his body, and broke his neck, to the great diversion of the Christian spectators.

THE emperor, who had made Kbliziaftlan considerable presents, carried him one day into his cabinet: and having shewn him a great deal of gold and silver coin, wrought plate, splendid habits, and rich silks, sent there for the purpose; asked him, which of those parcels he would have? The Soltân said, he should receive with respect that which was agreeable to his majesty to give. Manuel then demanded, if, with the money which he saw, he should be able to humble his enemies? Kbliziaftlan answered; that he would have done it long ago, in case he had been master of but part of that wealth. Then, said the emperor, I will give you the whole, that you may judge what a monarch possesses, who can make such magnificent presents.

disloyalty;*

THE Soltân, charmed with such great liberality, promised to restore to Manuel the city of Sebaste, with its dependencies. The emperor accepted the offer with joy, and promised to make him farther presents, provided he performed his promise; and, to strike the iron while it was hot, sent Constantine Gauras with the money and troops. But Kbliziaftlan was no sooner arrived at Kogni, than he ruined Sebaste, took Cæsarea, drove Dadûn out of his territories, and went in a pursuit of Jagupasan, who died while he was raising forces to oppose his enemy. Dadân having seized Amasia, was the occasion of the death of Jagupasar's widow, who had called him thither; for the inhabitants rising, slew her, and drove out Dadân, whose power she intended by her intrigues to establish.

(B) This, we suppose, was his expedition against Sicily; which we judge might have been in the year 1153, or 1154; for our author Nicetas marks neither the time nor place.

BUT they found themselves too weak to resist Kbliziaſtlan, who reduced their city to his obedience, as he had done Kappadocia a little before; although he was quite a cripple, and to lame of his hands and feet, that he could not go, but as he was carried in a chair. Yet being full of spirit, this did not hinder him to violate the peace, and take several places from the Romans: finding also the opportunity favourable, he went and subdued the city of Melitene, which he intirely destroyed, and forced out the Amîr, although he was one of the same religion. He made use of perfidy to deceive his own brother, and expel him, like the rest, who fled for refuge to the emperor.

AT the same time one Soleyman, a subtle fair-spoken person, came to excuse the Soltân's conduct, laying the blame of the infringements made in the treaty, on the Turks. His apology was accompanied with excessive praises on Manuel, and a present of some fine horses from his master.

THE emperor ordered the ambassador to reproach the Soltân, in his name, with his breach of faith and inconstancy: but Kbliziaſtlan, far from paying any regard to his remonstrances, though he called him father, went to Laodicea; which, at that time, was not walled; and carried off a great number of prisoners, as well as cattle; killing also many people, and, among the rest, the bishop^b. The Turks committed other ravages; but Manuel put a stop to them: and repaired Kliate, Pergamus, and Endromit, which had been ruined by them: he likewise built several forts to secure the frontiers^c.

THE care which the emperor took to repair the fortifications of Doryleum, gave occasion for a rupture. The Soltân, pretending not to know the design of his coming, sent to intreat him to retire; and the Turks, not liking to be driven out of a fruitful territory, so convenient for feeding their flocks, made frequent inroads, burning villages, and ravaging the country. However, Manuel went on with the work; and when the fortifications of that place were finished, he set forward those of Sableum. This made the Soltân accuse him with breach of treaties: while the emperor, in his turn, upbraided the Soltân with ingratitude.

d BOTH parties being irritated, the emperor made great preparations, and crossed into Asia. He marched through Phrygia, and, passing by Laodicea, came to Kone, formerly Koloffus, a very rich city (D), where our author Nicetas was born: from thence he marched to Lempis, and so to Celene, where the river Marſias has its source. Proceeding forward, he arrived at Kome, and next at Myriocephale. He advanced with great precaution, always intrenching his army with care, and never exposing himself to danger; though the multitude of warlike engines rendered his march very slow and incommodious. The enemy appeared sometimes, and skirmished with the Romans: but, what was worse, they destroyed the forage, and spoiled the water of rivers and fountains, which gave them the flux.

e THE Soltân, having received a reinforcement from Mesopotamia and elsewhere, sent an embassy to demand peace of the emperor, on his own terms: which all the persons of experience advised him to accept; representing that the cavalry of the Turks (E) was very good; that they had seized the inaccessible parts of the country; and that a contagious distemper already prevailed in the Roman army. But Manuel, suffering himself to be led by his relations, who had never been in a camp before, sent back the ambassador, without promising any-thing. The Soltân having applied for peace a second time, and received no other answer than that the emperor would satisfy his demands when he came to Kogni; he prepared an ambuscade, in the pass of Sybriza, through which the Romans were to march after they left Myriocephale.

f IT is a long valley, bounded on one side with high mountains, and on the other by deep precipices. The emperor, instead of going before with light armed troops, to open the way, divided his army into six bodies, and marched behind the baggage, at the head of the fifth, which consisted of the flower of his troops. The two first corps passed the most dangerous places without any loss; because they covered themselves with their bucklers, and valiantly fought the enemy, who attacked them from the top of the rocks. For want of these precautions, the right wing, which made the third body, was broken and cut in pieces, with Baldwin, the emperor's brother-in-law, who commanded them. The Turks, elated with this success, shut up the passage entirely; so that the Romans could neither advance nor retreat: in a moment both men and overthrown.

THE enemy made great efforts to defeat the troops which were about the emperor, who tried several times to repulse them, and open a passage: but not being able to compass his design, he threw himself almost alone into the middle of them, and happily escaped, after he had received several wounds: about thirty arrows were sticking in his buckler, and his casque was half beaten off. Mean time the soldiers fell thick in the battle: and those who escaped this fatal pass perished in the valley. The whole defile consisted of seven vallies, one within another, the entrance of which was pretty wide, and the way out very narrow. A violent wind happening to raise clouds of dust, both parties fought for some time in the dark, killing indifferently their friends or foes. However, a much greater number of the Romans were slain than of the Turks, and chiefly the emperor's relations. b

WHEN the storm was over, men were seen buried up to the waist among dead bodies, extending their arms, and imploring help with lamentable cries; without being able to obtain any, from men who were in too much danger themselves to think of assisting others.

distress.

THE emperor was alone, without his armour-bearer or guards, resting himself under a wild pear-tree: there was only one horseman who offered to serve him, and tried to refit his head-piece. At the same time a Turk seized the bridle of his horse, but he struck him down with a piece which remained of his lance. Presently after, others running up to take him, he drove them off with the lance of the horseman who attended him; killing one of them, and his assistant cut off the head of another with his sword. Having been joined at length by ten Romans, he c surmounted, with incredible fatigue, the difficulties of the passages: then crossing the river, and marching over dead bodies, he met with a troop of his soldiers, who came up as soon as they saw him. He beheld in the way John Cantacuzenus, who had married his niece, fighting very valiantly; but at length was killed and stripped, while he looked in vain to see if any body would come to his assistance. Those who had slain him, having perceived the emperor, who could not be hidden, made a sort of a ring, closing their ranks, to surround him. They were mounted on barbs, nicely trained; which, among other ornaments, had long collars of hair, with little bells. Manuel, encouraging his men, repulsed the enemy vigorously; and still advancing, sometimes fighting his way, at length joined the first legions.

An insolent
soldier.

BEFORE he came up with them, he asked for some water out of a river which ran by; and finding that it was tainted with the blood of the slain, threw it away, saying, How unhappy am I to drink Christian blood? An insolent soldier retorted, It is not to-day only that you have drunk Christian blood: you have, for a long time, drank it to such excess, that you have been drunk with it; since you load your subjects with the most violent and inhuman exactions. The emperor, at the same time, observing the Turks carrying off the bags of money designed for paying his army, he exhorted those about him to go and recover them. But the same soldier, continuing his insolences, said, He ought to have given us that money, instead of commanding us now to go and retake it, at the peril of our lives. If he be that man of courage as he boasts himself, let him go and wrest it from the Turks. Manuel bore these insults with a profound patience. d resolves to fly.

CONTOSTEPHANUS, and some others, arrived in the evening, without having received a wound, they passed the night in the greatest anxiety, leaning their heads on their hands, and reckoned themselves no better than dead men, considering the dangers which surrounded them. What terrified them most was, to hear the Turks running round their camp, and calling aloud to those of their country to haste out of it, for that next morning they would put all to the sword. The emperor hereupon conceived the design of flying privately, and leave his people to be slaughtered; nor was he ashamed to own it: those who were about him were filled with indignation at it, and Contostephanus most of all. e

With-held by reproach.

A SOLDIER unknown, who was without the tent, and heard what he said, raising his voice, cried out, What a detestable thought has entered into the mind of the emperor? Then addressing his speech to him, Is it not you, said he, who have brought us to perish here, under rocks which bruise us, and mountains which overwhelm us? What have we to do in this valley of groans and tears, in this descent to hell, in the midst of precipices and pits? We have had no difference with these Barbarians, who have inclosed us within this chain of mountains: it is you who have led us to the slaughter, to sacrifice us as victims. This boldness of speech touched the emperor, and made him resolve to submit to the necessity of the occasion. f

WHILE no hope seemed to be left for the Romans, the Soltân, by persuasion of the principal men of his court, who in time of peace received pensions and presents from the emperor, proposed to offer him terms of peace. However, the Turks, who knew nothing of their master's intentions, prepared at day-break to attack the camp, courting round it with horrible cries. Twice the Romans made a sally to repulse them, and both times returned without gaining any advantage. Mean while the Soltân sent Gauras, who, having ordered hostilities to cease, and g saluted a saluted the emperor after the Turkish fashion, presented him with a sword, and a horse which had a silver bit, and was very well trained; making use of the most gentle and agreeable words to comfort him. Observing that Manuel had on a black vest over his cuirass, he said, That colour is not proper in time of war, and presages no good luck. The emperor received this freedom laughing, and gave him the vest, which was adorned with gold and purple. Afterwards he concluded and signed the peace, by which he was obliged to demolish the forts of Doryleum and Sableum. terms of peace.

THE emperor designed to avoid returning by the place of battle; but the guides brought him directly through it, that he might behold at leisure the deplorable spectacle. In short, the valleys and forests were covered, and every hollow filled, with dead bodies. The heads were all scalped, and the privy parts cut off; which, it is said, was done by the Turks, that the Christians might not be distinguished from the circumcised, as well as to shew that the victory was theirs^d. Manuel re- turns;

WHEN the Romans had passed the straits of the mountains, they were attacked again by the Turks, who pursued them in parties, and killed the sick and wounded, who were not in a condition to help themselves, notwithstanding all the care that could be taken to prevent it. It is said, the Soltân, repenting that he had let the prey slip out of his hands, had given his soldiers leave to commit those hostilities, which continued till they got to Kone. He stayed a while at Philadelphia to refresh himself; and, in passing forward, demolished the fortifications of Sableum, but left those of Doryleum standing; and when the Soltân complained of it, answered, that he paid little regard to a treaty which was extorted from him by force. Hereupon the Soltân sent Atapakus (F) at the head of 20,000 chosen men, with orders to lay waste the Roman provinces, and bring him home sea-water, sand, and an oar. That commander ruined all the cities near the river Meander; had Tralles and Antiokk delivered to him by composition; took Luma, Pentakbira, with some other castles, by force, and ravaged all the sea-coast. violates the peace; loses many cities.

THE emperor, on this advice, immediately dispatched John Vataces, his nephew, Constantine The Duke, and Michael Aspacius, all able men, with forces to repress the enemy. Vataces led his troops directly to Hielium, and Limnokbira; small cities, which had formerly a bridge on the Meander; and hearing that the Turks were retiring with their plunder, made the greater part of his army lie in ambush, and posted the rest beyond the river. The Turks having been attacked in a place where they were much exposed, Atapakus charged the Romans at the head of his bravest soldiers, to give the others time to cross the river. He gave eminent proofs, for a while, of his courage and conduct: but when he saw that there was another army of the enemy beyond the Meander, which slew all those who appeared before them, his ardor abated, and he sought a place where he might pass the stream with less danger. Finding none fordable, he placed himself in his buckler, as in a boat, making use of his sword for a rudder; and holding the bridle of his horse, who swam behind, gained the other side of the river. As soon as he had landed, he told his name aloud, in order to draw the Turks about him: but an Allân, who served in the Roman army, coming up, slew him: upon which his troops being routed, most of them were drowned in the Meander. This exploit, more than any other, retrieved the affairs of the Romans, and humbled the pride of the Turks. Aspietus perished unhappily in this rencounter; for a Turk, not being able to hurt him, his armour being proof, made a stroke at the head of his horse; which, capering, threw him into the river^e. defeated; their general slain.

THE emperor being desirous to attack the Turks of Panesa and Lacere, reduced the first; then sent Katidus, governor of Laodicea, to discover the condition of the others: but he threatening them with the emperor's arrival, they fled immediately; which so enraged Manuel, that he ordered Katidus to have his nose cut off. Soon after, he gave troops to Andronicus Angelus, and Manuel Cantacuzenus, to attack the Turks of Karace, which is between Lampis and Graosgala. Andronicus, having only taken some sheep and peasants, fled full speed at the bare report of the Turks being at hand, without so much as enquiring how many they were; and not content with escaping to Kone, spurred his horse on to Laodicea. The soldiers, astonished at the absence of their general, abandoned the prisoners and the baggage, and would have dispersed, but for Cantacuzenus. The emperor would have punished this gallant behaviour of Andronicus, by making him walk through the city in women's cloaths, but for the relationship that was between them. Shameful flight of a Roman general.

As the Romans retired, a Turk, from a rising ground, slew a great number with arrows. Several shot at him again, but he had the dexterity to avoid their shafts; till Manuel Xerus, alighting, went up to him, and cleft his head with his sword, although he demanded quarter, after killing so many others. having had the charge of some plunder at Karace, did not leave it behind like the rest, for fear of the danger. Some admired his resolution, in marching slowly in the middle of his enemies; and others mocked him for his avarice, in setting a greater value on the booty than his life: for his part, he despised their raileries, and reproached them with cowardice, in flying when they were not pursued.

relieved.

THE Turks soon after besieged Klaudiopolis; on the news of which the emperor ran to its relief, with incredible diligence, without any equipage besides his arms. He crossed Bithynia by the light of torches: he passed the nights without sleep: and, when fatigue and watching obliged him to take a little rest, he lay upon nothing but straw. At the news of his approach the Turks betook themselves to flight, and the citizens were filled with joy, being no longer able to have held out ^f.

KHLIZIASTLAN, who greatly feared the emperor Manuel, no sooner heard of his death (G), than he went and took Sozopolis; besieged, for a long time, the celebrated city of Attalia; and ravaged Kotyalium; and, more than this, several provinces voluntarily submitted to him ^g. This prince, who enjoyed a vigorous health, though upwards of seventy years of age, took the like advantage of the death of Andronicus, and proclamation of Isaac Angelus; upon the news of which, he sent Amîr Sames, with some horse, to make an irruption into Thrace, from whence he returned with many prisoners and much plunder: for the nations of the east let the Romans remain no longer in repose than they made them presents, or paid them an annual tribute, which was the way of making them quiet, used by the emperors of that age; who, in this respect, says Nicetas, were weaker than women, who handle nothing but the spindle and distaff ^h.

empire.

THIS Soltân, who, in his latter days, became very powerful, divided his dominions among his sons, of whom he had many ⁱ: but we meet with the names of only five, Masfid, Kothbo'ddin, Rokno'ddin Soleymân, Gayatho'ddin Kay Khosraw, and Moazo'ddin Kayfar Shâh (H). After this distribution, his children treated him with much ingratitude, and even contempt: Kothbo'ddin (I) went so far as to seize and confine him. Afterwards marching to besiege Kaysariyah (that is, Cæsarea, in Cappadocia), which he wanted to take from one of his brothers, to whose share it fell; the old Soltân, whom he carried along with him, found means at length to make his escape into that city. But meeting there with a bad reception, he applied himself first to one son, and then to another, who all proved alike, excepting Gayatho'ddin Kay Khosraw. This prince not only received him with affection, but went with him to besiege Koniyah; and having taken it, placed him once more in the throne ^k. The distribution made by Kilij Arslân of his dominions among his sons, we judge, from the course of the Greek history, to have been in the year 1187, or that following; and his restauration to have happened in 1190 or 91.

The German emperor
A. D. 1190.

DURING this prince's abdication, and ill treatment by his children, the emperor Frederic Barbarossa (K), who had taken the cross, arrived in Thrace, in his way to Syria; and having made peace with Isaac Angelus, repaired with his Germans to Kallipolis; where, finding ships ready, they crossed over into Anatolia. When they came to Philadelphia, the inhabitants, who behaved well enough at first, attacked them in the rear, at their departure: but finding they had to deal with statues of brass, and invincible people, they betook themselves to a shameful flight. The citizens of Laodicea, in Phrygia, on the contrary, received these strangers with so much good-nature, that the emperor prayed for their prosperity on his knees. When they came to the roads leading to the hills, they met with the Turks, who incommoded them all they could, by skirmishing; although they had promised them passage, as well as the Romans. But they paid dear for their treachery.

Turks.

FREDERIC gave battle near the fort of Filomelion to the sons of the Soltân of Kogni, who had been driven from his dominions, and reduced to a miserable condition; and having defeated them, took the fort and burned it. Coming to a second engagement with them at Cinglacion, he gained a signal victory: for as they waited for him at the passes which they had seized, the emperor incamped in a plain; and, having divided his army in the night, he ordered one half to remain in the camp, and the other to feign a flight as soon as day appeared. The Turks believing that they fled for fear, quitted the passes, and coming down into the plain, entered the camp, where they expected to meet with a rich booty: but the pretended run-aways returning, and those who were in the camp appearing, they, between them both, surrounded the Turks, and made a horrible slaughter of them.

Great slaughter.

As the emperor was on his way to Kogni, the Soltân, who had taken refuge in Taxara, or Kolonia, sent to excuse what had happened, for that he knew nothing of the conduct of his sons,

(G) The emperor died in September, in the fifteenth indiction, which answers to the year of Christ 1182.

(H) Nicetas mentions only the first four, whom, according to the Greek way of corrupting names, he calls Masut, Kepatin, Rukratin, and Kai Kojraes; leaving out the additional names of Soleymân and Gayatho'ddin, whom the Greeks write Seliman and Jathathines.

(I) This prince, by what follows, was in possession of Koniyah (called by the Greeks Kogni, or Konri), and consequently was to have been his father's successor in the kingdom, or the sovereign on whom the rest depended.

(K) Nicetas never calls him emperor, but king; yet speaks of him as a great, wise, and good prince.

a one of whom, named Kopatin (L), had driven him out of his dominions. The Turks had barricaded themselves in the gardens which were about Kogni; and as they carried light weapons, and shot well, thought they could easily defend themselves against troops heavily armed. But they were also deceived this time by their hopes: for the Germans observing that they took the advantage of shooting from behind the hedges and ditches, the horsemen carried the foot-soldiers behind them, and setting them down when they were near the enemy, supported them in every place where they were able to go. Thus all the Turks perished, excepting a few who escaped. A Mohammedan, who turned Christian, swore that it cost him 200 pieces of silver to bury those who remained dead upon his field. By which the number of the slain may be judged of.

b ALTHOUGH the Germans were masters of Kogni, they would not go into the city; but ^{Takes Ko-} were content to lodge in the suburbs, and there take the provisions which they wanted. The ^{niya.} Turks, apprehending that the emperor intended to conquer their country, and settle there, endeavoured to gain his affection by false offers of service: but after he had received some of their children in hostage with guides, he left their frontiers, and pushed into Armenia, where he was received with great honours. In a few days he proceeded to Antioch, and soon after was unfortunately drowned in passing a river¹.

ONE Alexis, who pretended to be the son of the emperor Manuel, disguised his imposture with so much art, that he imitated the true Alexis, even to the fairness of his hair, and hesi- ^{A Greek} tation in speech. He made his appearance in the cities along the Meander: then going to ^{pretender,} Armale, discovered himself to a Roman, with whom he lodged; telling him, that his father had ^{A. D. 1191.} ordered him to be thrown into the sea, but that he was saved by the compassion of the officers who were charged with that cruel mandate. He and his landlord going to Kogni, he presented himself before the old Soltân, who had not then been driven from the throne by his son Kopatin (M), and had even the boldness to reproach him with ingratitude and hard-heartedness, not to be touched with the disgrace of the son of an emperor, who had been his friend. Kbliziaſlan, overcome by his impudence, and deceived by some marks of resemblance which appeared in his face, made him presents, and gave him hopes.

ONE day, boasting of his birth in the presence of the Roman ambassador, the Soltân asked ^{c'aims the} the latter if he was sure that this pretender was Manuel's son? The ambassador answered, that ^{empire;} it was certain that the son of Manuel had been drowned (N); and that it was in vain for the party present to invent a story which would meet with no credit. The false Alexis was so provoked at this answer, that he would have flown in the ambassador's face, if the latter had not cooled his courage by affecting also to be in a great passion; and if the Soltân had not rebuked him somewhat sharply. All the assistance he obtained from this prince was only letters called mûſûr, permitting him to lift soldiers: by which he drew to his party Almuras, Arſan, and other commanders, accustomed to rapine. In a short time he gathered 8000 men, with which, by force or composition, he reduced many cities upon the Meander.

SEVERAL generals, and lastly Alexis, the emperor's brother, were sent against him: but they ^{slain by a} could do no good, for fear of being betrayed by their soldiers; who shewed more inclination ^{priest.} to serve this pretender than their lawful emperor. Nor was the infection confined to the people only: the principal persons at court were pleased with this illusion. But while the power of this impostor increased every day, and he seemed to be in a fair way of compassing his design, he was suddenly taken off by an unexpected means: for having returned from Armale to Pisse, and drank more than usual, he was slain by a priest, with his own sword. When his head was brought to the Sebastocrator (Alexis), he put back the long hair with his horse-whip, and said, that it was not without reason that so many had been disposed to follow him^m.

KILIġ ARSLÂN died in his capital, in the year 588, according to Abû'lfaraj: which gives ^{The Soltân} him a reign of forty years, by our reckoning, from the death of his father Maſſûd; although ^{dies.} Kondamîr allows him but ten years. The author of the Nighiaristân, indeed, doubles that ^{Hej. 588.} number; but both are wide of the truth. From the before-mentioned account of his age, he ^{A. D. 1192.} must have been seventy-six at his death.

THIS prince was grandson to the first of that name; and distinguished himself, not only by the ^{His character.} wars which he carried on against his neighbours the Greeks, but also by his wisdom, justice, and skill in governing his people. He left his son Gayatho'ddin Kay Khoſraw for his successorⁿ.

In consequence of this new nomination, Koniyah, as being the regal seat of the Soltâns, since the loss of Nice, fell to the share of Kay Khosraw, as it had done to Kotbbo'ddîn, by the first distribution: and it is, doubtless, to this second appointment of Kilij Arslân, that the partition, mentioned at the beginning of the next reign, ought to be referred.

GAYATHO'DDIN KAY KHOSRAW, according to our hypothesis, was the sixth (A) Soltân of this Seljukian dynasty. A.D. 1195.]

ALEXIS KOMNENUS, who succeeded Isaac in the empire (C), had scarce been three months on the throne, before news arrived of another pretender, a Silician, who had taken the name of Alexis; and was well received by the Soltân of Ancyra (D), with a design to embarrass the emperor, and oblige him to buy his friendship. Oenopolitus, the eunuch, who was sent against him, being able to do nothing, he went himself, thinking to make an alliance with the Turks: but they refused to conclude a peace with him, unless he paid them down 500 pounds of coined silver, and 300 every year, besides 400 silk vests. Alexis, having destroyed some forts, returned to Constantinople, after two months employed in this expedition, leaving the pretender to increase in power; and doubtless he would have done a great deal of mischief, if his throat had not been cut in the fort of Zangre.

HOWEVER, the Soltân of Ancyra carried on the war, and besieged Diadibris with all his forces. At four months end, troops arrived under three young chiefs, Theodore Uranus, Andronicus Katakalon, and Theodore Kasanus: but the Turks, laying an ambuscade, fell on them at day-break, put them to flight, killed a great number, and among the prisoners took two of the generals; whom they dragged with their hands tied behind their backs, to shew to the besieged. The inhabitants, discouraged at the sight, and being in great want of provisions, delivered up the city, on condition of having the liberty to retire with their families and effects; because the victor would not permit them to stay in the town paying tribute. Soon after, when the war had lasted a year and a half, the emperor made peace with the Soltân; and was not ashamed to agree to the terms which he had refused before the place was besieged^b.

THEODORE MANGAFES, after his revolt at Philadelphia, and peace made with the emperor; to avoid the attempts of Basilus Vatases, governor of Thrace, fled to Kay Khosraw, Soltân of Kogni (E), and intreated him to supply him with troops to make war upon the Romans. The Soltân, instead of granting his request, only permitted him to assemble some Turks who lived by plunder. Having gathered a multitude of these, he invaded the empire, doing incredible damages in Phrygia (especially about Laodicea and Kone), and in Karia; after which he retired with abundance of prisoners and cattle. The emperor, fearing that Mangafes might by his advice corrupt that young prince, who had but newly succeeded his father Kilij Arslân, sent ambassadors, who by presents prevailed on him to deliver up that refugee, on condition that he should not receive any corporal punishment. This action of the Soltân so displeased his brothers, who had divided with him their father's dominions, that they would have made war upon him, if he had not appeased them, by alleging, that he had not betrayed him, but only sent him back for the good of the state; that he was a banished man whom he had

(D) According to the above distribution, this must have been Massûd.

(E) This event is placed in the reign of the emperor Isaac Angelus, at the year 1188. The date does not agree with what is said a little lower down, that Kay Khosraw had but newly succeeded his father; for he did not succeed till after his father's death in 1192. He did not succeed on his abdication, in consequence of the division Kilij Arslân made of his dominions; for Kotbbo'ddîn was, by virtue thereof, in possession of Koniyah, or Kogni, the royal seat; nor did he succeed on his father's restoration, for Kilij Arslân reigned himself: unless we suppose that he was restored before the year 1188, and that Kay Khosraw was his associate, or governed as he was Soltân; for which we have no authority. To make the history therefore consistent with itself, we place this transaction here, supposing it to have happened about the year 1196 or 1197.

a settled again in his own country, to the end that he might no longer persecute others, or be persecuted himself^c.

TOWARDS the end of the third year of his reign, Alexis broke the treaty which had been made with Kay Khosroes, Soltân of Ikonium, upon a very frivolous occasion. This prince stopped two horses, which had been sent the emperor by the Soltân of Alexandria; and one of them having broken a leg in running, he sent to apologize for both those accidents, and promised to make satisfaction. Alexis, instead of being pacified with this civil excuse, flew into a rage, and threatened much: but at last took revenge upon himself, by ordering the merchants from Kogni, Romans as well as Turks, to be seized, together with their effects, which were squandered away. On advice of this, the Soltân immediately fell upon the cities near the b Meander, took Karia and Tantalus, with several others; and had become master of Antiokh, in Phrygia, but for a merry accident.

THE same night in which he intended to surprize that city, one of the principal inhabitants happening to celebrate the nuptials of his daughter, the guests made a great noise, as is usual on such occasions: Kay Khosroes, as he approached the walls, hearing the confusion of voices, and the word, which the soldiers, who had been informed of his coming, gave to one another, he retired to Lampis.

THERE he viewed his prisoners; and inquiring into their names, countries, and after what manner they were taken, asked if any of his soldiers had hidden the married women and maidens, with a design to abuse them. Then he ordered the effects to be restored which had been taken from them; and finding that their number amounted to 5000, he ranged them according to their families, and, at parting, took care that they should be supplied with provisions during the march. For fear also that they should be injured by the cold weather, he took an ax himself to cleave a tree which was fallen. The soldiers running to see him work, he ordered them to do the same; saying, they might go out of the camp when they pleased to cut wood; but that the Roman prisoners durst not do it, for fear of being suspected of a design to escape.

WHEN he arrived at Filomelion, he assigned them houses to lodge in, and lands to maintain them, distributing them corn and other grain. He promised moreover to send them back without ransom, when he should conclude a peace with the emperor; and that, in case he refused to conclude one, they should remain five years in his dominions without paying any tax; that afterwards they should pay but a very light one, which should never be increased, as were often those established in the empire. Having thus regulated matters, he returned to Kogni. Such favourable treatment made the captives forget their country, and drew into the Soltân's territories abundance of people who had not been taken in war.

ALEXIS sent against the Turks Andronicus Dukas, who being very young, contented himself with attacking the troops of Amîr in the night, and presently retiring^d.

SOME time after this, war broke out among the sons of Kilij Arslân, on the following occasion. Kothbo'ddîn (F) being dead, a dispute arose between Rokno'ddîn (G) and Massûd who should succeed to his dominions (which, as hath been observed before, consisted of Melitene, Cæsaria, and Kolonia). But as Rokno'ddîn had more spirit than his brother, and understood military affairs better, he gained the advantage; and constrained him to demand his friendship for one part of his country, leaving him the other part as before. After this, having conceived an inveterate hatred against his brother Kay Khosraw, because his mother was a Christian, and burning with desire to possess Kogni, he sent to require him to deliver it up, in case he had a mind to exempt the rest of his dominions from the hazard of a war.

KAY KHOSRAW upon this, having made peace with Alexis, repaired to his court (dressed in a robe adorned with gold point), just as his father had done before to that of the emperor Manuel, during the disputes which he had with his brothers after the death of their father Massûd: but whereas Manuel assisted Kilij Arslân with forces beyond his hopes, Kay Khosraw received nothing from Alexis but common civilities. He was scarce returned to Kogni, when he was pursued by Rokno'ddîn, and forced to fly into Armenia (H); where he was kindly received by Leon (I), although formerly he had been at war with him. That prince however lent him no assistance against his brother, with whom he said he was allied, because he foresaw that the war would be very bloody. Hereupon Kay Khosraw returned again to the emperor, in hopes of being restored by his means. But this second hope being as vain as the first, he continued at Constantinople (K) in a private condition, and much below his birth^e.

Seventh Soltân, Rokno'd-dîn Soleyman
A. D. 1198.

ROKNO'DDIN SOLEYMAN having driven his brother Kay Khozraw out of his share in the empire, in the same manner as he had expelled his other brothers out of theirs, the whole became again united under one prince.

Emperor turns pirate,

Not long after, the emperor sent Constantine Frankopolis, with six gallies, into the Euxine sea, under pretence of getting up the wreck of a ship which had been cast away near Kerasfonte (L), in returning from the river Fasis; but in reality to rob the merchants who landed their goods at Amintus. Frankopolis following exactly the orders which he had received, spared no vessel whatever; plundering those which carried commodities to Constantinople, as well as those which had returned with the price of such as they had sold there. They slew some of the merchants, and threw them into the sea: the rest they stripped to a shameful degree. These presented themselves before the emperor's palace, and entered the great church with tapers in their hands, to demand justice: but their effects having been already sold, and the money confiscated, they could obtain no redress.

THE merchants of Koniyab had recourse to Rokno'ddîn; who, by his ambassadors, demanded back what had been taken from them, and at the same time proposed a treaty of peace. The emperor laid all the blame on Frankopolis: however, the articles of peace at length taking place, Rokno'ddîn had fifty mina of silver, to satisfy him and his subjects, besides the promise of a yearly tribute. Some days after, Alexis was shamefully convicted of an attempt against the Soltân's life; having sent a very polite letter to that prince by a Kassian (M), whom he had bribed to assassinate him: but the bravo being arrested, the plot was discovered, and the peace broken almost as soon as made; which rupture occasioned the ruin of many cities of Anatolia.

AT the same time Michael, the natural son of John the sebastocrator, a forward and passionate young man, having been sent to collect the taxes due from the province of Mylassa (N), revolted: but, being defeated, fled to Rokno'ddîn, who received him very civilly, and gave him troops; with which he plundered the cities about the Meander, and committed more horrible cruelties than the Turks would have been capable of doing.

The Comneni censured.

It must be confessed, that nothing ever contributed so much to the desolation of the provinces, or the ruin of the empire, as the ambition of the Comneni; who were of no use to their country so long as they staid in it, and became very pernicious to it when they were out of it^f. To this observation of Nicetas we may add, that the Romans generally brought on themselves the evils which befell them; either by their breach of faith, or violences committed against the bordering nations: yet, when the injured made reprisals, they loudly exclaimed; as if they had a right to be cruel with impunity, or thought those actions virtuous in themselves, which they deemed most execrable in others.

Rokno'ddîn's exploits,

WE are not much better supplied with materials from the oriental historians, relative to this Soltân, than those preceding him: what little we have from that quarter is given by Abû'lfaraj. This author informs us, that Rokno'ddîn Soleyman took Koniyab from his brother Gayatho'ddîn Kay Khozraw^g; and that in 597, in the month of Ramadân (O), he forced the city of Malatîyah out of the hands of his brother Moezo'ddîn Kayfar Shâh, after a few days leaguer. Then marching to Arzen al Rûm (or Arzerum), which belonged to the son of king Mohammed ebn Salik; that lord, depending on Rokno'ddîn's promise, went to him, in order to treat of peace: but the Soltân imprisoned him, and then took the city. He was the last of his family, which, for a long time, had reigned there^h. Soltân Rokno'ddîn, lord of Rûm, died in the year 600, in the month of Dbulkaada (P), leaving his son Kilij Arslân, a minor, to succeed himⁱ.

and death.
A. D. 1203.

D'HERBELOT affords us nothing from the Persian writers concerning this prince, only that he had great disputes with his brother Kay Khozraw; but that at length peace was concluded between them: that, having reigned in quiet twenty-four years, he died in 602 of the Hejrab, and of Christ 1205; and was succeeded by his son Kilij Arslân, surnamed Azzo'ddîn, an infant^k. But, besides that we hear nothing elsewhere of peace between the two brothers (for Kay Khozraw retired to the Greek emperor, and lived in Europe, while Rokno'ddîn lived), there is an error both in the length of his reign and year of his death. For, reckoning from the end of the reign of Kilij Arslân II. which is fixed by Abû'lfaraj in the year 588 of the Hejrab, to 602, when, according to D'Herbelot's account, Soleyman died, it will give him no more than fourteen years to his reign out of the twenty-four: but as that event is also fixed by Abû'lfaraj to the year 600, there must be a deduction of two years out of the fourteen. This is supposing that Soleyman immediately succeeded his father Kilij Arslân: but it appears from the Greek historians, that Kay Khozraw reigned between; perhaps as long as, or longer than, Rokno'ddîn

a reigned himself. To the above mistakes, or inadvertencies, we may add another, which is, that, in the article of Soleymân, D'Herbelot says that he was the fifth Soltân; whereas, in his table of Soltâns, he gives him the sixth place.

KILIJ ARSLAN III. surnamed Azzo'ddîn, was advanced to the throne immediately after the death of his father Rokno'ddîn Soleymân, towards the end of the year 600. But as soon as his uncle Gayatho'ddîn Kay Khosraw heard that his brother was dead, he left the castle where he resided near Constantinople; and, making what haste he could to Koniyah, seized the child, and took possession of the city: after which he stripped him of the rest of his dominions. This revolution happened in Rajeb (Q) 601¹. D'Herbelot has copied the article of Kilij Arslân III. from Abû'lfaraj, without adding any thing to it from other oriental historians. Some Greek writers say, that this Soltân, whom they call Yathatines (which is a corruption of his surname Gayatho'ddîn) (†), on the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, fled along with the emperor Alexis Angelus, otherwise called Comnenus; and that a few days after, being secretly informed of the death of his brother Azatines (so they miscall Rokno'ddîn), he departed in disguise, and, repairing to his own people, was proclaimed Soltân^m.

GAYATHO'DDIN KAY KHOSRAW ascended the throne of Koniyah for the second time in 601, the same year in which the Latins took Constantinople from the Greeks. Abû'lfaraj informs us, that, after this, he became very powerful, and reigned with great dignityⁿ. This is all we learn from the oriental authors touching the second reign of this prince; and the Byzantine historians have not said much concerning it. According to a fault very common with them, they do not directly mention the restoration of Kay Khosraw; and only give an imperfect hint, where they should speak out.

AFTER the shameful flight of the emperor Alexis (who changed his name of Angelus to that of Comnenus), and the election of Baldwin by the Latins; these latter, in less than one year's time, reduced all which the Romans possessed both in Europe and in Asia, excepting the cities of Nice and Prusa. The Greek commanders, and other leading men, swayed by the spirit of pride, malice, and corruption, instead of uniting in defence of their country, divided into factions, and formed parties for creating new emperors. The western part of the empire seemed to be quite cut off from the eastern, which sent it no manner of assistance: but, being infected with the same contagion, produced a multitude of commanders, who ruined the country, and formed a monster with three heads.

MANUEL MAUROZOMUS, supported by Kay Khosraw, to whom, since the taking (R) of Koniyah, he had promised his daughter in marriage, made all his efforts to usurp the sovereign power, and joined the Turks to ravage the country about the Meander. Theodorus Laskaris, illustrious both by his birth and alliance with the emperor, having defeated him, put on the purple buskins; and had himself proclaimed emperor thro' the cities of the East (S). On the other side, David Comnenus, having gathered troops at Heraclea, a city of Pontus, and in Paphlagonia; having also subdued the Iberians, who inhabited along the Fasis, reduced some towns and cities, and made himself the forerunner of his brother Alexis, whom he had a desire of advancing to the throne: but this Alexis, instead of hastening to take possession, loitered about Trebizond. Mean time David having sent a young man, named Synademus, with troops to Nikomedia, Theodore Laskaris advanced at the head of his army to give him battle; and, taking a cross-road, instead of the great one, fell upon him unawares, and dispersed his forces. He defeated shortly after Manuel Maurozomus; cut in pieces part of the Turks whom he commanded; and took the most considerable of those who were in the van^o.

IN short, Lydia, Philomolis, Prusa, Nice, Smyrna, Ephesus, and some other cities of the East, were subject to Theodore Laskaris; who built long ships, and subdued several islands. However, in making peace with Kay Khosraw, he gave up to Manuel Maurozomus, his father-in-law, part of the country which he possessed; comprizing the city of Kone (or Colossus), Laudicea, and all inclosed within the windings of the Meander, to its fall into the sea.

DAVID and Alexis, the sons of Manuel, and grandsons of the tyrant Andronicus, had established their dominion in different parts: David in Paphlagonia, and at Heraklia in Pontus; Alexis at Eneum, Sinope, and Trebizond. Aldobrandini, an Italian, learned in the Roman laws, commanded at Attalia; and the island of Rhodes was under a particular lord (T). These numerous commanders, instead of acting in concert, to preserve the cities which they held, or reconquer those which they had lost, gave themselves up to a furious passion of lording it; and

KAY KHOSRAW at this juncture laid siege to the city of Attalia; imagining that it was not in a condition of defending itself: but Aldobrandini having procured 200 foot from Cyprus; the unexpected appearance of them, at the beginning of the assault, made the Soltân retire, after he had been sixteen days before the place^p.

As we find nothing farther in Nicetas concerning Gayatbo'ddin Kay Khosraw, we must, to finish his reign, have recourse to the succeeding historians: who, being less accurate in their account of matters, have greatly embarrassed the history of the Soltâns; and led those, who have hitherto written of them, into very gross mistakes, which we shall endeavour to clear up.

Alexis retires secretly
A. D. 1206.

ALEXIS ANGELUS, the late emperor, hearing that Theodore Laskaris, his son-in-law, reigned at Nice; being assisted by his cousin Mikhael Comnenus, who was prince of Epirus, crossed over from thence into Asia, and went secretly to Gayatbo'ddin (U), Soltân of Koniyah, his old friend and ally, then lying at Attalia, which he had not long before reduced (X), and begged his aid for the recovery of his dominions, especially that part of them possessed by Laskaris. The Soltân had been very serviceable to Laskaris (Y) at a time when he was reduced to great straits, by lending him forces, with which he defeated his enemies, and had also concluded a peace with him: but being urged by gratitude to his quondam benefactor, as well as interest, (Alexis making him great promises), he threatened Laskaris by his ambassadors with the utmost extremities of war, unless he immediately resigned his territories to his father-in-law. Theodorus was much troubled at this unexpected message, as fearing both the Soltân's power, and the people's inclination to their old emperor: but, having sounded the minds of his new subjects, and finding them ready to support him, he took heart.

BEFORE the return of the ambassadors, Gayatbo'ddin, attended by Alexis, marched with 20,000 Turks and besieged Antioch on the Meander: which Laskaris no sooner understood, than he hastened with 2000 men, the most he was able to raise on so short a warning, to the relief of that city, which was a strong frontier; and being the key of his dominions on that side, he knew, if taken, would open a way into the heart of them. Laskaris, drawing near to Antioch, sent the ambassador before, who could scarce persuade the Soltân, by oaths, that the emperor was approaching with so small a force. However, he drew up his army in the best manner the narrowness of the place would allow of; which he had scarce done, than 800 Italians of the Roman army began the attack, and, breaking through the Turkish ranks, put them into the greatest disorder. As the Greeks had not courage enough to follow them closely, they were separated from the rest of the forces: so that, on their return, they were surrounded, and all to a man cut to pieces, tho' not without making an incredible slaughter of the enemy.

THE Greeks, disheartened at so great a loss, were on the point of flying, when the Soltân, now almost in possession of the victory, descrying the emperor, and trusting to his own great strength, rode up to him; and at the first blow, given with his mace on the head, struck him off his horse. But Laskaris, though sorely stunned, nimbly recovering himself, drew his sword; and, while the Soltân turned about, ordering his attendants with an air of contempt, to take him away, he disabled the hinder legs of his mare; which thereupon rearing up, threw her rider, who, before he could rise, had his head struck off (Z): which, being shewn upon the point of a spear, struck such a terror into the Turkish army, that they immediately betook themselves to a disorderly flight, leaving the Greeks masters of their camp and baggage. Alexis, the author of this war, was taken prisoner, and carried to Nice, where he was confined to a monastery, in which he ended his days some years after. This gave the Romans an opportunity of breathing: for, from that time, the Moslems made a peace with them, which they kept inviolably^q.

THE Greek historians, who relate this transaction, make Jathatines, or Gayatbo'ddin, a different person from Kay Khosraw; not knowing that Gayatbo'ddin (which name perhaps he most commonly went by after his restoration, or did not assume till then) was his surname. They say that he was the son of Soltân Aladin, brother of Kay Khosraw; consequently Kay Khosraw's nephew: that Aladin, not long surviving his said brother, left his dominions to this Jathatines, and his other son called Azatines (or Azzo'ddin), who was the elder: that Jathatines, being afterwards expelled by Azatines, fled to Alexis Angelus: and that, Azatines dying soon after, he returned to Ikonium, and recovered his kingdoms. The Aladin here said to be the brother of Kay Khosraw, seems to be the same with his son the great Aladin: who did not a begin his reign till the year 1219: and Azatines is put instead of the Rukratin of Nicetas, by whom Gayatho'ddîn Kay Khosraw had been driven out. How such great mistakes came to be adopted by those writers is hard to account: but whatever errors there may be in the names and genealogy, the circumstances of the story and juncture of time shews, that Jathatines is no other than Kay Khosraw. According to the chronology of the Greeks, Jathatines was slain in the year of Christ 1210. Abû'lfaraj does not mention his death; and D'Herbelot only says, from the oriental authors, that, having seized and imprisoned his nephew Kilij Arslân,^{concerning this Soltân.} he reigned in the dominions which he had usurped (A) the space of six years, till 609 of the Hejrah, and 1212 of Christ.^r As there is here a difference of two years, we have fixed his death at the middle year 1211, (which gives him seven years to his second reign, and thirteen to both); being sensible, there may happen a mistake of a year on one side or the other.

c OF this Soltân *Kaykaw*s, surnamed Azzo'ddîn, or Ezzo'ddîn, we find very little mentioned. Abû'lfaraj only tells us, that he died in the year of the Hejrah 616; leaving no children, but who were minors; by which means his brother Alao'ddîn Kaykobâd became his successor.^{Ninth Soltân, Kaykaw.} D'Herbelot adds nothing more from his authors, than that he died of a consumption of the lungs: only he differs much from Abû'lfaraj as to the time of his death; for, he says, it happened in the year 609, after he had reigned no more than one year^b; whereas the other, putting his death seven years later, allows him eight to his reign. There is the less reason to depend on D'Herbelot, as he places the death of his father Kay Khosraw in the same year, 609; in which case *Kaykaw*s could not have sat in the throne so long as a year, perhaps not a month. Besides, he begins the reign of his successor Kaykobâd, agreeable to Abû'lfaraj (whom indeed he, for the most part, copies), in the year 616.^{A. D. 1219.}

d *Azzo'ddîn Kaykaw*s having died, without leaving any sons old enough to take the government upon them, the army went to the castle of Menshâr, which stands on the Euphrates, near Malatîyah, where his brother Kaykobâd, surnamed Alao'ddîn, was imprisoned; and, bringing him forth, proclaimed him king.^{Tenth Soltân, Kaykobâd. e AFTER the destruction of the Karazmian empire by Jenghîz Khân, and his Mogols, Soltân Jalalo'ddîn, surnamed Mankberni, eldest son and successor of Mobammed, for some time made head against them, with surprising bravery: but, being at length obliged to give way to numbers, he retired westward into Armenia,; where, intending to reduce it under his power, he, in the beginning of the year 627, sat down before Kbelat (or Akblât, capital of that country), wherein were two brothers of Al Malek al Ashraf (A). Having closely besieged the city all winter, and battered it with twenty rams, on the side towards the sea (B), the inhabitants, who were reduced to eat dog's flesh, delivered it up to him, with the castle.^{Defeats Jalalo'ddîn; A. D. 1229.}

f ON this news Al Malek al Ashraf and Alao'ddîn Kaykobâd marching with their forces, met near Abolostayn (C), and thence proceeded to Akshabr, where the Karazmian met them with 40,000 men; and coming to a battle, which lasted near two days, was at length put to flight, with great slaughter of his men. Embassy to Oktay.
A. D. 1232.

IN 630, Soltân Alao'ddîn sent ambassadors to Oktay Khân, offering obedience to him. Oktay, commending his prudence, told them, that if their master would come to his court, he would receive him with honour, and give him one of the chief employments there, without taking away his revenues. Which haughty answer the ambassadors wondered at.

Restores the Seljûks

THE same year Alao'ddîn breaking with Al Malek al Afhrâf, took from him Kbelât and Sarmânray (E). Two years after he likewise forced Roba from him; in which, for three days, the Rûms slew both Christians and Mohammedans. The remainder they stripped of all; not sparing the churches. Hereupon Harrân surrendered to him. After this he took Rakkab and Bir. But as soon as his forces were withdrawn, Al Malek al Kamel (lord of Egypt) came b and besieged Roba; which he took at the end of four months, and sent all the Rûms whom he found there into Egypt, in chains, upon camels. D'Herbelot says, that, being pressed on one side by the Mogols, and on the other by the princes of the house of Ayub (F), he was obliged to withdraw his troops out of their dominions, in order to preserve his own.

THIS prince returned home, loaded with plunder and glory; having extended his name and conquests very far eastward^e. In short, he restored the great reputation of the Seljûkians, which the children of Kilij Arslân had somewhat impaired by their divisions; enlarged the empire to its former limits; and re-established order in the state.

His death,
A. D. 1236.

IN 635, Soltân Alao'ddîn Kaykobâd died suddenly: for at a feast which he made for his chief lords and officers, just as he was boasting of the extent of his dominions, he felt a disorder in his bowels; and, being taken at the same time with a flux, discharged such a quantity of bloody excrements, that he died two days after, having reigned eighteen years^f.

D'HERBELOT has given the history of this prince wholly from Abû'l-faraj, only adding one or two particulars from Kondamîr; who, in those points, differs from him. That author says, Alao'ddîn was poisoned by order of his son Kay Khosraw, whom he had declared his heir. He likewise begins his reign in 610, and puts his death in 636. which makes its duration twenty-six years; whereas Ebn Shohnab agrees exactly with Abû'l-faraj^g.

THIS prince was peudent, temperate, and strong. He kept a very strict eye over his nobles and dependants. He was endued with great firmness of mind, magnanimity, and profound gravity: nor could any sovereign govern better. As all the world submitted to him, d says our author, he was justly stiled (G), king of the world^h. He must therefore have been not a little mortified by the message, above-mentioned, sent him by Oktay Khân.

THIS is the famous Aladin I. known to the European writers; who acquired most reputation of all the Soltâns of his race, and passed for one of the greatest princes of his time. He generally gained some advantage in all the wars wherein he was engaged: but was obliged at last to acknowledge the Mogols for his mastersⁱ.

The reigns of Soltân Gayatho'ddîn Kay Khosraw, and Azzo'ddîn.

Eleventh Sol-tân, Kay Khosraw.
Hej. 634.
A. D. 1236.

AL A O ' D D I N being dead, the princes took the oath of fidelity to his son Gayatho'ddîn a Kay Khosraw; who presently after seized Gayer Khân, prince of the Karazmians. The rest of them fled, with their chiefs, by Malatîyah, Kakbtîn, and Kbartabert; where they did great mischief: then, wasting the country of Semafat (H), they passed on to Sowayda. But Al Malek al Nasser, lord of Halep, assigning over to them Roba, Harrân, and other places beyond the Euphrates, they desisted from farther ravages.

A. D. 1239.

IN 637, the Mogols advanced, with a design to invade the Rûmean territories; but, on Gayatho'ddîn's sending forces into Armenia, they thought fit to forbear.

(H) Or Sezeyfat, the same with Samofat, on the Euphrates, to the north of Al Bir.

a NEXT year a Turkmân prophet, called Baba, appeared at Amasia, who drew after him multitudes of people, by the strange tricks which he performed, in order to deceive them. He sent one If-bâk (or Isaak), a disciple, in a doctor's gown, through the other parts of the country of Rûm, to draw in the Turkmâns; who succeeded so well, that, at Somayfat, he had gathered no fewer than 6000 horse, besides foot, chiefly of those people. Thus strengthened, they began to propagate their imposture by force, making war upon all who would not say, there is no God but God Bâba (A); is the apostle of God. So that they slew a great number of the inhabitants, both Moslems and Christians, of Hesno'Imansîr, Kakbtîn, Gargar, and Somayfat, who refused to follow them: they likewise put to flight all the troops which opposed them in their way to Amasia.

b HEREUPON Gayatho'ddîn sent an army against them, in which was a body of Franks, who were in his pay. But the Moslems giving way, through fear, the Franks set themselves in the front of the battle; and, making a vigorous attack, puts the rebels to flight, and killed every man of them. The two doctors, Baba and If-bâk, were taken alive, and put to death.

IN 639, Jormagîn Nowayn (B), advancing into Armenia, as far as Arzen al Rûm, took it by force, killed Senan, its sub-bashâ, with a great number of the inhabitants; and, carrying away their children captives, spread desolation wherever he came. Hereupon, next year, Soltân Gayatho'ddîn marched towards the Mogols, with a great multitude of men, and military stores, such as had not been known before. Besides his own troops, he was assisted by Greeks, Franks, Georgians, Armenians, and Arabs. The two armies met in a place called Kusadag, belonging to Arzenjân: but, on the first attack, all the auxiliary forces turned their backs and fled. The Soltân, astonished at this event, fled likewise to Cæsarea: whence carrying his wives and children to Ankûra (or Ancyra), he there fortified himself.

THE Mogols, no less surprized at the flight of the enemy, kept themselves still all that day, not daring to pursue, suspecting it was only an artifice to draw them into ambuscades: because they could perceive no reason that such a numerous army had to fly. But, as soon as they came to know the truth of the matter, they penetrated into the country of Rûm, and sat down before Siwâs; which having surrendered to them, they spared the lives of the inhabitants; but took away all their effects, burnt all the warlike engines they found there, and demolished the city walls. From hence proceeding to Kaysariyah (or Cæsarea), the citizens opposed them for a few days: but at length the Mogols, taking the place by force, put the principal inhabitants to the sword, torturing them, to discover their riches.

AFTER this they returned, carrying the women and children along with them, without entering any farther into the Soltân's dominions. This news coming to Malatîyah, where our author Abû'l-faraj and his father then were, Rashîdo'ddîn, its prince, and many of the inhabitants, fled, for fear of the Mogols; who in their passage slew several of them, near the town of Bajûza, ten Persian leagues distant; but without coming nearer the city, held on their way to Arzenjân, which they took by assault, and served in the same manner as they had done Kaysariyah. The Soltân finding himself in no condition to oppose the enemy, sent ambassadors to desire peace; which was granted him, on condition that he should annually pay a large tribute in money, horses, vests, and other things of value.

IN 642, Gayatho'ddîn sent a great army to besiege Tarsus: but, as they were on the point of taking it, news arrived of his death; upon which they retired from before the city, in autumn, when there fell very heavy rains.

THIS prince was given to wine, and speaking idly. He led a life very unbecoming his dignity, indulging himself in pernicious desires. He married the daughter of the king of the Georgians; whom he loved to such a degree, that he had her image stamped upon his coin. The reverse of some was a lion, with the sun over its head. The astrologers told him, that in case he had the figures engraved, which represented his horoscope, he should succeed in all his designs.

f HE left three sons, Azzo'ddîn, Rokno'ddîn, and Alao'ddîn. The two first by Rûmean women; the last by a Georgian. He declared the eldest for his successor, appointing for his tutor and Atabek Jalalo'ddîn Kortây, a person of great integrity and rigid chastity.

THE article of Gayatho'ddîn, given by D'Herbelot, seems to be taken intirely from Abû'l-faraj, whom he quotes twice; yet, at the end, puts the name of Kondamîr, as if the whole was extracted from that author.

THE Byzantine historians mention this Soltân, whom they call Jathbatines: but say, he was the son of Azatines, who succeeded his uncle Jathbatines. For all this false genealogy, which is common with the Greek writers, 'tis evident, from their own account, that he is the Soltân in question ; not only as they make him contemporary with John Dukas, surnamed Vatazes, second emperor of Nice, who began his reign in the year 1222 ; but they give him just such a character, as we find in Abû'l-faraj ; viz. that of a slothful prince, who delighted in drunken and debauched company. What goes still farther to decide the point, they say, his father excelled, in military affairs, all his predecessors : which character can be applicable only to Alao'ddin.

sion,

WITH regard to the transactions of his reign, those historians inform us : that the Tankbâri (C), a nation of Tartars, having invaded his dominions, and defeated his army, he sent to Vatazes, desiring assistance, as well by his advice as forces. In this, he said, both of them would find their advantage ; since, in case the enemy subdued the Moslems, they would next invade the Romans. Vatazes, judging this to be a right measure, entered into a league with the Soltân, and had an interview with him at Tripolis, on the Meander ; which river Gayatho'ddin (D) passed over a bridge, made in haste, with rafts or floats of timber joined together. The two princes not only gave their hands to each other, but to all their followers of distinction. After this they agreed, in the strongest terms, to join their forces against the enemy : but the Tankbâri, for a while, suspended the war against the Soltân, that they might go and attack the Khalîfah of Babylon ^a.

NEXT year ambassadors came from the Great Khân Oktay, requiring the Soltân to come and pay him homage : but he excused himself ; alleging, that, as both the Greek and Armenian kings were his enemies, they would seize his dominions in his absence. Mean time, he obliged the ambassadors with gifts ; and, at length, sent his brother Rokno'ddin (F), under the care of Bahao'ddin, the interpreter, whom he made his Atabek (or tutor). He also appointed for his own Wazîr Shams'o'ddin, a learned native of Isfâhan ; whose credit was so great, that he married the Soltân's mother : which, however, the grandees were much offended at. This year the Great Khân died ; and, the next, a Kuriltay, or grand assembly, was called ; at which, besides the Mogol princes, there were present many foreign potentates ; and, among the rest, Soltân Rokno'ddin, from the country of Rûm. In this grand council Kayûk, eldest son of the late emperor, was chosen to succeed him.

IN 545, Kayûk, the Great Khân, sent lieutenants into several parts of his empire ; appointing Iljiktay Nowayn for the countries of Rûm, Musol, Syria, and Gorj (G). At the same time he granted the government of Rûm to Soltân Rokno'ddin, and ordered Soltân Azzo'ddin to be removed. Next year Rokno'ddin, and the interpreter Bahao'ddin, arriving with 2000 Mogol horse, to put this decree in execution, Soltân Azzo'ddin was advised by his Wazîr Shams'o'ddin to oppose it, and withdraw to some castle near the sea. When Kortay heard this, he seized the Wazîr, and sent him to Bahao'ddin ; who immediately dispatched some of the Mogol chiefs to Koniyah, to make him discover where his treasures were ; which, having done, they put him to death. After this the interpreter and Kortay meeting, agreed to divide the dominions between the two brothers. Azzo'ddin was to have Koniyah, Aksera, Ankûra, (or Ancyra), Anatolia (H), and the rest of the western provinces : Rokno'ddin, Kasariyah, Siwâs, Malatiah, Arzengan, Arzen al Rûm, and the provinces to the east. They likewise appointed Alao'ddin, the youngest, a proper portion for his maintenance ; and had money coined in all their names, with this inscription, the great kings Azz. Rokn. and Ala ^c.

IN 652, there came several ambassadors, one after the other, to Soltân Azzo'ddin, lord of Rûm ; requiring him to go and pay homage to Munkaka Khân (I). He accordingly set out : but hearing, at Siwâs, that the Omera (K) were inclined to place Rokno'ddin in his throne, he returned in haste to Koniyah, and sent Alao'ddin in his room, with letters, setting forth ; that he had sent his brother, who was no less king than himself ; but that he could not come, because his Atabek Kortay was dead, and his enemies to the west (L) were at war with him : ^f a however, that when he was delivered from the fears of them, he would wait on the Khân himself. Alao'ddîn accordingly set out ; but died on the way, before he reached the Orda (M).

Azzo'ddîn, conceiving that he should never be safe while his brother Rokno'ddîn lived, resolved to put him to death. This design taking wind, the Omera contrived his escape. They dressed him in the clothes of a cook's boy ; and putting a bowl, with meat in it, on his head, sent him out of the palace and castle (N), along with certain boys who carried victuals to a neighbouring house : then, setting him on horseback, they conducted him to Kaysariyah ; where a great number of Omeras repairing to him, they got together an army, and marched towards Koniyah against Azzo'ddîn : but the Soltân, marching out with what troops he had about him, put them to flight ; and Rokno'ddîn, being taken prisoner, was cast, fettered, into

b the castle of Dawalu.

THE year following, Bayeju Nowayn, being obliged to remove from the plain of Mugân (O), where he used to winter, in order to give place to Hûlakû (P), sent a messenger to Soltân Azzo'ddîn, requiring some place to winter in with his troops : but the Soltân, instead of complying, pretended that he had deserted from his prince ; and, collecting forces, gave him battle at Khano'l Soltân, between Koniyah and Aksera. However, Azzo'ddîn happening to be defeated (Q), Bayeju took his brother out of prison, and put him in possession of all the Rûmean dominions¹.

It was, doubtless, in the above-mentioned battle that Mikhael Paleologus was present, as we are told by the Greek historians ; whom we must now follow for a while. These historians inform us, that, in the year 1255, Paleologus (R), who had been imprisoned, on suspicion of some dangerous designs, escaped, and fled to the Turks. It happened, that, while he was at the Soltân's court, the Tatars (S), after having ravaged the greatest part of his dominions, came and besieged the city of Axara (T). Hereupon the Turks marched out against them, giving to Paleologus the command of the Greek forces. The Tatars, being repulsed at the first onset by Paleologus, or, as others say, dismayed at the sight of such numerous forces, were upon the point of flying, when one of the Turkish generals went over to them, with the troops under his command ; which changed the fortune of the field. The Tatars encouraged, returned to the charge, and defeating the Turks in their turn, made a great slaughter with their arrows, pursuing them a considerable way. Paleologus, upon this, joined Peklarpek (U) with his troops ; and they two retired, for several days together, with the enemy at their heels, till they got to Kastamona (X), near which that officer resided.

THE Tatars now over-ran the country, and the Turkish forces being dispersed, the Soltân flies to the emperor ; who received him kindly ; but could spare him only 400 men, under the command of Isaac Ducas, surnamed Murtzuflus (Y). The Soltân, in requital, gave him the city of Laodicea : which, however, soon returned to the Turks ; because the Romans could not defend it. After all, the Soltân not being able to oppose the Tatars, he obtained peace, by becoming tributary. Mean time the emperor wrote to Paleologus, inviting him to return home ; his reconciliation having been made by means of the bishop of Kogni (or Koniyah) : and, soon after his return the emperor died, in 1258².

In the foregoing account, from the Greek historians, we find no mention of the dispute between Azzo'ddîn and his brother Rokno'ddîn ; which was, in a great measure, the cause of this Tatar war : but Pakhamire, in one place of his history, occasionally introduces it. He there tells us in general, that Soltân Azatines (so he calls Azzo'ddîn) had great contests with his brother Rukratin (that is Rokno'ddîn), after the death of their father Jathatines (or Gaya-tho'ddîn) : that Rukratin, having taken arms, and obtained considerable forces from the Tatars, became strong enough to oppress his brother : that Azatines upon this retired to the court of the emperor Theodorus Laskaris ; who received him civilly : but let him know, that he could not shelter him in his dominions, for fear of drawing on himself the resentment of the

From this passage, and several others, occurring in Pakhamire, and the rest of the Byzantine historians, which are brought in abruptly, and out of place, there appears reason to believe, that the Greeks had particular histories or memoirs of the Soltâns ; of which they have only given us pieces occasionally in the reigns of their emperors, as they related to their own affairs, and that, for the general, without either the proper elucidations or connections. But to return to our subject.

Hejrah 655.
A. D. 1257.

As Abu'l-faraj does not mention what became of Azzo'ddîn, after he was removed from the throne by Bayejû, the Mogol general ; neither does he tell us how he recovered it again : but, proceeding as if no such revolution had happened, informs us, that, in 655, this Soltân sent an ambassador to Hûlâkû, to testify his submission, and intreat him to drive Bayejû Nowayn out of his kingdom, Hûlâkû, in answer, ordered that he should divide the Rûmean territories with his brother. Hereupon Azzo'ddîn returned to Koniyab, and Rokno'ddîn went with Bayejû to the camp. Azzo'ddîn being still afraid of this Mogol, sent into the parts about Malatîyah and Khartabert, to raise an army of Kûrds, Turkmâns, and Arabs. The officer sent him two commanders of the Kûrds, Abmed ebn Belâs and Mohammed ebn ol Skeykh Adi ; to whom the Soltân assigned the said cities.

in vain.

EBN SKEYKH ADI, being met on the way to Khartabert by Angûrk Nowayn, was slain, with his followers ; and the people of Malatîyah, having taken an oath to Rokno'ddîn, refused to receive Ebn Belâs ; who thereupon treating them ill, they killed 300 of his men. With the rest he fled by Klaudiya (A) towards Amed (B) ; where he was slain by the lord of Mayaferkîn. Azzo'ddîn appointed in his room one Ali Babâdr ; who, being a bold man, the citizens, thro' fear, admitted him. And he did them great service : for he cleared the country of the Al Jâzi, a tribe of Turkmâns, who used in their incursions to kill the inhabitants, and carry off their children. These he defeated, and took their commander Jutabeg prisoner.

MEAN while Bayejû Nowayn, advancing with his forces, obliged all the castles, which had been delivered up, to submit to Rokno'ddîn. Then going to the city of Abolostayn (C), he slew about 6000 of the inhabitants, and made captives of the women and children.

submits.

On his approach to Malatîyah, Ali Babâdr fled to Kâkhtab ; and the citizens, going to meet him with presents, submitted to Rokno'ddîn ; who set over them one of his slaves, named Fakro'ddîn Ayyaz. But as soon as Bayejû had gotten beyond the borders of Rûm, in his way to Irâk, Ali Babâdr returned : and, being denied admittance, besieged the city. At length, provisions growing very scarce, some of the common people opened a gate, by which Ali entered and his Turkmâns. Having thus recovered the possession of Malatîyah, he cast Soltân Rokno'ddîn's governor into prison, and put a few of the leading men, who opposed him, to death.

famine there.

AT the same time the famine was so great in the district of this city, that cats, dogs, and leather, were eaten, for want of food. A friend of the author's saw in a certain village a company of women in a house cutting pieces of flesh out of a corpse which lay before them, and broiling them to eat. Likewise another, who baked her dead child ; imagining, that his flesh would agree better with her than that of vermin. In short, Ali Babâdr, though he subdued the town, could not withstand the calamity ; but retired to Soltân Azzo'ddîn.

IN 657, Hûlâkû sent for Azzo'ddîn, Soltân of the Rûms, and his brother Rokno'ddîn ; who obeying his summons, he went out to meet them, expressing great satisfaction at their coming. Then he appointed Azzo'ddîn to reign over the country from Kaysariyah to the borders of Greater Armenia ; and Rokno'ddîn to command from Aksera to the sea-coast bounding the territories of the Franks. After this he began his march for Syria ; and, when he drew near the Euphrates, the two brothers, taking their leave, returned with joy to their own dominions ¹.

WE find no farther account in Abu'l-faraj of these two Soltâns (who reigned together, or interchangeably) ; although that author is more particular in relating their transactions than those of any of the former : but the defect is, in some measure, supplied by the Greek historians, who happen to begin, as it were, just where he leaves off.

ALTHOUGH we left the two Soltâns going home in good harmony ; yet, according to the Greek historians, they did not long continue so. They tell you, that, after the death of Theodorus Laskaris, Mikhael Paleologus, being made the associate in the empire with his son John, after strengthening the frontier places with garrisons, sent an embassy to the Turks, to notify his advancement ; and that, not long after, setting out with the young emperor on a new a progress, he received, at Nymphæum, an embassy, with presents, from the Soltân; whose affairs were in a very bad condition: for, being threatned with an invasion from the Tatars (or Mogols), every person, instead of saving the state, thought only of saving his family, and the governors every-where revolted.

PALEOLOGUS, upon intimation of this, gave the Soltân an invitation to come and reside at Mikhael his court, promising to let him return when his affairs were settled. The cause of the Soltân's fear was, the news which he received of the arrival of Malek (D), with a formidable army. This Malek had fled, it seems, to the emperor before; and Azzo'ddîn was afraid he might escape, and cross the design he had of re-establishing his affairs^k. In another place the same author informs us, that the reason of Azzo'ddîn's applying to the emperor was, because Rukratin had gathered new forces^l (E). However that be, the Soltân accepted of the offer; and, relying on the friendship of Paleologus, retired, with his wife, children, his mother (who was a Christian), and his sister, to Constantinople^m.

SOME authors tell us, that, after the former defeat of Azatin, the Tatars, instead of penetrating farther into his dominions, went and conquered Syria: but that, returning next year, they crossed the river a second time, marched into Kappadocia, and took Ikonium; from whence Azatin fled, with his brother Malek, and his family, to the emperor Mikhael Paleologus; who, not long before, had retired for shelter to his courtⁿ. Nicephorus Gregoras relates, that Azatin, taking occasion from the invasion of the Tatars, shook off the Persian (he means the Turkish) yoke, and subdued several provinces belonging to the eastern emperors: but that he was obliged at length, with his son Moloko, to retire to Mikhael Paleologus, after having been routed by the Tatars, in the year 1261^o. Here we find several Maleks, who possibly might all have been the same person, considering the inaccuracy of the Greek authors; and that Malek simply is no other than a title, signifying king, which was given to the prince of the Seljuk blood.

BUT to return to Azzo'ddîn. Paleologus received him with great shew of friendship, and promised in time to furnish him with troops, to recover his kingdom. Mean while he suffered the Soltân to live intirely at liberty, to sit in his presence, to have his guards, and wear the purple buskins. In July 1261, Constantinople being recovered out of the hands of the Latins, he returned from Nice, with his colleague John. Next year he sent ambassadors to Khalau (or Hûlâkû), prince of the Tatars, in Persia, and another to the Soltân of Ethiopia (rather Egypt). As for Azatin, he was at Constantinople; where, strolling about to view the streets and public places, which were almost quite unpeopled, he led a debauched life, with his followers, expecting the performance of the emperor's promise: but all Mikhael's fair outside was only dissimulation; for, being very intent on making an alliance with the Tatars, he sent the Soltân's wife and children to Nice, under pretence of greater security; at the same time he actually promised Mary (F), his natural daughter, to Khalau, who yet died before she arrived at his court. After this he concluded an alliance with Apagan (G).

THE Soltân, after a tedious stay at Constantinople, having discovered that the emperor was treating with his enemies, wrote to an uncle of his, who dwelt towards the Euxine sea, on the north side; intreating him to work his deliverance, by exciting Constantine, king of Bulgaria, and Nogas, Khân of the Tatars (H), against Paleologus: in which case, he said, he would endeavour to deliver that prince into their hands. The Soltân's uncle having agreed to this proposal, Azatines, pursuant to leave obtained, repaired to the emperor, who was then in the west, under pretence of seeing that part of his dominions. In their return back, within a day's march of mount Hemus, Paleologus, to his great astonishment, understood that the Bulgarians and Tatars had passed the straits, spoiling and killing where-ever they came. The emperor, who had not forces to oppose them, left the Soltân, with his baggage, in the night, and, getting to the sea-side, passed in a bark to his capital. Azatines, with those who had care of the baggage, retired to the fort of Ainé (I). Presently the enemy came, and, besieging the place, it was at length agreed, that the Soltân, and his attendants, should be delivered to them; on condition that they withdrew, and suffered the rest to retire, with the baggage, to the port; which they did: and the next day came some succours by sea; with whom they returned to Constantinople. The emperor, enraged at their conduct, punished the chief of them; and, imprisoning the wife, mother, daughter, and sister, of the Soltân, with their children, confiscated all their effects^p. HISTORIANS, both eastern and western, disagree so much with regard to this Soltân, that an author, for want of farther helps, must be at a great nonplus how to reconcile them. The Greeks and Abû'lfaraj agree to make Azzo'ddin Soltân of Koniya; and, from all circumstances of the history, he must have been so, at least for a term of years. But D'Herbelot, after the Persian historians, makes Rokno'ddin the Soltân: possibly, because he was supported by the Mogols, and continued to reign after Azzo'ddin was expelled: yet he recites from them only two transactions of his reign. He informs us, that Rokno'ddin Soleyman, having sent his brother Alao'ddin Kaykobâd to the court of the Great Khân of the Mogols, to transact the affairs of the Seljûkians, that prince gained the favour of the Khân by his address; and returned with such ample powers, that Soleyman finding himself almost wholly deprived of his authority by Kaykobâd, bribed one of his domestics to poison him: that Abâka Khân, being informed of this ill office which Soleyman had done his brother, ordered him to be served in the same manner (*), in the year 664, after he had reigned twenty years. He left for his successor his son Kay Khosraw, who had his confirmation from the same Khân^q.

(D) Who this Malek was, we are quite at a loss to know, the author having said no more about him. Perhaps he was the Soltân's brother, mentioned a little lower down.

(E) Sure Rukratin and Malek cannot be the same person: for no author speaks of Rokno'ddîn's flying for shelter to the emperor. Pakhmire aims more at accuracy in style than history, or order of time in ranging his facts; is very verbose, yet deficient in matter.

It is evident, from the testimony of Abû'lfaraj, a subject of the Seljûkian empire, backed by that of the Greek writers, that Azzo'ddin immediately succeeded his father Gayatho'ddin. It appears also, that soon after Rokno'ddin's being set up by the Mogols, and the monarchy divided between them, they both reigned at the same for several years, each in his respective territories; that, at length, Azzo'ddin, being expelled by the Mogols or Tatars, Rokno'ddin reigned alone (†) over the whole. It seems therefore but just, that Azzo'ddin should be reckoned among the Soltâns, as well as Rokno'ddin; and the rather as we find him named first on the coin mentioned by Abû'lfaraj. But whether we divide the reigns of the two brothers, ending that of Azzo'ddin with his last abdication, or make but one reign of both, it must be observed, that Kondamir (or whatever author D'Herbelot took these few particulars from, for he recites no one), disagrees with Abû'lfaraj in two or three very essential points: 1. According to him, there were no more than two brothers, Rokno'ddin and Alao'ddin; whereas Abû'lfaraj affirms there were three; of whom Azzo'ddin was the eldest. 2. He says, that Alao'ddin was sent to the Khân by Rokno'ddin. Abû'lfaraj says, Azzo'ddin sent both him and Rokno'ddin on that embassy. 3. He affirms, that Alao'ddin returned into Rûm, and was there poisoned by Rokno'ddin. Abû'lfaraj affirms, on the contrary, that Alao'ddin died on the road into Taiary.

WITH regard to this Alao'ddin, which-ever death he died, he may have been one of the Alao'ddins mentioned in the Turkish history, under whom the father of Othmân served; for he was a King or Soltân in the share of the Seljûkian dominions, which was given him, as appears by the above-mentioned coin.

IN the reigns of these two Soltâns, the Roman empire, which, ever since the death of Gayatho'ddin Kay Khosraw, slain by Theodorus Laskaris, in 1210, seems to have been free from the depredations of the Turks, began to be invaded by them with greater fury than ever it had been before: not so much from inclination, which governed their former invasions, as necessity, which obliged them to it in their own defence. For as the dissensions between the two brothers gave encouragement to the governors towards the borders of the Seljûkian dominions to set up for themselves; so, on the invasion of the Mogols, the Turks, to avoid them, retired westward, in great multitudes, under different commanders: who, the better to secure themselves against those formidable enemies, and gain new possessions in the place of those they had abandoned, fell, with all their force at once, on every side of the Roman territories in Asia, which then were in a most defenceless state; and, in the compass of a few years, subdued the whole, as will be shewn more at large in the next reign.

KAY KHOSRAW III. son of Rokno'ddin Soleyman, being but an infant when he ascended the throne in 664, Abâka Khân, who married his mother, appointed Pervaneh Kashi (‡) for his tutor (or Atabek). This Soltân reigned eighteen years; at the end of which, in 682, he a was killed, by order of Abmed Khân (K), who succeeded Abaka Khân; and Massîd, son of Kaykaws, was afterwards appointed his successor by Argûn Khân, who succeeded Abmed.

THIS is all which D'Herbelot furnishes from the oriental authors, relating to this prince, whom he reckons the twelfth Soltân; nor does Abû'lfaraj mention any of the Soltâns after Azzo'ddin, uncle to Kay Khosraw. However, we meet with a passage in him, which we shall cite, as it relates to Perwaneh, the Soltân's tutor, and the affairs of his kingdom.

THAT author informs us, that, in the year 675, Bendokdâr, Soltân of Egypt, excited by some fugitives, resolved to invade the territories of Rûm; which king Leân, son of the king of Armenia (Hatem), being informed of, sent notice to the Mogol commanders who were in that country. But this advice being represented to them as false, by Berwânab (L), who wished well to b Bendokdâr, and hated the Armenian king, they paid no regard to it. So that the Egyptians invaded Rûm: came upon them at a time when they were so overcome with liquor that they could not mount their horses: and as, by their Yasa (M), or laws, they are obliged not to fly till they have faced the enemy, they gave them battle; in which all the great Mogul officers were slain, besides most of their men, and 2000 out of 3000 Gorj (N), who were with them. The Egyptians likewise lost a vast number on their side. Berwânab, on this news, fled to a castle for security. Bendokdâr, after his victory, encamped in a place called Kaykobâd, near Kasariyab, where he remained fifteen days, without doing the least hurt, or taking any thing without paying for it. Nor did he enter that city more than once; saying, that he came not to lay waste the country, but to deliver its lord from slavery.

c As soon as Abâka Khân (O) was informed of this misfortune, he gathered forces, and marched into the country of the Rûms: but Bendokdâr, knowing himself unable to withstand him, had retired into Syria before he arrived. Berwânab went to meet the Khân, who received him without any shew of resentment, and took him with him in his return to the Tâk (P); under pretence of consulting what number of forces would be sufficient to guard the country of Rûm against the Egyptians. Being arrived in the camp, the Khân made a magnificent feast, wherein he took care to ply Berwânab with mare's milk (Q), for he drank no wine. At length, the latter going out to draw water, Abâka gave the sign to some in waiting, who followed, and cut him in pieces (R). This was the end of a traitor: nor did Bendokdâr long survive him; for he died at Hems (in Syria), in his return to Egypt. Some say of a wound received by an arrow, d in the engagement with the Mogols; others by poison, infused by one of his domestics in the mare's milk, which he called for (S) to drink.

HAVING nothing farther to say from the east, let us turn westward, and view the miserable condition of the Greeks; unable to resist the power of the Turks, who, like an inundation, suddenly overwhelmed them. As we have already mentioned the defenceless state of the empire at this juncture, it will be proper to set forth by what means it came to be reduced to such a weak condition. To do this the more effectually, it may be necessary to take the matter a little higher. Although, on the accession of Theodorus Laskaris to the throne, the empire of Nice was confined to the narrow bounds of only three cities, Nice, Prusa, and Philadelphia; yet affairs were managed with such prudence, that the state was secure against all its enemies. The better to oppose the Franks, who had taken Constantinople, and were masters of the sea, the ministers made peace with the Turks; paying them yearly a large sum, and then turned all their forces against the former. After they had done with them, they applied themselves to fortify the mountains, in spite of all the endeavours of the Turks to hinder them.

They built forts, committing the care of them to the natives of the country ; and thus secured the empire on that side. a

As the people who inhabited those mountains were inclinable to change sides, and did not care to run any risk by resisting the enemy ; the emperors attached them to their interest, by exempting them from certain taxes, and bestowing considerable bounties on the principal persons among them, who, by that means, became very rich. Their zeal for their country increased with their wealth : so that they made it their business to surprize the enemy in the night, carrying off much plunder ; and chose rather to prevent their coming, than wait for them. The care which was taken of the fortresses had this happy effect ; and that those who guarded them might not be tempted to desert them, there were troops in the neighbourhood, ready to support them †.

owing.

A. D. 1260.

By these good regulations, the affairs of the Greeks were so greatly advanced in the east, that when Mikbael Paleologus returned from Nice to Constantinople, upon its being taken from the Latins in 1260, Asia minor, Paphlagonia (T), Bitbynia the Greater, and Capatian Phrygias, with Karia, were under the obedience of the Romans (U), and paid them tribute †.

BUT after Mikbael had removed the seat of his empire, and the inhabitants, especially those who had been in command, were returned, the people who possessed the mountains were exceedingly weakened ; and, no longer receiving any succours, were themselves obliged to sustain the weight of the war. To make the matter still worse, the affairs of the empire (in Europe), falling afterwards into a bad state, Mikbael Paleologus, by the advice of Kadenus, governor of Constantinople, stripped those people, who were rich, of their effects ; and allowing each forty crowns pension, ordered the rest of the revenues arising from the lands, and which amounted to considerable sums, to be brought to the treasury : which ill treatment diminished their strength and took away their courage. c

westward.

THE emperor, in all likelihood, was the more easily induced to do this, as he apprehended no danger from the side of the Turks ; whom he kept at peace by continual treaties, and who were too much employed by the Tatars to give him any disturbance. But that which seemed to promise most security, proved most pernicious to his interest : for shortly after, by an unforeseen event, the Turks crouding westward, to avoid the army of the enemy, and being too many for the country to make themselves room, began to invade the Roman empire ; or, to speak in the words of our author, the most valiant among the Turks, finding, after being vanquished by the Tatars, that they had no other recourse but their arms, retired into the mountains, and committed robberies. With this view, they assembled in great numbers, and attacked the Romans ; who, being weak, were obliged to yield to them. d

mountains.

THEY would have suffered themselves to be quite driven out of the country, if the pensions which they still received had not withheld them. The desire of preserving that little which was left them made them defend the places, and desire the aid of Roman troops, when they were hard pressed : but then they never exposed themselves to make sallies, or fight in the open field ; and as soon as those salaries were retrenched, some of the soldiers went over to the enemy, and the rest retired whither they thought fit.

THE Turks, having thus become masters of those parts, made incursions through the country, plundering it at pleasure ; and extremely incommoded the Roman forces, who were continually harassed between them in the east, and the Franks in the west †. e

defenceless :

A. D. 1266.

As the emperor had not forces enough to divide them, and thought it of most importance to preserve that part of his dominion which lay in Europe, he employed them chiefly against the last enemy who threatened Constantinople itself. By this means the east came to be neglected ; and, being destitute of troops, as well as garrisons, was exposed to the ravages of the Turks : so that about the time that Soltân Azzo'ddin made his escape from Ainum, the affairs of the country were in dreadful confusion ; especially about the river Meander, where the Turks had seized many towns and monasteries : but John the Despot repairing thither in time, saved the chief of them, and secured Tralles, Karyster, and other advanced places. He likewise prevented the loss of the Magedonians, those expert archers, who were in danger of being subdued, for want of the forces which had been called away to the defence of the west. The Turks, intimidated by the vigour with which the Despot proceeded, sent to offer him their prisoners, and demand a peace, which was granted. f

BUT while the emperor by his arms saved towns on one side, he lost whole nations and provinces on the other, by his exactions ; for he laid such heavy taxes on the Mariandines, Bucellarians, and Paphlagonians, either to pay his foreign troops, or keep these people in subjection those within land), the Mariandines, Molinians, and the generous Enetes, were ruined to a deplorable degree: the fortresses of Kromitus, Amastris, and Tios, which are near the sea, had nothing left of their ancient splendor; and must have been destroyed, but for the advantage of their situation, which made it easy to relieve them. In short, Anatolia, was so over-run by the enemy, that the Sangarius served as the frontier, and there was no possibility of getting to Heraklea by land. This bad state of the east was owing to the treachery of the men in command; who, that they might have the better opportunity to enrich themselves, made the emperor believe the losses which happened in those parts were so inconsiderable, that it was not worth his while to cross the sea to repair them: which false report, as Mikhael said himself, was what contributed most of all to its ruin².

Magedon, sent Andronicus, his son, and associate in the empire, with a considerable army, accompanied by a great many persons of distinction. In his march along the Meander, he beheld the ruins of Tralles (X), formerly a famous city; and, being charmed with the beauty of its situation, resolved to rebuild it, and give it the name either of Andronicopolis or Paleologopolis. As the masons were at work, they found an oracle cut on a piece of marble, declaring; that, in time to come, a prince should raise this city out of its ruins, and build it with greater magnificence than ever.

d ANDRONICUS, applying the oracle to himself, in hopes of the long life which was promised A false oracle.
to its restorer, undertook to rebuild it, and set about the business with great earnestness. But this oracle was no other than an illusion, which proved the death of an infinite number of people. When the walls were finished along the Meander, no fewer than 35,000 came to inhabit the place. However, they were scarce warm in their houses, when they found themselves of a sudden besieged by an army of Turks, commanded by Mantakbia, surnamed Salpace; which, in their language, says our author, signifies a strong man. As the soil afforded no springs, and there were neither fountains, cisterns, nor wells, in the place, Libadarius, the grand Cartulary, who commanded there, knew not what to do. The inhabitants would have been content, though reduced to eat vermin, and even dead bodies, could they only have found drink
e with such bad food. Many died for thirst (Y); and others, to avoid that death, went to beg relief from the enemy, who drove them back, or killed them.

THOSE within relying on the oracle, and the hopes of succour, the Turks resolved to make The city is set fire to the wood: a breach being thus made, they took the city by storm, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Before this, they took Nissa; which, in like manner, fell into their hands, for want of forces to relieve it. What is most strange, the young emperor was at Nymphæum all the while they were performing those two exploits: after which they ravaged and plundered Anatolia without controul.

in haste set forward to stop their inroads. When he beheld the dreadful desolation which they had A. D. 1281.
made, he was struck with the deepest anguish. On this occasion he told the patriarch of Alexandria, that the attempts of certain persons to stir up his subjects against him, by condemning his conduct, had obliged him to neglect the care of the provinces, in order to look to his own safety: and that the governors, to whom he had intrusted those distant parts of his dominions, had concealed from him the distress they were in, either because they had been gained over by presents, or thro' fear of being punished for their neglect.

THEY found so great a quantity of fruit under the trees, that it served to subsist one half a of the army. The Turks retired as fast as the emperor advanced: who wanting the necessary conveniencies for pursuing them in the hilly countries, whither they had retreated; he was content to secure the frontiers, by repairing the old forts, and building new ones in those places where the Sangarius was most narrow and fordable. He likewise gave orders to fortify the river, for a certain space, with trees; whose branches were so thick, and well intermixed, that a snake could not make his way thro' them ^a.

Fourteenth Sol-tân, Massûd.

MASSUD, surnamed Gayatho'ddin, was the son of Azzo'ddin Kaykaws, son of Gayatho'ddin the dominions which his predecessor had conquered in Asia minor, and the greater Armenia: b for, in effect, those countries were entirely subject to Argûn Khân, from whom he received the investiture of them ^b. D'Herbelot, who gives this short account of him, at the end of an article relative to a different prince, mentions the time neither when he began nor ended his reign: but in the table or list of the Soltâns of Rûm ^c, his death is put in 687. It must be observed, that there was an interregnum of one year, at least of some months, from the death of Kay Khosraw, to the death of Abmed; and it does not appear when Argûn Khân invested Massûd: but supposing it to have been in his first year, or 683, then Massûd must have reigned but four or five years at most.

Hej. 687.
A. D. 1288.

His story imperfect.

THIS is all the information which has yet come to our hands, from the oriental historians, concerning this prince: as for the Greek writers, their memoirs are so confused and imperfect, c that we can deliver nothing with certainty from them. We find no more relating to Rukratin, or Rokno'ddin, than what has been already taken notice of, altho' he must have reigned several years after his brother's expulsion; nor any mention of Kay Khosraw, who reigned after him for the space of eighteen years. They tell you, indeed, that the son of Azetines, or Azzo'ddin, who retired to Constantinople, and whom they call Malek, did, a long time after his retreat from thence with his father, recover his dominions. We cannot positively say that this Malek is the Massûd of the oriental authors, although there are circumstances in his story which favour that opinion.

kingdom.

THE historian who gives the best account of this matter, is Pakhamîr. We have already related, from the same author, that Malek, whom he likewise calls Malek Masur (Z), fled, along d with his father Azatines, from the castle of Aine into the country beyond the Euxine sea. There they wandered together, for some years: till after the death of Azatines (A), he crossed the sea into Asia minor; and, arriving at Thymenum, gained the favour of Argûn, Khân of the Tatars. By this means he became master of the country, as his proper inheritance; and reduced to his obedience the principal Turkish commanders. But Amur (B), father of Ali, having gathered a considerable army of Tatars, fell upon Malek, and reduced him to such an extremity, that he resolved to go with his wife and children, and submit himself to the emperor. He repaired first to Heraklea of Pontus, and then to Constantinople ^a. The story thus far is related some- e what differently by the same author, in another place. He there says, that Malek a long time after his father's death, crossing the Euxine sea, stopped at Kastamona; where, having gained the good-will of the Tatars, he made an attempt to recover his father's kingdom: but having been defeated by Amur (C), he retired to Heraklea, and thence to Constantinople ^c.

Driven out.

Recovers it
again.

THE emperor Andronicus, who succeeded Mikhael, being then at Nympheum, Malek left his wife at Constantinople, and crossed over into Asia. But when he was near Endromit (D), he began to suspect the emperor's friendship; and observing that his conductor had too watchful an eye over him, complained openly of it, and quitted him; declaring, that if any body offered to stop him, he would repulse him vigorously. He retired to the Turks; and having, in a short time, acquired a more illustrious reputation, and more considerable forces than he had before, Amur became so much afraid of him, that he came with his seven sons, and humbly submitted to him. But while he lay prostrate at Malek's feet, to implore his clemency, that f prince reproached him with his former treachery; and having taken a glass of wine, as if to drink, extended his hands: on which signal those in waiting drew their swords, and slew Amur, with his sons.

Slays Omer.

HOWEVER, one escaped, named Ali, who resolved to perish, rather than not revenge the death of his father and brothers. With this view he gathered a considerable number of Turks; and ranging the country after the manner of robbers, it was Malek's ill fortune at length to fall a in his way : for as his horse ran full speed, he fell, and threw his rider, who at the same instant was run through by his enemy.

Is slain by Ali.

ALI was so puffed up with this success, that, gathering some troops, he began to ravage the Roman territories ; into which the river Sangarius, by an unforeseen accident (E), gave him admittance. At the head of this account we are told, that Ali, and Nasratius, his brother, had been a long time with the Romans as hostages : and that, having gained the affections of the Turks, who dwelt about Kastamona, they committed divers acts of hostility against the people who inhabited towards the Euxine sea, and the river Sangarius, without daring to advance farther ; but that his insolence increased, after he had slain Malek Masur (F) (rather Masut), the son of Soltân Azatines ^f.

b THERE is nothing in this account of the Greeks inconsistent with that of the orientals. On the contrary, it seems confirmed by two circumstances : one is the name of Masur, which is doubtless a mistake for Masut, as the Greeks write Masûd ; the other, that he was advanced by the favour of Argûn Khân, as it appears Masûd was.

WE must not forget to mention that Malek, a considerable time after his retreat from Endromit, sent for his wife, who, by the emperor's consent, went to him : but his daughter remained in hostage (G), as well as Constantine Malek (H), another son of Azatines, who had been baptized, and lived after the manner of the Greeks ^g. It is not mentioned at what time he sent for the Soltâna : but it must have been before he obtained the kingdom, in regard the emperor Mikbael died the year before that event ; namely, in the year 1283.

c MASSUD was succeeded by his nephew Kaykobad.

KAYKOBAD, the last Soltân of Rûm, was the son of Faramorz, son of Kaykaws ; and succeeded his uncle Masûd, under the authority of Gazân Khân, who confirmed or invested him in the dominions of his ancestors, in the year 687 (I) : but having revolted against that prince some years after, the Mogols took from him all his dominions : then seizing his person, put him to death ; and, at the same time, an end to this last branch and dynasty of the Seljukians ^h.

Fifteenth Soltân Kaykobad: A. D. 1288.

THIS happened, according to the table of the Seljukian princes given by D'Herbelot, in the year 700 of the Hejrah, or of Christ 1300. The Greek historians make no mention of this Soltân, with whom they had no affairs : the Turks, whom they were at that time engaged in war with, having been the Seljuk commanders ; who, taking advantage of the distractions caused by the Mogol invasion, threw off their dependence on the Soltân, and set up for themselves.

d IN order to repress their progress in the Roman territories, the emperor Andronicus made Alexis, surnamed Philantropenus (who was his cup-bearer, and second son of Tarkoniatos, the protovestiary), governor of Asia minor and Lydia. Philantropenus, having then under his command the troops of Kandia, and at length all the armies of the east, displayed so much valour, and gained so many victories, that, during his government, which continued a long time, he restored the affairs of the empire in the east ; and at the same time, by his great liberality and address, gained the affection both of the Romans and their enemies. In all his expeditions he acquired much wealth, yet gave most away in presents and rewards. Of this we shall give an instance. Near Meladun there was a fort, called the Fort of the two little hills (which our author thinks was the ancient Didymion of the Milesians), where the principal wife of Salam-paces before-mentioned, who was lately deceased, had retired with inestimable treasures. As it was not possible to take the place by force, Philantropenus, making use of art to gain his ends, thought to deceive that lady by secret promises of marriage. After she had rejected his proposal, perceiving that there were posts driven into a little lake which washed the walls of the fort, he ordered planks to be fastened to them, with ropes, and built towers on them ; at the same time

(E) The accident which gave Ali a passage over the Sangarius, was this. In the month of March, that river, deserting its fortifications, made by the emperor Mikbael Paleologus, resumed its ancient bed, where the emperor Jusianian had built a bridge ; and although the river Melan took its place, yet it had not water sufficient to fill its chanel. Afterwards the Sangarius, being greatly swelled with the rains, changed its course a second time, carrying with it such a vast quantity of gravel, mud, and earth, that it might be crossed on foot. Those who garrisoned the said fortifications, seeing themselves exposed by this alteration to the inroads of the enemy, withdrew. A month after, the river took its usual chanel ; as if it had left it only to disperse the garrisons, and favour the incursions of the enemy (1).

(F) Some render it, After Malec Masur had slain the son of Soltân Azatines : but that is to say, after the son of Azatines had slain the son of Azatines, which is absurd. Besides, Ali, in slaying Malek, slew the son of Azatines ; and from thence it was that he grew so elated or insolent, as to ravage the Roman territories.

(G) She was given in marriage to Ishak Malek, as the reader will find hereafter.

(H) Other authors mention but one son. Gregoras calls him Malek Shâh ; who is more likely to be this Constantine than Masûd.

(I) D'Herbelot, in another place, p. 363, art. Gazan Khân, puts it in 702 ; which is two years after the end of his reign, and of the Seljukian dynasty.

covering the rest of the lake with vessels filled with soldiers, and engines proper for taking cities, he quickly became master of the place, and all the riches, which he distributed among his followers. These persuaded him to revolt : but Libadarius, governor of Neokastium, Lydia, and Sardes, marching against him at Nympheum, he was betrayed by the Kandiots : who seizing him at the head of his army, delivered him into the hands of that commander, who immediately ordered his eyes to be put out. His forces, which were very numerous, consisting of Turks as well as Romans, fled ; while Libadarius, with his small forces, made a great slaughter of them.

Greek affairs mind.
THE Turks, some time after, to revenge the shame of this defeat, assembling in great numbers, laid waste the whole country, from the Euxine sea to that of Rhodes. To put a stop to these disorders, the emperor sent over John Tarkoniates with money and troops, although he was an obstinate abettor of the schism which then prevailed in the church. This he did, upon a persuasion that a dissenter from the established religion might love his country ; and that to defeat the enemies of a state, depended more on the military skill, than orthodoxy of its generals. In effect, Tarkoniates, by his conduct, proved the emperor's sentiments to be just. He brought the soldiery to a proper regulation, by preferring poor men of merit to rich cowards ; and obliging those to do duty, who, presuming on their wealth, despised the orders of their commanders. By this means, in a short time, he raised a numerous army, and equipped a powerful fleet, with which he had such good success, both by land and sea, that he soon restored the affairs of the east. But they were ruined again, by the negligence and bad conduct of those who succeeded him : for the money, appointed for payment of the soldiers, being misapplied, the troops dwindled away by degrees, and laid the country open anew to the incursions of the enemy¹.

Relapse anew.
Rise of Othmân.
AMONG the commanders who headed different armies of Turks, and invaded the empire in different parts at the same time, Othmân was one ; who, from a small beginning, in a few years laid the foundation of a mighty empire, which rose out of the ruins of the Seljûkian. With regard to this latter it may be observed, that the empire of the Seljûks ended properly with Gayatho'ddin Kay Khosraw, the eleventh Soltân, who, after his defeat and losses, in Hejrab 641, became their tributary. This is noted by *Abu'lfeda*², who marks Hejrab 551 (A. D. 1156), for the first year of Kilij Arslân II which gives him a reign of only thirty-seven years, instead of forty, as we have assigned him in our table of Soltâns : that remark not having occurred time enough to correct the mistake (K).

(K) It may be proper farther to relate from Atû'lfeda, that Kilij Arslân had ten sons : that to Kotbbo'ddin Malek Shâh he gave Sivâs ; and Casaria, to Nurâ'ddin

Soltân Shâh : that this latter, after taking Konîyah from Malek Shâh, went to Aksera : that there died his father ; and Malek Shâh soon after.

The History of the Moguls and Tartars from the time of Jenghîz Khân.

C H A P. I.

A description of Western Tartary, as divided at present among the three branches of Mungls, or Moguls.

a GREAT TARTARY, or Tartary, as has been already observed^a, is divided into east and west. The eastern Tatary is possessed by several nations; who, being subject to the Manchews, at present masters of China, go by that general name. The western Tatary, which is considerably more extensive than the other, is in like manner occupied by a great number of nations or tribes of people, who are called Mungls, or Mungals, by themselves, and Moguls or Tatars indifferently by other nations. Division of Tatary.

THESE Mungls or Moguls, after various revolutions, the most remarkable of which will be related in the following history, became latterly divided into three great bodies, under different sovereigns. One retained the name of Mungls simply; the second took that of Kalkas; and the third assumed the name of Aluths, or Eluths: and among these three Mungl powers is all the western Tartary divided. So that, at present, western Tartary may be said to fall under a tripartite division: however, it must be observed, that as the country of the two first of these three Mogul branches, as well as that part properly called eastern Tartary, are subject to China; therefore some authors, particularly the jesuits, who have given us of late the history and description of that empire, divide Great Tartary in general into nearly two equal parts, by assigning mount Altay for the western limit of eastern Tartary. Perhaps it would be better to divide western Tartary into two parts: that is, to make mount Altay the partition between them, and ascribe the eastern part, comprizing the countries of the Mongols and Kalkas, to the dominion of China. But in this case every historian may do as he thinks best.

Country of the Mungls properly so called.

a THE country of the Mungls, or Mungals, called by the European geographers Mongalia (A), is bounded on the east by eastern Tartary; on the south, by the Chinese wall; on the west and north-west, by the Kobi, or great desert, and country of the Kalkas, from which it is divided by the Karû, or limits fixed by the late emperor of China, Kang-bi; and on the north by the Kalkas, and part of eastern Tartary. This is a very large region, of no less extent than the Tatary just mentioned. It is situate between the 124th and 142d degrees of eastern longitude, and between the 38th and 47th degrees of latitude: so that it is in length, from the borders of eastern Tatary in the east, to the parts over-against Ningbysa, in China, to the west, Country of the Mungls;

(A) It should rather be called Mogûlîstân, or Munglîstân; that is, in the Mungl, or Turkish language, the country of the Moguls, or Mungls; and so we find part of Tatary named by the oriental historians.

about 300 leagues; and about 200 in breadth from north to south, although not every-where so broad, as may appear by the maps^a.

famous for actions.

THE part of Tatary within this division, has been the scene of the greatest actions performed both by the eastern and western Tatars. Here the great empire of Jenghiz Khân, and his successors, had its rise and seat: here the empires of Kitay and Karakitay were founded; and here the empire of the eastern Tatars, or Manchews (now in possession of China) had its beginning. Here, for several ages, bloody wars subsisted, and many battles were fought, which decided the fate of these monarchies. Here all the riches of the southern Asia, at several times, were carried and dissipated. Lastly, in these deserts, for a time, arts and sciences were cultivated, and many populous cities flourished: but, at present, they are all destroyed^b; nor do any signs of wealth remain, which may serve to witness the once opulent condition of the country.

and rivers.

THESE territories of the Mungls are full of mountains, especially in the south parts adjoining to China; and are interspersed with rivers. Among these may be reckoned the Whangho; which, passing out of China, surrounds the country of Ortús, and then enters the empire again in the province of Shen-si: the Shantú, which enters Pe-che-li towards the sea; and the Sira Muren, which, rising to the north of the Shantú, runs east, and then, turning south, passes thro' Lyau-tong, by the name of Lyau. There are several lakes in this country, but none remarkable for their magnitude.

Division into standards.

THE countries of the Mungls are divided into several territories, or districts, according to the tribes which possess them. But since they have put themselves under the protection of the emperor of China, they have been divided into forty-nine districts called Shaffats, that is banners, or standards, under so many princes or chiefs. The situation of these territories may be considered as they respect the four gates in the great wall of China; viz. Hi-fong-kew, Ká pe-kew, Chang-kyá-kew (these three in the province of Pe-che-li), and Sha-bew-kew, in Shan-si.

First course.

PASSING north from the gate of Hi fong-kew (B) you soon arrive in the countries of Karchin, Tumet, Ohán, Nayman, and Korchin.

Karchin.

KARCHIN, which begins at the said gate (C), is divided into two districts, called standards; the most remarkable place here is Chaban-Suberhan-Hotun (D). It is by far the best belonging to the Mungls; for, as the present princes of it are originally Chinese, they have drawn thither several of their countrymen, who have built towns, and improved the lands. Here are likewise mines, some of excellent tin; with large forests of fine timber: by which the great ancestor of the present family got immense riches. Karchin is 42 great French leagues from north to south, but much larger from east to west: and here are the emperor of China's fine houses of pleasure, near which the late Kang-hi frequently hunted, and usually spent his summer; especially at Je-bo, about forty leagues from Pe-king^c.

Korchin.

KORCHIN (E) is divided into ten standards, including the countries of Turbeda and Chaley, or Chalayr (F). The principal residence of the Korchin Tatars is along the river Queyler (G), and their possessions extend to the Sira Muren (H); but they have neither springs for drink, nor wood for fuel; which they supply by wells, and dung of cattle. The principal point of Turbeda is Haytaban Pira (I): the Chaley Tatars dwell by the Nonni Ula (K). So that Korchin, from north to south, contains almost four degrees, extending six leagues to the north of Haytaban; but it does not exceed three degrees four minutes from east to west.

Nayman.

THE country of Nayman (L) contains but one banner, or standard, and begins from the south side of Sira Muren; its principal north point being Topin-tala^d (M).

Ohan.

OHAN is chiefly inhabited along the river Narkoni Pira, where some rivulets, as the Shakakol (N) fall into it. On this side the latitude of 41 degrees 15 minutes, are seen the ruins of a city called Orpan, or Kurban-Suberhan-Hotun (O), on the little river Nácháka, or Nuchaka,

- a which falls into the Talin Ho. Nayman and Oban, though far less, are yet much better than Korchin, being interspersed with shrubby hills, which furnish wood for fuel, and abound with game, especially quails. These three countries, with Turbeda, are sandy, and extremely cold.

TUMET is divided between two banneret princes, and inhabited chiefly beyond the river Tumet. Subarban, where occur the ruins of Modun Hotun (P). This country extends southward to the great wall of China; eastward to the palisade inclosing Lyau-tong (Q); and northward to Halba, or Hara Paychang.

2. If you go from the gate Ku-pe-kew (R), you enter upon the territories formerly part of Ker-Second course, chin and Onhiot, but now converted to a forest, where the emperor hunts, and has several fine summer-houses. Farther north are the countries of Onhiot, Kechikten, Parin, Sbarot, Uchû

- b Muchin, Arukorchin, and Abuhanar.

ONHIOT is divided into two standards of two princes, on the river Inkin (S).

Onhiot.

PARIN, divided also into two standards, has its principal habitation (T) on the Hara Muren, Parin, which falls into the Sira Muren. This territory is larger than Onhiot, but in other respects like it, the soil being but indifferent. The princes of these countries are allied to the imperial family of China, and are regulos of the first and second order^c.

KECHIKTEN, or Kesikten, is divided into two standards, and has its principal habitation (U) Kechikten, on a small river, which runs north-east into the Sira Muren.

UCHU MUCHIN, or Utsi Musin (X), has two standards along the Hulakar, or Hulgar Pira; Uchu Muchin, its prince is a prime regulo.

- c SHAROT, divided into two standards likewise, is inhabited chiefly towards the confluence of the Laban Pira (Y) and Sira Muren.

ARUKORCHIN has but one banner, which resides on the river Arukondulen (Z).

ABUHANAR has two standards, and is best inhabited about the Taal Nor (A), or lake of Abuhanar.

WITHIN this second division, going almost due north from Ku-pe-kew, one meets with some Ruins of cities, towns, and the ruins of several considerable cities, as Ilan Hotun, Poro Hotun, Kurtu Palhafsun, and Chau Nayman Sume Hotun (B), all upon the river Shangtu, or Shantu. The last of these places seems to have been the city of Shantu, called by the Chinese Kay-ping-fu, whose ruins Gerbillon saw in 1691^f. It was built by Koblay Khân, the fifth Mungl emperor (and

- d grandson of Jenghiz Khan), who removed the imperial seat thither, in order to be nearer his new conquests; and served as the summer seat of his successors in China, who in winter resided at Khân-balik, or Pe-king. It belongs to the country of Karchin; but the other missionaries, who surveyed and made the map of Tatary, take no notice of it, any more than the rest of the ancient cities mentioned by Marco Polo, and other early travellers, excepting Karakoram; which yet they were intirely at a loss about, as will be seen presently.

3. WHEN you pass out of the gate Chang-kyakew (C), you enter on a country which was Third course, conquered by the emperor Kang-hi, and is his property. These lands, and all the rest along the Chinese wall as far as Hi-fong-kew, are occupied by farmers belonging to his majesty, the princes, and several Tatar lords. Here are Mungl Tatars also of different countries, ranged under three standards, and commanded by officers appointed by the emperor, therefore not reckoned among the forty-nine Mungl banners.

FARTHER to the north of Chang-kyakew are the countries of the Mungl princes of Whachit, Sonhiot, Sabahay, and Twinchûz.

WHACHIT is divided into two standards near the river Gbikir (D), or Chirin Pira.

Whachit.

SONHIOT has two standards, and the principal habitation is near a lake (E).

ABAHAY is divided into two standards, which encamp about some lakes or meers, the southernmost whereof is called Siretu-buchin (F).

TWINCHUZ contains but one banner or standard near the Orgun Alin (G), or mountain Orgun.

*Khúkhú Hotun*ⁿ. Húhú Hotun, or Khúkhú Hotun (I), is most remarkable. Here inhabit the chiefs of two Tatar banners, called also Tumet, who are appointed by the emperor. Húhú Hotun is the capital of all the country of the proper Mungls, where the emperor's governor, and the kútúktú, or high-priest of those people, reside.

BEYOND the territory of Húhú Hotun lie the countries of the Mungl princes of Kalka-Targar, Maumingan, Urat, and Ortos.

Kalka-Targar. KALKA-TARGAR (K) is watered by the little river Aypaba Múren, and contains but one banner.

Maumingan. MAUMINGAN (L) has but one banner.

Urat. URAT (or Virat) is divided into three standards, and is mostly inhabited along the river (M) Kondolen^s, or Quendolen.

Ortus. THE Mungls called Ortos, or Ortus (N), are bounded on the south by the great wall; which in that part, and indeed throughout Shen-si, is only of earth, and fifteen foot high. On the three other sides they are hemmed in by the Whang-ho, or yellow river: which passing out of China, near the fine city of Ninghya, makes a great sweep, and enters the empire again near Pau-te-chew. These Mungls are governed by several petty princes under six standards, and pride themselves in the number and largeness of their tents, as well as multitude of their flocks. They had beyond the great wall, on the Whang-ho, a city called Toto, which seems by the ruins to have been pretty large; though at present they have no skill in building, nor take any delight that way^h.

Limits settled. ALTHOUGH the several tribes or branches of the Mungls lead a roving life, yet they have their respective limits fixed by custom, beyond which they must not pass to settle; for this is reckoned an act of hostility among them.

The country of the Kalka Mungls.

Country of the Kalkas. OF all the Mungl nations depending on China, the most numerous and famous are the Kalkas, who take their name from the river Kalka, written also Kbalkba, and Halba. They possess above 200 leagues of the country from east to west, and the banks of the finest rivers in this part of Tatary. They dwell beyond the Mungls northward, and have the Aluths, or Eluths, on the west. Their country, according to Gerbillon the jesuit, extends from mount Altay^a in the west, to the province of Solon in the east; and from the 51st degree of latitude (A) to the southern extremity of the great Kobi, or desert, which is reckoned to belong to them: for they encamp there during the winter, when they stand in less need of water; which is rarely to be met with in their territories, and generally bad.

Great Kobi, or desert. THE desert above-mentioned, called Kobi, or Gobi, by the Mungls, and Sba-mo, by the Chinese, bends about China; and is larger and more frightful towards the west (B). Gerbillon passed it in four different parts. From its eastern extremity to the mountains north of the great wall, it is about one hundred leagues, not including the country beyond the Kerlon; which, though thinly inhabited, especially the western part, abounds with water and pasturage. The Kobi is much larger from north to south, and above 100 leagues over. In some parts it is quite bare, without trees, grass, or water, excepting certain ponds and marshes made by the rains, with here and there a well of water, far from being good.

Kalkas origin. THE Kalkas are the descendants of the Mungls; who, about the year 1368, were expelled China by Hóng-vú, founder of the Ming family (which the Manchews succeeded); and, retreating northward beyond the great desert, settled chiefly along the rivers Selinga, Orkhon, Tula, and Kerlon: where, after being long accustomed to the delicacies of China, they returned to the roving and fordid life of their ancestors^b.

The Kalka Pira. THE Kalka Pira is not much frequented by the Kalkas, although they take their name from

(A) It is said, p. 265 of Du Halde's History of China, vol. ii. that they extend from east to west 22 degrees, and but 5 degrees and half from north to south.

a thence. It flows (C) from a famous mountain called Suelki, or Siulki, 84 leagues from Parin to the north-north-east, and 64 from Tsitfikar, the capital of eastern Tatary, to the west. After passing through a lake called Puïr, it changes its name to Urson, and runs due north into a larger called Kulon Nor.

b THE Kerlon, Tula, Twi, and Selinga, though less famous for their origin among these The Kerlon. people, are yet of more account for their clear and wholesome waters, abounding with trout, and other good fish; as well as for the fruitful, large, and populous plains they glide through. The Kerlon, or Kerulon, running from west to east, falls also into the (D) lake Kulon Nor; which discharges itself into the Saghalian Ula by the river Ergona, or Argun, the boundary of the Manchew empire on that side. The Kerlon, which is about sixty feet broad, and not deep, washes the richest pastures in all Tatary.

THE river Tula, or Tola (E), runs from east to west, and in most places is larger, deeper, The Tula. and more rapid, than the Kerlon, has finer meadows, and more woods: the mountains also on the north-side are covered with large fir. This river, having joined itself to the Organ, Orkhon, or Urkon, which comes from the south-west, runs towards the north; and, after being increased with several others, as the Selingba Pira, at length falls into the greatest lake in all Tatary, called Baykal, or Paykal, in that part of Siberia belonging to the Russians.

THE Twi Pira, whose waters resemble those of the Kerlon, makes its way through fertile plains; and, after a pretty long course, loses itself in the ground near a little lake, without appearing any more.

c THE river Selingba has several sources; the chief of which, called Wersb Selingba, issues The Selinga. from a lake, named by the Mungls Kosogol (F). Its course is nearly in a line from south to north through very fertile plains; and, after receiving many other rivers, falls into the lake Baykal. Its waters are good, but do not afford plenty of fish. Both its banks, from its springs till within one day of Selingbinskoy (a city of the Russians built on its south side), are in the hands of the Mungls; but the neighbouring country, from that city to the lake, belongs to the Russians.

THE Orkhon above-mentioned, formerly called Kalassui, runs (G) north-north-west into The Orkhon. the Selingba; and on its banks the Khân of the Kalka Mungls, and their Khutûktû, (or high-priest) usually make their abode.

d THE river Altay, at present called Siba, has its spring towards the frontiers of the Kalmûks, Altay, or Siba. or Elutbs, in the mountains called Ufskun-lug-tugra, to the south of the springs of the river Jeni-sea; and, running from thence east-north-east, loses itself to the north of the Kobi, or desert, and south-south-east of the springs of the Orkhon. A petty Khân of the Mungls usually resides about the Siba.

THE Tsan, or Jan Mûren, has its source in the mountains which cross the Kobi; and, running south-south-east, falls into the Whang-ho, on the frontiers of Tibet. Two petty Khâns Jan Mûren. dwell on its banks.

e THE river Argun (or Ergona) rises in the country of the Mungls (H), from a lake called The Argun. Argun Dalay, or Kulon Nor. Its course is nearly east-north-east; and, having run about 100 leagues, falls into the great river Amur^d, as the Russians call the Saghalian Ula.

THE princes of the Kalka Mungls usually inhabit the banks of the rivers already described, with those of Hara, or Kara Pira, Iben Pira (I), which falls into the Orkhon, Karaujir, Ira Pira, Patarik Pira, and the Tegurik Pira (K), towards the source of the Irtish, and city of Hami, or Khamil, in Little Bukharia^c.

THERE were formerly several cities in this part of Tatary possessed by the Kalkas. The Ruins of cities missionaries who surveyed Chinese Tatary, by order of the emperor Kang-bi, met with the ruins of a large square city, two leagues in circuit, named Para Hotun (L), that is the Tiger's City, from the cry of that animal, which was thought a good omen. Not far from thence is a place called Kara Uffon, with a small lake and fine spring, in a fertile plain abounding with deer, mules, &c. all wild. There may be other monuments in these quarters of the early times of a Mungls under Jenghiz Khân, and his four immediate successors: but there do not appear to be any footsteps of Karakoram, the capital of the whole empire during that time; at least those missionaries were wholly at a loss about it, supposing it to be Kara Uffon above-mentioned, although the situation no-ways agrees with that which authors have given of Karakoram.

city,

HOWEVER, Gaubil, a jesuit who settled at Pe-king some time after his brethren returned from Tatary, by consulting the Chinese historians and astronomers, found out the situation of that city, which they call Ho-lin (M). It was in being before the time of Jenghiz Khân, having been the residence of the Khân of the Kara-its, the famous Van Khân, or Ung Khân: but when Jenghiz Khân took it from that prince, it was a very inconsiderable place. The conqueror much improved it, and his son Oktay Khân rebuilt and made it a famous city^f. With this account the Chinese history agrees^g. So that when Abû'lfaraj, who says it is same with Ordubâlik, affirms that it was built by Oktay^h, it is to be understood of the improvements of that prince, who made of it a new city, and built a magnificent palace there, in the year 1225ⁱ. Yet Rubruquis, the minorite friar, who was at Karakoram in 1253, says it had then only a mud wall; and that the place itself, and the Khân's palace, compared with the European, were but poor buildings: however, he allows it to have been very populous, and to contain a great many palaces, temples, &c.^k now ruined,

KARAKORAM stood to the north of the great Kobi, or sandy desert, and near the lake Kuraban Ulen (N), marked by the Jesuits in their map of Tatary, although they looked for it at Para Hotun, 420 miles distant to the north-east. It was the imperial seat of the Khâns, till Kublay removed it to Sbang-tu already mentioned; which continued to be the place of their summer residence as long as the Mungls were in possession of China: but after their expulsion, about the year 1368, it is probable Karakoram became again the seat of the Khâns; although, according to De la Croix, they resided ever since the time of Oktay (Jenghiz Khân's immediate successor) at Ulug Yurt (O), a city not far distant^l, if it be not the same place. Here Alebi Timûr, the thirteenth from Kublay, ascended the throne in 1405; and we find it subsisting in the time of Aday, the fifteenth successor: but after that we are told no more is heard of Ulug Yurt in the oriental authors^m. Yet neither the time nor occasion of the destruction of that city, or of Karakoram, is mentioned by any historian yet known to us.

Store of game.

TATARY, according to Regis, the jesuit, abounds with all sorts of game, even of the kinds common in Europe; as hares, pheasants, deer, and the like: the yellow goats are seldom seen in the plains, except in large herds. They are of the shape and size of common goats, only their hair is yellow, and not so smooth: they are likewise extremely fleet, which makes it difficult to catch them. The wild mules go in small herds, but are not like the tame ones, nor can be brought to carry burthens. Their flesh is of an agreeable taste; and, in the opinion of the Tatars, as nourishing and wholesome as the wild boar's (P). This last animal frequents the woods and plains beyond the river Tula, and is traced by the earth it turns up to come at the roots on which it feeds.

Horses and dromedaries.

THE wild horse, and dromedary, which is a native of this region, are like the tame. These are found chiefly in the western parts of Tatary, although sometimes they are met with in the territories of the Kalkas, bordering on Khamil in Little Bukharia. The wild horses go in large droves; and when they meet with tame ones, surround and force them away: they are so very fleet, that the swiftest hunters can seldom reach them with their arrows.

The haute-
ban.

THE hauteban is an animal which resembles an elk: the missionaries saw some, which, when killed, were bigger than the largest ox. They are found only in particular districts about mount Suelki, in boggy grounds, where they delight to resort; and are very easily killed, their great weight preventing their flight.

The chelison.

THE chulon, or chelison, is about the size of a wolf, and seemed to Regis a sort of lynx. It has long, soft, and thick hair, of a greyish colour; and their furs are valued at the courts both of China and Russia; which last abounds with them.

(N) That city, by the latitude, as well as this lake, stood rather in the midst of the Kobi, on the river Oughin (which runs south-east into the said lake), and about 50 miles north-east of a chain of mountains which cross the Kobi from north-west to south-east.

(O) Ulg Yurt signifies the great city.

(P) Gerbillon, in his second journey into Tatary, saw a young wild mule, of a kind which propagates. This was a female, had large ears, a long head, slender body, and long legs; its hair was ash-colour, and its hoofs and feet uncloven, like those of other mules. Collect. voyag. & trav. quart. vol. iv. p. 686.

a TATARY is infested with tigers and leopards. The tigers found eastwards are surprizingly large and nimble. Their skins are commonly of a fallow red, striped with black lists; some are white, with black and grey lists. The skins of the leopards are whitish, spotted with red and black. Although they have the head and eyes of tigers, they are not so large, and have a different cry.

THE deer, which multiply exceedingly in the deserts and forests, differ in colour, bigness, Deer hunting. and shape of their horns, according to the different quarters of this vast region; and some are like the deer of Europe. One way of hunting them, termed the stag-call, is thus: the hunters, carrying some stags-heads, counterfeit the cry of the hind; which brings the largest stags towards the place from whence they hear the cry: they then stop, and look about; till, b perceiving the stags heads, they tear up the ground with their horns, and immediately run forward, but are shot by some who lie in ambush. The emperor Kang-hi took great delight in this diversion. The intrepidity of Tatarian horses in encountering tigers is surprizing; and Horses. yet it is owing wholly to use: for they are as fearful of them at first as other horses. The Mungls are very expert in taming and breaking, as well as catching them running, with the slip-knot of a cord. They understand their distempers, but use such remedies as would no more agree with the horses of Europe, than their foods. They are of a middle size, yet some are large as well as small; but the Tatars wisely prefer strength and hardiness to either largeness or beauty.

c THE Kalkas are not rich in fable skins, but have plenty of squirrels, foxes, and a creature The tael-pe. as small as an ermine, called tael-pe; of whose skins at Pe-king they make mantles to keep out cold. These animals are a kind of land rats, and dig in the earth a range of as many little holes as there are males in the company; one of whom always keep watch above, but flies underground at any body's approach. When the hunters discover their nest, they surround it; and, opening the earth in two or three places, throw in flaming straw to frighten them out. Thus they take great numbers, which makes their skins cheap.

THE rivers in the country of the Mungls do not afford any great variety or plenty of fish, The fish. like those of eastern Tatary. The sturgeon, which they sometimes find in the Tula, comes from the lake Baykal; and the Urson, falling into the Saghalian Ula, or Amur, receives from thence the fish which are found in the eastern rivers. In the same river you meet with an d amphibious animal called Tarbegba, resembling an otter; but the flesh is tender, and almost as delicious as that of the roe-buckⁿ.

As to uncommon birds, there are bred vast quantities of an extraordinary beauty in the plains Shonkar bird. of Great Tatary. That mentioned by Abûlghazi Khân^o seems to be a kind of heron, which is found in the country of the Mungls towards the frontiers of China. It is all over white, except the beak, wings, and tail (Q); which are of a very fine red. The flesh is very delicious, and tastes somewhat like that of a wood-hen. However, as the bird which that author speaks of is very rare, Bentink thinks it may be the stork, which is very scarce all over Russia, Siberia, and Great Tatary: yet some are found in the Mungls country near China, which are for the general all over white^p. As Abûlghazi Khân says, this bird is called shungar in the c Turkish language (and kratzshet by the Russians), it is doubtless the same with the shonkar, which was presented to Jenghîz Khân by the ambassadors of Kipchâk. On this occasion we are told, that the shonkar is a bird of prey, presented to kings, adorned with precious stones, as a mark of homage; and that the Russians, as well as Krim Tatars, are obliged by their last treaties with the Othmân Turks, to send one every year to Constantinople, adorned with a certain number of diamonds^q.

The countries belonging to the Eluths, or Eluth Mungls.

a THE countries belonging to the Aluths, or Eluths, nicknamed Kalmûks, are to be considered, as that nation is at present divided into three branches; viz. the Dsongari, or Jongari, the Koshoti, and the Torgaûti.

1. THE Eluths Jongari, who are the most considerable branch of the three, possess the larger Eluth Jonga- half of what Europeans call the western Tatary: extending from the Caspian sea and river Jaïk, ri's country. in 72 degrees of longitude, from Ferro, to mount Altay, in 110 degrees; and from the 40th MOD. HIST. VOL. II. S f f to to the 52d degree of latitude. Whence it may be computed about 1930 miles in length, a from west to east; and in length, at most, from south to north, 650 miles. It is bounded on the north by Russia and Siberia, from which it is separated by a chain of mountains; on the east by mount Altay; on the south by the countries of Karazm and the two Bukhârias (A); from which also it is separated partly by another chain of mountains, and some rivers, particularly the Sîr; and on the west by the river Jaïk and the Caspian sea; or rather by Turkeştân, which lies between.

Mountains.
busluk.

THERE are, in the country of the Eluths or Kalmûks, three considerable chains of mountains; viz. the Tubra Tubusluk, the Uskunluk Tugra, and the Altay. The first, which makes its northern frontier, and is called also Ulugtâg, or the great mountain, begins at the eastern bank of the Irtish, to the north of the lake Saysan, through which that river passes, and runs b due east, as far as the Selinga, which it coasts northward, to the lake Baykal: then turning east, it proceeds to the Amur, or Saghalian Ula, about Nerchinskoy; and follows the course of that river, on the north side, to the eastern ocean.

Tugra.

THE second branch, called Uskunluk Tugra, bears also the name of Kichik-tag, or the little mountain: it commences in the confines of Turkeştân and Great Bukhâria, to the south of the river Sîr; and running nearly east, makes the bounds between Great Bukhâria and the country of the Eluths. It continues its course on the same line, till, arriving to the south of the springs of the Jenisea, it strikes off to the south-east; and falls in with the frontiers of China, as far as the province of Lyau-tong. There making an elbow to the north-east, it separates that province, and Korea, from the country of the Mungls; and ends at last on the shore of the sea c of Japan, about the 42d degree of latitude.

Mount Altay.

THE mountain Altay (by some called Kaltay, and in Abû'lghazi Khân's history Kut) is a branch of the Uskunluk Tugra, taking its rise to the west of the spring of the Jenisea. It runs almost in a strait line from south to north; constantly marching along the western bank of that great river, at a distance of one or two days journey, till it joins the Tugra Tubusluk, in about 50 degrees of latitude.

Rivers.

The Tekis and Ili.

FOR all this region of the Eluths is bounded by mountains, yet it is watered by very few rivers which descend from them. The most considerable known to us are the Tekis, and Ili (B), the Chui, and Talas. According to the Jesuits map, the Tekis rises in the mountain bounding Little Bukhâria on the north (C); and having run about 70 miles north-east, falls, by d several mouths, into the Ili, which has its source in the same hills, and runs north-west about 150 miles: then, shaping its course north 150 miles farther, falls into the lake Palkati (D), in about 48 degrees of latitude. On this river the Khân of the Eluths has his chief residence or camp, which is called Harkas, or, as others spell it, Urga.

Chui and Talas.

THE Chui and Talas, according to the same map, descend from the above-mentioned mountain; and running north-west about 180 leagues each, fall into different lakes, the Chui into Kalkol, and the Talas into Sikirlik Nor.*

BESIDES the rivers already described, we meet with none of any great note, except the Irtish; nor does more than a part of it run through this country.

The Irtish.

THIS river, which is the most considerable in the north of Asia, hath its rise (E) from two e lakes, thirty miles asunder; in about 45 degrees 15 minutes of latitude, and 113 of longitude, on the west side of mount Altay, and to the north of the province of Kbamil, or Hami, in Little Bukhâria, inclining to the east. The rivers formed by them run westward. The northern stream is called Khar Irtish; the southern Khor Irtish: and, about 30 miles distance from their sources uniting, form the river called Irtish, Irtis, or Erchis, as the Eluths pronounce it. This river, having run west about 50 leagues, makes the lake Saysan (†), that is, of the nobility, 40 miles long, and 20 broad. Passing out of the lake it turns northward, as far as Urkamen, the first Russian fort and settlement on this river, in the borders of the Eluths country on that side. The rest of the Irtish belongs to Siberia; where, after passing by the capital of Tobolskoy, it joins the Obi, a little above Samara.

The Obi.

STRAHLENBERG places the sources of the Obi, or Ubi (F), also in the country of the Eluths. f It is formed, like the Irtish, by the confluence of two rivers, the Khatun and Ba, from which last it derives its name. The Ba, or Bi, takes its beginning in a lake, to which that author gives the names Altun Nor, Altun Kurke, Altin, and Telezkoy; perhaps the same called in the

* Hist. Turks, &c. p. 522, 524, 526.

(A) Little Bukhâria, though out of the bounds of Tatary, is yet under the dominion of the Khân of the Eluths.

a Jesuits map Kirkir. But both maps seem to have been made, in this part, from very uncertain reports.

THE vast region of Tatary, being situated under the finest climate in the world, is everywhere of an extraordinary goodness and fertility. But though almost all the great rivers of Asia have their springs in the mountains of this country, yet the land being perhaps the highest anywhere on earth, it is, in several parts, destitute of water; so that it is inhabitable only near the rivers and lakes. Verbiest, the Jesuit, in the country of the Mungls, about 80 leagues to the north of the great wall, towards the spring of the river Karga, found the ground to be 3000 geometrical paces, or three miles, higher than the sea-coast nearest Peking. Hence it is that Great Tatory appears so much colder than other countries in the same latitude. Our author was even assured, by persons of credit, who had travelled there, that in Midsummer the north-east wind is so piercing, that one must cover himself well in the night; and often in August one night produces ice the thickness of a crown-piece, and sometimes of two. Nay, dig where you will, in summer, in the country of the Mungls, four or five feet deep, and you find clods of earth quite congealed, and even intire heaps of ice; which Verbiest ascribes to the salt-petre with which the soil is impregnated. Soil and produce.

THE same extraordinary elevation of the earth is also the reason why there are so many desarts in Grand Tatory: but these desarts are not altogether so frightful as Europeans fancy them. For setting aside the vast Kobi, or Gobi, before-mentioned, and a few other small sandy desarts, all the rest afford excellent pasture; producing grass in abundance, as high as one's middle, which would grow to the height of a man, if it was not for want of water: but, through that defect, most of it decays presently at the root; and as withered grass quite choaks up the young, the inhabitants, in spring, set fire to the old herbage, which sometimes spreads above 100 leagues round. In less than fifteen days after, the new grass shoots up every-where to the height of a span; which proves the great fertility of the soil: and so much of this vast country, as is supplied with water, is sufficient for the support of four times the number of its present inhabitants, if it was but well cultivated. But then none, besides the Mohammedan Tatars, till their lands (G); while the Eluths, and most part of the Mungls, have not the use of agriculture, subsisting intirely upon their cattle (H): this is the reason why they can have no fixed habitations, being obliged to change their quarters, according as the seasons change. Yet, for all the soil is so luxuriant, Great Tatory does not produce a single wood of tall trees, of any kind whatever, excepting in some few places towards the frontiers. All the wood, that is found in the heart of the country, consists of shrubs, which never exceed the height of a pike; and these are very rare ^b. Great fertility.

THE Khân of the Eluths dwells continually under tents, although he possesses Little Bukharia, with its dependencies, wherein there are a good many towns; only when his affairs call him thither, he resides at Yarkien, or Yarkân, the capital of that country. He has continued about the river Ila and Tekîs for some years past; that he might be near at hand to watch the motions of his cousin Ayuki Khân, as well as the Mohammedan Tatars and Mungls, between whom the Eluths are situated. His camp is a great curiosity: it is distributed into several quarters, squares, and streets, just like a town; is a good league in compass; and able, at a minute's warning, to send into the field 15,000 horse. The quarter where the Khân resides, is in the middle of the camp. His tent is made of Kitayka, a strong sort of callico; which, being raised very high, and of all sorts of lively colours, exceedingly delights the eye at a distance. In winter the tent is covered with felt, which makes it impenetrable by the weather. His wives are lodged in little wooden houses, which may be taken down in an instant, and set on waggons, when they are going to decamp ^c. The Khân's residence.

ALTHOUGH, according to the account of the missionaries who surveyed Chinese Tatory, there are no plants to be met with in that region; yet we are assured, by a certain curious author, that, in the parts about the rivers Orkhon and Selinghâ, towards Selinghinskoy, rhubarb grows in great abundance; and that all which Russia furnishes foreign countries with, comes from about this city; the district of which yields such plenty, that the treasury of Siberia sells 25,000 lb. weight of it at a time ^d. Plenty of rhubarb.

THE animals in this division of western Tatary are much the same with those to be found in the two former parts; unless we may except one, called, by Bentink, the glutton, which abounds in the country of the Eluths. It is a carnivorous beast, not quite so tall as a wolf, and The glutton animal.

(G) The missionaries say, that the lands of Tatary, from the country of the Manchews, or eastern Tatary, westward, as far as the Caspian sea, are, for the generality, unfit for tillage; and those of Korthin, Oban, and Nayman, in the country of the Mungls, worst of all. Du Halde China, vol. ii. p. 249.

(H) There are no plants to be found in their country. When the missionaries asked them why they would not at least cultivate some little herb-garden; they replied, herbs are for the beasts of the field, and the beasts for men. Du Halde China, vol. ii. p. 254.

peculiar to the mountains of northern Asia: the hair, which is strong and long, is of a very fine dark brown all over its back. This beast is exceeding mischievous: for it climbs the trees, and watching the game, which passes underneath, leaps down on its back, where it fastens with its paws, and makes a great hole: while the poor creature, quite spent with anguish and struggling to get rid of his enemy, at length falls on the ground, and becomes his prey. It requires three stout dogs to attack this beast, small as it is; and very often they come off strangely mauled. The Russians make great account of its skin, which they use for mens muffs, and borders of bonnets*. We leave our readers to judge whether this be the cbulon found in the country of the Mungls; as well as the same with the arkbora, mentioned by Abul'ghazi Khân; since the glutton leaves such narrow paths in the hills and forests as are made by that animal^f.

Eluths
Koshoti.

2. THE Eluths Koshoti possess all the kingdom of Tangut, and are subject to the Dalay Lama, or great pontiff of Tibet, who governs them by two Khâns; of whom one has the government of Tibet, the other of Koko Nor^g. These latter are called, by the Manchews and Chinese, Tatars of Koko Nor.

Koko Nor
country.

THE country of Koko Nor, or Kokonol, is so called by these Eluths, from a lake of the same name, termed by the Chinese Si-bay, that is, the western sea. It is one of the largest in all Tatary, being above twenty great French leagues in length, and more than ten in breadth; situated between the 36th and 37th degrees of latitude, and between the 16th and 17th of longitude, west of Peking^h.

Extent and site.

THIS country lies between Tibet on the west, and China on the east, bordering on the provinces of Shen-si and Sechwen. It is pretty large, extending from north to south above seven degrees. It is separated from China by mountains, so high and steep, that they serve almost every-where instead of the great wall. Those to the south, which separate it from the kingdoms of Pegu and Ava, are frightful and inaccessible, inhabited by a savage people. They also make so strong a barrier to China, by their great length and breadth, that the entrances on that side are left unfortifiedⁱ.

Eluths Tor-
gaüti.

THE Eluths Torgaüti are the least considerable of the three branches. They dwelt heretofore towards Turkestan, and were subject to Kontaisb: but about the beginning of the present century, Ayûka, or Ayûki, one of his cousins, flying from his court, under pretence that he was in fear of his life, passed the river Jaik, with the tribe of the Torgaüti, and put himself under the protection of Russia. In winter Ayûka Khân usually encamped with his Ordas in the sandy ground about Astrakhan, to the east of the river Volga, between it and the Jaik; and in summer he often went to reside on the banks on this river, about Saratof and Zaritzza (I). Altho^d the Koshoti and Torgaüti Eluths have their own Khâns, yet Kontaisb preserves a kind of sovereignty over, and draws considerable aid from them, when he is at war with his neighbours the Mungls, Chinese, or Mohammedan Tatars^k.

CHAPTER IV.

Of the Mungls, or Moguls, and their several branches.

SECT. I.

Their name, persons, manners, customs, way of living, habitations, language.

Name
Mungls.

THE Moguls, or rather Mungls, derive their name from Mungl Khân, one of their ancient emperors; and one branch of them still retain it, called, by our authors, Mungals, or Mongals, of which the word Moguls, commonly used by the Asiatics, as well as Europeans, is a corruption. These people are frequently confounded with the Tatars, which may be owing to the following causes: First, the people of the north of Asia having been known, for many ages, by the name of Tatars, to the inhabitants of the southern countries, particularly the Chinese a Chinese and Persians; these latter, seeing the Mungls come from the same quarters, and no way different as to features, language, and manners, from the Tatars, considered both as the same people, under different names (A). Secondly, there were, in the army of Jenghiz Khân, ^{and Tatars,} when he invaded those countries, tribes of Tatars as well as Mungls; which made those nations, ^{whence:} who were acquainted with the Tatars before, give both names, indifferently, to the followers of that conqueror. Lastly, the Tatars, having been very serviceable to Jenghiz Khân in the battle against Vang Khân, or Ung Khân, which put him in possession of the sovereignty, he, to reward them, joined their name ^a with that of the Mungls, in the title which he thereupon assumed, styling himself Grand Khân of the Mungls and Tatars.

b WHATEVER was the cause of introducing this custom, it is certain that it obtained, and still ^{Used indifferently.} continues in force. This is what gives a sanction to the liberty taken by most authors, who, by Mungls and Tatars, mean the same people (†). This we mention, to prevent our readers from falling into any mistake on this head, in the course of their history. It must be confessed, it would be much better to lay aside a practice which tends to breed great confusion, and at least to confine the name of Tatars to those commonly called Mohammedan Tatars, to whom another custom has in effect appropriated it. After all, those names should be applied only for distinction sake, neither of them being strictly due to the people who enjoy it. For as the name of Tatars is given to many tribes who are not Tatars; so that of Moguls extends to many who are not Moguls: the name of the conquering, or most powerful tribes, having passed to the conquered, or less powerful tribes.

c THE Moguls or Mungls are, at present, divided into three great branches; the Mungls, ^{Three Mogul branches.} properly so called, the Kalkbas, and the Aluths, or Eluths. The first branch retains the ancient name of the nation, which has been already accounted for. The Kalkas, which may also be written Khalkba, and Hálba, as the first letter is a deep guttural, derive their name from the river Kalka, already described, which runs in their country. Whence the Eluths (B), Aluths, or Aluts, derive their name, it is not so easy to determine. These are the people commonly known by the name of Kalmák, or Kalmúk, whose etymology is also unknown to us. All which we are certain of is, that it is a nick-name given to them by the Mohammedan Tatars, in hatred of their idolatrous religion (C); or for some other cause. The Russians took it from those Tatars, and from the Russians it came in use among Europeans; while the name of Eluth d was unknown to them. They take it as an affront to be called Kalmúks, and say, they have a better title to the name of Mungls than their neighbours, who at present enjoy it; as these latter are sprung from that part of the Mungls and Tatars who were expelled China, by Hong-vú, the founder of the Ming family, in 1368 ^b.

THIS shews, that although the two last branches have, for distinction sake, or some other Mungls in reason, assumed different names from the first, yet they still retain the name of Mungls, which ^{general.} they highly honour; as the Jews did that of Israelites, to denote their origin and descent. Whether the numerous tribes, into which each of the three branches is divided, be derived from the same stock, is a question which we have discussed elsewhere ^c. But let that be as it may, as they have all the same customs, language, religion, and form of government, with e little or no variation, what may be said of one branch, will serve for the other two. For this reason we shall connect together, under the general name of Mungls, what materials the best travellers, and other authors, afford us, concerning the aforesaid three branches; only distinguishing such things as may be peculiar to each of them.

f THE Mungls, in general, are of a middle size, but exceeding robust, and well-set: they ^{Their shape:} have big and broad heads, flat faces, and complexions of a dark olive colour, pretty near that of American copper; very black and sparkling eyes, but too far asunder, and opening but a little, although they are very long; the bridge of their nose is quite flat, and almost level with the face, so that there is nothing of a nose to be seen but the end, which is very flat also, with two great holes, which form the nostrils (D): their ears are very large, though without the rims; their beards very thin; hair black, and strong, like horse-hair; but they shave all off,

(A) The Chinese say Kalka Tatars and Eluth Tatars, as well as Kolka Mungls and Eluth Mungls.

(†) And after all, they are, in effect, the same people: as being the descendants of the Huns, or Turks. See before, p. 134.

(B) We are told by Strahlenberg, that they call themselves Derbon Oirét, or Orieth, that is, the four Oirétion tribes: and, by the English translator of him, that they are called Eluth, and corruptly luth. See Strahl. desc. of Tartary, introd. p. 83 & 89. The Oiréts seem to be the Firats of Alâ'ud-dîn Khân.

(C) Math. a Nicoso de Sarmatia Asiana, cap. 3. and Herbrestein in rerum Muscov. comment. in the article de Tartaris, towards the end, say, that they are called Kalmúks, because they are the only Tartar nations who let their hair grow. But this seems very trifling; since the hair they wear is no more than a lock on the crown of their heads.

(D) Although this description doubtless belongs equally to the proper Mungls and Kalkas, as well as the Eluths, yet our author, speaking of the Moguls, with regard to their eyes and noses, says only, that their noses are flat, but their eyes black and full. Bentink op. d'Alph. hist. Turks, &c. p. 502.

excepting a lock on the crown of their heads, which falls down their backs, and is let grow to its natural length. To make amends for all this homeliness, they have very pretty mouths, with small teeth, as white as ivory, and are perfectly well limbed. Their women have much the same features, only not so large; but then they are commonly of a very clever size, and well-shaped^d.

their manners, GERBILLON, the jesuit, says they are quite rude and unpolished in their manners; yet honest and good-natured; the Elutbs, in particular, do ill to nobody, if not first provoked: and although extremely brave, yet they do not live by robbery, like their neighbours the Mohammedan Tartars, with whom they are continually at war. The proper Mungls and Kalkas are nasty and slovenly in their tents and clothes, living amidst the dung of their beasts; which serves them for fuel, for they have no wood (E). They excel in horsemanship and hunting; and are dextrous archers, either on foot, or on horseback. In general they lead a wretched life; and being averse to labour, they prefer grazing to architecture^e.

their humors, REGIS, another of the missionaries, observes, that the utmost ambition of the Mungls is to preserve the rank of their families. They value things only for their use; having no regard to their rarity or beauty: are naturally of an easy cheerful temper, always disposed to laugh, and never disturbed with melancholy. Indeed, they find little occasion for care; having generally neither neighbours to manage, enemies to fear, nor lords to please. Perplexed with no difficult affairs, nor business of constraint, they divert themselves wholly with hunting, fishing, and other bodily exercises. However, these people are capable not only of the sciences, but the greatest undertakings; witness their subduing China, in 1264; which they governed, even in the opinion of the Chinese, with great judgment and address^f.

and genius: As to their dress, according to Bentink, they wear very large shirts, and callico drawers: their habits are commonly made of callico, called kitayka, or some other slight stuff, which they line with sheep-skin: and sometimes they wear entire garments of sheep-skin (F). They fasten their garments, which reach to the ancles, with leather-straps about the waist. Their boots are exceeding large, and usually made of Russia leather; their bonnets small and round, with a fur of four fingers breadth. The women's dress is nearly the same, excepting that their garments are longer, their boots generally red, and their bonnets flat, with some little ornaments^g. Regis says, they know how to dress and whiten those skins, as well as the skins of stags, deer, wild-goats, &c. which serve the rich for under-garments in the spring: yet, for all their care, you smell them as soon as they come near you; whence the Chinese have given them the name of Tsau-ta-tse (G), that is, stinking Tartars^h.

their dress, THE Elutbs wear much the same kind of clothes with the proper Mungls and Kalkas. In the southern provinces they use no shirts in summer, contenting themselves with a kind of sheep-skin doublet, without sleeves; which they put on next their skin, with the woolly side out, tucking their shirt within their breeches; so that all the arm is left bare up to the shoulder. In winter they wear a sheep-skin over their doublet, which reaches to the calf of the leg, and turn the woollen side inward. These upper skins have sleeves so long, that they are obliged to turn them up, when going about any work. Their bonnet is red, and commonly set off with a tuft of silk or hair, of a bright red. Their women go habited much after the same manner; their callico shift making all their clothing in summer, and a long sheep-skin gown, with a bonnet, the same with their husbands, sufficing them in winterⁱ.

winter and summer. RED is the colour in greatest esteem with the Tartars; and how ill clothed soever their princes may be, in other respects, they never fail to have a scarlet robe for state occasions. Their chiefs would rather be without a shirt, than a scarlet coat; and the women of quality do not think themselves well dressed, if the scarlet gown be wanting. The very meanest people affect to wear red clothes, altho' the cloth be ever so ordinary. This humour has spread even among the inhabitants of Siberia. In short, all over the north of Asia, a man may do more with a piece of red cloth, than four times its value in silver^k.

Colour red esteemed. THE arms of the Mungls consist in the bow and arrows, the pike and sabre, which they wear after the Chinese manner. And they always go to war on horseback.

Mungl arms. THESE people live entirely on their cattle; which consist of horses, dromedaries, oxen, cows, and sheep. Their horses are very good and mettlesome; their oxen larger than those of the Ukrain, and the tallest in the world. Their dromedaries are large and strong. Their sheep are

(E) Hence their tents have a rankish smell, hardly tolerable, says Regis. Du Halde, ubi supr. p. 254.

(F) According to Regis, the usual cloathing of the Mungls and Kalkas is sheep and lamb skins, the wool next the body.

- a very large also, but have very short tails; which are buried in a case of fat, weighing several pounds, and hanging perpendiculatly; the wool of them is very long and coarse; they have a bunch or rising on the nose, like the camels, and hanging ears, like hounds¹. This is to be understood properly of the Elutbs; for although the Mungls and Kalkas have the same sort of cattle with them, yet they are far inferior, both for goodness and appearance, except the sheep; whose tails are about two spans long, and near as much in compass, weighing commonly betwen ten and eleven pounds: it is almost one entire piece of very rank fat. They, above Their diet. eat nothing but horse-flesh and mutton; not esteeming that of bullocks or cows so good. They are also fonder of mare's than cow's milk, being much better and richer. Indeed, the cows, after b their calves are taken from them, will suffer none to draw their teats: they likewise quickly lose their milk; so that necessity has introduced the use of mare's milk².

GERBILLON says, that, in summer, the Mungls feed on milk meats; using indifferently that of cows, mares, ewes, goats, and camels. Their drink is water, boiled with the worst sort of Chinese tea, in which they put cream, butter, or milk. They make a spirituous liquor Drink spirituous liquors. from four milk, which is distilled after fermentation. The rich lay mutton to ferment with their four milk. This liquor is strong and nourishing, and they delight to get drunk with it. They also smoke a great deal of tobacco³: Bentink informs us, that the Kalmîks have a way of making the milk sour in two nights time; after which, pouring it into an earthen pot, they stop it very close, and putting a funnel to it, set it on the fire. This spirit is as good and clear c as that which in Europe is distilled from grain: but to make it so, it must be set twice over the fire. They call it arak, in imitation of the Indians their neighbours, who give all their strong liquors that name⁴.

RUBRUQUIS tells us, that, in the time of Mangu Khân, the Mungls, besides wines which Kosmos, or Kimis. came from foreign countries, made excellent drink of rice, millet, and honey; being well-flavoured, and high-coloured, like wine: but that their chief liquors were the kosmos (H) and karakosmos; which, according to that author, are made in the following manner. For the kosmos, they fill a great skin-bag with mare's-milk, and beat upon it with a club, which has a knob at the end, as big as a man's head, but hollow. As soon as they beat, the milk begins to boil (or ferment) like new wine, and turn sour: they continue this labour till the d butter comes: then tasting the whey, if it be pretty sharp, it is fit to drink; for it pricks the tongue like rape-wine, and leaves a flavour like that of almond-milk. It intoxicates weak heads; is very pleasant, and diuretic.

KARAKOSMOS, or black kosmos, is the drink of great lords, and made thus: they beat the milk, till the grosser part subsiding, like white-wine lees, the purer remains at top, like new whey. The settlings are given to servants, who sleep very sound after it. This, says our author, is a very pleasant and wholesome liquor⁵.

THE inhabitants of *Great Tatar*y, in general, are fond of strong liquors; for when they get any, they never let it rest, while they are able to stand. When they have a mind to make merry, each brings what liquor he can procure; and then they set themselves to drink night e and day, never stirring till every drop is out. They are no less fond of smoking; which customs prevail most, in proportion as they live more notherly⁶.

THESE people, having no manufactures, exchange their cattle with the Russians, Bakbârs, and Their traffick. other neighbours, for what they want: nor is it possible commerce could flourish there as it did in the time of Jenghîz Khân, so long as the vast regions they inhabit remain divided among several princes; some of whom will always oppose the designs of others. Besides; the rapines of the Mohammedan Tatars, who rob the karawans, keep off the merchants of the west. However, on the side of Siberia, China, and the Indies; they may arrive in full safety. Those from China resort in great numbers to the Mungls, bringing them rice, bohea-tea, which they call karachay, tobacco, cotton cloth, and other ordinary stuffs; besides several sorts of household f utensils, and other necessaries⁷.

As the heathen Tatars lead a very harmless life, they are not so earnest to procure slaves for their service as the Mohammedan Tatars. Besides, having no need of more than their own families to guard their cattle, which are all their riches, they do not care to burden themselves with useless mouths. Hence it is, that none, except the Khâns and the Tayk, are to have slaves. When they take any from their enemies, all, except those whom they keep, are distributed among their subjects, in order to augment their number; which, at the same time, increases their revenue. On the contrary, the Mohammedan Tatars often make war with their neighbours, on no other score but to get slaves; selling those they do not keep. Which humour prevails so much with the Chirkassian, Daghestán, and Nogay Tartars, that, when they can't a meet with grown-up people, they steal children to sell; and, if they can't get other people's, do not scruple to sell their own: especially their daughters, if beautiful; as they do their wives, on the slightest disgust. In short, the trade of slaves being all their wealth, they spare neither friends nor foes, when they meet with a fair opportunity of carrying them off^t.

Polygamy.

THE Eluths take as many wives as they will (I), besides concubines, whom they chuse out of their slaves: and whereas the Mohammedan Tartars must not contract within certain degrees, the Pagan may marry any of their kindred, except their natural mothers. In this our author supposes they are restrained, rather by the age of their female parents, than by any law; because it is not unusual, among the Eluths and Mungls, for the father to take his daughter to wife: and they give over lying with their wives when they draw near forty; considering them thence- b forth as no other than servants, to whom they give victuals, for taking care of the house, and tending the young wives who succeed in their places.

Inheritance.

THE children born of concubines are equally legitimate, and capable of inheriting: only if the father has been Khân, or chief of some tribe, the issue of the wives succeed before those born of the concubines. The offspring of common prostitutes are looked on with a sort of contempt by every body; and very rarely succeed their fathers, especially if people of distinction: because there is no knowing if the person such a creature lays the child to, be the real father. Polygamy is not so inconvenient to the inhabitants of Tatary, as it is to the rest of the Asiatics; their wives being of great use, and little expence, to them. For the old ones manage the housewifery, take care of the cattle, and, in short, provide entirely for the subsistence of the family; so that the husband has nothing to do but sleep, and follow his diversions. c

Great filial respect.

NOTHING equals the respect paid by children, of all ages and conditions, to their fathers, who are considered as kings of their families: but they make little account of their mothers, unless under some particular obligations to them. They must lament a father for many days, and deny themselves of all sorts of pleasure during the whole time. The sons must even abstain from the company of their wives for several months. Nothing must be spared to render his funeral honourable; and at least once a year they must pay their devotions at his tomb, calling to mind the infinite obligations which they owe to him: but the Mohammedan Tartars are not so exact as to their duties paid the dead^u.

Burials and graves.

THE Mungls burn their dead, and interr their ashes on some eminence; where, raising a d heap of stones, they place thereon little banners*. The greater part of the Pagan Tartars bury along with the deceased his best horse and moveables, such as wooden porringers, for his use in the other world. In many parts, towards the borders of Siberia, there are to be seen little hills, under which are found skeletons of men, accompanied with horse-bones, and many sorts of small vessels, besides jewels of gold and silver. Likewise the skeletons of women, with gold-rings on their fingers. As this does not agree with the condition of the present inhabitants, they are doubtless the graves of the old Mungls, who died after their return with the plunder of the southern countries of Asia, into those deserts, where they buried vessels of gold and silver, with other riches, so long as they had any left. The Swedish prisoners in Siberia, as well as the Russians, used to go in great troops to search these tombs, which lie far within e the lands of the Eluths: but a good number of them having been slain by those people, all farther expeditions were forbidden, under severe penalties. This behaviour of the Eluths, otherwise so very peaceable, shews, that they considered them as the tombs of their ancestors; for which all the Pagan Tartars have an extraordinary veneration^y.

Antient sepulchres.

ON this occasion it may be proper to mention what frier Rubruquis, who, in 1255, was at the court of Mangu Khân, writes, concerning the sepulchres of the Romanians, or people of Kipchák. They build a large tomb over their dead, and set his image upon it, with its face towards the east, and holding a drinking-cup before his belly. On the monuments of rich men they erect pyramids, or little conic houses. In some places the author met with vast brick towers; in others, stone pyramids; although there are no stones found in the neighbourhood. f Near the grave they generally leave one of the defunct's horses. At one he saw sixteen horse-hides hung up on high posts, four towards each cardinal point; with kosmos (or kimis), set for the deceased to drink, and flesh to eat: but could never learn that they buried treasures with the corpse. He observed other kinds of sepulchres towards the east: namely, large stone floors, or pavements, some round, others square: with four tall stones erected at the sides, facing the cardinal points^z.

Their tents;

THE Mungls dwell either in tents, or little moveable huts. Regis, speaking of the Mungl tents, that they are round, and covered with a thick grey or white felt, upheld within by a poles, with one end tied round a hoop. They thus form the superficies of a broken cone ; with a round hole at top, to let out the smoke, which ascends from the hearth, placed in the middle underneath. While the fire lasts they are warm enough, and then grow cold again ; and in winter, would, without care, freeze in their beds. To avoid this, as well as other inconveniences, they have their tent-door very narrow, and so low that they cannot enter without stooping. They have also the art to join these loose pieces so nicely, as to keep out the piercing blasts of the north wind ^a.

THE Elutbs, according to Bentink, have, in summer, great tents of ketayka, a sort of callico ; and, in winter, sheds made of boards, and covered with felt ; which they can set up <sup>moveable houses ;</sup> and take down in less than an hour's time. The huts, or houses, used both by them and the Mungls, are made round, with great poles of light wood, joined together with leather thongs (K), for the more easily fitting up and removing them. They cover them on the outside with a thick felt, for defence against the cold and bad weather. In the middle of the roof, which is conical, they leave an opening, which serves both for a window and chimney : the fire-place b being directly underneath, and the sleeping places round the hut against the wall. The chiefs, and persons of distinction, have huts larger and more convenient ^b.

THESE moveable habitations (in their removals) are carried on waggons, with four wheels, <sup>carried on waggons.</sup> These carriages have two shafts, made of a very pliable light wood, and fastened to the axle-tree of the fore-wheels, by means of one of their ends, which is turned back. They put them between the body of the waggon and the wheels, tying a cord a span distance from the fore-c most end of the shafts. This cord goes into the end of the axle-tree, which passes through the nave of the wheel : so that the wheels, which are pretty small, play on both sides of the waggon, between the shafts and the cord. The horse marches between the shafts ; and over his back there goes an exceeding pliable piece of wood, in form of a semicircle, which is fastened on both sides to the harness, and the shafts to its two ends. They pretend, that in this manner the beast is much eased ; and indeed one horse will draw a waggon, well loaded, above a hundred leagues : but it must be observed, that these machines are not very large. When they put more horses, they either place them before the first, or fasten them to the hindmost axle-tree. The Russians and Kossacks make use of much the same sort of carriages ^c.

THE houses, in the time of Rubruquis, were thirty feet in diameter, stretching on each side <sup>Antient houses</sup> five feet beyond the wheels. Over the felt they laid mortar, marle, or bone-ashes, to make it shine white ; adorning the roof with beautiful pictures, and hanging before the door a felt painted with birds, trees, and beasts. That traveller counted twenty-two oxen drawing one cart, eleven on a side. The axle-tree was as big as the mast of a ship, and the driver stood at the door of the house. Their household stuff and treasure were kept in square wicker chests, rounded at top, and covered with felt, greased over, to keep out rain. They were adorned with paintings, or feathers, and fixed on carts, carried by camels, for crossing rivers ; but never taken down like the houses.

THESE houses, when set on the ground, are placed, as all their habitations are, with the door ^{how placed :} facing the south, to avoid the north winds, which are very piercing all over Great Tatory.
e Then they range the chest-carts at a little distance, on each side, as it were two walls. One rich Mungl had one or two hundred such carts with chests ; so that such a great man's court looked like a great village ^d.

THE fixed habitations of the Elutbs, which are but few, excepting the roof, which is in the <sup>Fixed habitations.</sup> form of a dome, are built in all respects like the moveable huts ; without either chambers, windows, or garrets : the whole consisting of one single room, about twelve feet high. But these houses are not near so large and convenient as those of the Manchews, who build them square ^e.

IN the year 1721, some persons, sent by the emperor of Russia, Peter I. to discover plants, ^{Needles, or} near the river Tzulim (or Chulim), to the west of the town of Krasnoyar ; found erected, about ^{spires.}
f the middle of the great step or desert, a kind of needle, or spire, cut out of one white stone, about sixteen feet high ; surrounded by some hundred small ones, four or five feet high. There is an inscription on one side of the great needle, and several characters on the lesser ones ; which time has already defaced in many places. They seem to have no resemblance of any used in the north parts of Asia. As there are no stones within an hundred leagues of these monuments, and such works do not agree with the genius of the present inhabitants of Tatory, Bentink seems to think, that they could not have been executed either by them or their ancestors. But this conclusion will not hold good, if we consider what has been already quoted from Rubruquis, who found tombs in that form (L) in his journey through the same parts of Tatary.

A deserted town.

IN that part of the country between the Jaik and Sir, which is inhabited by the Eluths, towards the borders of the Kassatcha Orda, who possess the other part, the Russians, about 1714, discovered a town, quite deserted; in the midst of vast sandy grounds, eleven days journey to the south-west (M) of Yamisha, and eight to the west of Sempalat (N). It is about half a league in compass, with walls five feet thick, and sixteen high: the foundation freestone, and superstructure brick, flanked with towers in several places. The houses were all built with sun-burnt bricks, and side-posts of wood, much after the common fashion in Poland. The better fort had several chambers. There were likewise great brick buildings, with each a tower; which, in all likelihood, served for temples. These buildings were in pretty good condition, without the least appearance of violence having been used to them.

Writings found there,

IN most of the houses was found a great quantity of writings done up in rolls. One fort was in China ink, and silk paper, white and thick. The leaves were two feet long, and nine inches broad, written on both sides; and the lines ran from the right to left across the same. The writing was bounded with two black lines, which left a two-inch margin. The second fort was engrossed upon fine blue silk paper, in gold and silver, with a line round each, in one or the other. The lines were written length-ways, from right to left; and varnished over to preserve them. The first fort were found to be in the Mungl language: the second in that of Tangut (or Tibet); both treating of religious matters. Since then, two other towns were discovered, deserted in the same manner by the Eluths; probably on account of their wars with the Mungls. Much of the same kind was the discovery made in 1721. Some rustics, sent from Tobolskoy, by the governor of Siberia, privately to look for ruins and ancient sepulchres, found certain images of gold, silver, and brass, in all the tombs. And, having advanced 120 German miles towards the Caspian sea, met with the ruins of splendid buildings: among which were some chambers under-ground, whose floors and sides consisted of most shining stone. They saw here and there black ebony chests; which, instead of treasure, contained writings or books. Of these they carried away only five leaves: one whereof, being tolerably well preserved, was made public (O). The learned of Europe, to whom the emperor Peter I. also communicated these writings, were much puzzled about them; but they were known at once by messieurs Freret and Fourmont, of the academy of inscriptions at Paris (P) to be the language and character of Tibet. They found it to be a funeral sermon, with a moral on the other life, well handled^f.

Language.

THE language spoken by the numerous tribes of Mungls is simply called the Mungl tongue. They have indeed several dialects (Q); but understand each other very well^g. The characters found on the antient monuments are the same with those in present use; but different from the Manchews, which are no older than the family now reigning. They have not the least resemblance of the Chinese letters, and are no more difficult than the Roman. They are written on tables with an iron pencil; for which reason a book is a great rarity among the Mungls. The emperor Kang-hi, to please them, had some of their authors translated, and printed at Pe-king. But the chief book among them is the Kalendar, published by the mathematical tribunal in that capital, and graven in Mungl characters^h.

Learning.

THE Mungls, in the flourishing times of their empire, cultivated arts and sciences; which they learned from the southern nations of Asia, whom they conquered. Among the rest, astronomy, geography, and other parts of the mathematics, are much indebted to the labours of their countrymen. But, with their dominion out of Tatary, they lost their love for learning; and, at present, are involved in their antient ignorance. However, as they are studious to preserve the knowledge of their genealogies, tribes, and other matters appertaining to their own history, they still retain a method peculiar to themselves of computing time, and settling the dates of events. This is a cycle of twelve lunar years, which we meet with in a work ascribed to one of their emperors, who reigned in Persia and Great Bukharia, with each its name, taken from some animal, in the following order: 1. Kesku, or the mouse. 2. Out, the ox. 3. Pârs, the Religion of the Mungls.

- b THE Mungls, before the time of Jenghîz Khân, were, in all probability, strict deists; ^{Mungl religion:} since that conqueror, at the head of his Yassa, or laws, ordained the belief of One God, the Creator of heaven and earth. But, in the reigns of his successors, the Lamas of Tibet found admission into Tatary; and, by degrees, so infected the inhabitants, that, at present, all but the Mohammedan Tatars profess the religion of Fo, called in their language Fo-shaki: which, besides the doctrine of the transmigration of souls (A), teaches the belief of a future state, purgatory, invocation of saints, worship of images, confession, pardons, absolution, and other doctrines, so very conformable to those of the Romish religion, that it seems the counter-part of it, as well in essentials as ceremonies, even to crossing, the beads, and holy water. They have not, indeed, any thing so absurd as transubstantiation; but they have an article of faith
- c equivalent to it: for they believe, that the God Fo, whom they call God incarnate, not only assumes a human form, and actually resides in Tibet, where he is worshipped as the true ^{that of Tibet:} Deity, or Sovereign both of heaven and earth; but that he communicates his divinity to his chosen servants, who officiate, in the several parts of his spiritual dominions, in his stead. These are the vicars, or deputies, of the Tibetian god, and are called, in the Mungl language, Khûtûktû. There are several of them in Great Tatary. The Mungls have one, who resides among and presides over them. The Khalkas another. The Khûtûktû, or vicar of the Mungls, has his abode at Khûkbû Hotûn, mentioned before in the geography of their country; where he lives in great state, and receives the adorations of the Mungls, who make pilgrimages thither, to visit him, with as much devotion as the Romanists do to Rome.
- d GERBILLON the jesuit, who was at Khûkbû Hotûn in 1688, with the emperor Kang-hi, saw ^{The Khû-} the Khûtûktû, who was then about twenty-five years old. For although they believe he ^{tûktû} never dies, yet they say he from time to time disappears; in which interval, his soul, being separated from his body, immediately enters that of some child, who is discovered by the Lamas, or priests. Hence they are called Fûsheki, or the Living Fo (B); and worshipped as God on earth. He was flat-faced, and very long visaged; sat in an alcove, at the end of the temple, on two large cushions, one brocade, the other yellow satin. There were several lamps on each hand; but only one lighted. He was covered all over with a gown or mantle of yellow damask, so that nothing could be seen but his head, which was quite bare. His hair was curled, and his mantle edged with a parti-coloured galoon, four or five inches broad, like a ^{of the Mungls;} priest's scope; which that vestment nearly resembled. All the civility he shewed the emperor's ambassadors was, to receive standing their compliments, or rather adorations: for when they were advanced within six paces of him, they cast their caps on the ground, and prostrated themselves thrice, knocking the earth with their foreheads. After this, kneeling by turns at his feet, he put his hand on their heads, and made them touch his chaplet, or beads. The ambassadors then paid a second adoration, and, the pretended immortal being first seated, took their places in alcoves, one on each side. Some of their retinue also, after paying their adorations, received the imposition of hands, and touch of the beads. Then an entertainment was set; and while the coun- ^{his behaviour:} terfeit god reached a cup of Tatarian tea, served in plate, our author observed, that his arms were bare up to the shoulders; and that he had no other clothes underneath but red and yellow scarfs, wrapped about his body. The collation being over, and the tables removed, they conversed for some time. During which the living idol kept his gravity very well: he spoke no more than five or six words, and those very softly, in answer to the ambassadors questions; but was continually rolling his eyes, looking earnestly, now at one, then at another; and some-

(B) The Chinese is Ho-Fo. In Tibet he is called Lama Konju; and by the Chinese and Tatars, God the Father, according to the Jesuit Grueber. See Collect. voyages and travels, in quarto, vol. iv. p. 653. He is called also Lama Lamalu; that is, the Lama of Lamas; and Dalay Lama, or the Great Lama; being the pope of those countries.

times vouchsafed to smile. In this temple were no images, as in other temples; but pictures of their deities, painted on the walls. In a chamber they saw a child, of seven or eight years old, with a lamp burning beside him, dressed and seated like the Khûtûktû, and seemed designed for his successor. When the ambassadors took their leave of this mock deity, he neither stirred from his seat, nor paid them the least civility ^a.

Khûtûktû of the Kalkas;

THE Khûtûktû of the Kalkas is not subject to the Dalay Lama of Tibet, though originally a deputy from him to them and the Elutbs: but, having tasted the sweets of spiritual command, he made bold (towards the year 1680) to set up for himself. This he performed with so much address, that there is scarce any mention made at present of the Dalay Lama among the Kalkas; who believe their living Fo to be no less divine and immortal than him of Tibet. The court of China had a great hand in this new apotheosis, in order to divide the Kalkas from the Elutbs; which they saw could not well be done so long as both nations continued attached to the same head of religion; who would, at all times, in case of difference, endeavour, for his own sake, to reconcile them ^b. With this view the emperor Kang-hi, at the intreaty of the Khûtûktû, assisted the Kalkas against Kaldan Pojuntu, Khân of the Elutbs, in 1688. But before the Chinese forces arrived, Kaldan had made great ravages in the country of the Kalkas; and, among the rest, destroyed the magnificent temple, which the Khûtûktû had built near the river Tula, with yellow varnished bricks.

THIS living Fo, who was the chief occasion of the war, by his cruelty and injustice, was named Chemitzun Tamba Khûtûktû; and brother to the Khân of the Kalkas, called Tushetu Khân. After his temple was destroyed, and Kaldan was repulsed by the help of the imperial troops, he went and dwelt in tents, on the banks of the Iben Pira, a little river, which falls into the Selinga. As the veneration which the Kalkas had for him drew crowds of people thither, the place, in a little time, might be called a large city of tents; the hurry being much greater there than any-where else in that part of Tatary: for it is resorted to by the Russians, and other nations, for the sake of trade, as well as by the priests of all ranks, from Hindostân, Pegu, Tibet, and China ^c. Gerbillion saw this Khûtûktû, in 1691, at an audience of the emperor Kang-hi; who obliged that pretended god to pay him homage. He was a corpulent man, and the only fat Kalka our author had ever seen; of a middle stature; and, though upwards of fifty, had a very ruddy complexion. He was dressed in a long gown of yellow fatten, with a border of rich fur, and collar of the same. Over his shoulder he wore a great linen scarf, of a dark red. His head and beard were shaved. His bonnet was a kind of mitre, of yellow fatten (C), with four red corners turned up, and faced with extreme fine black sable. He had on red boots, peaked at the toes, a narrow galloon running along the seams. He was followed by two servants, and conducted by the president of the tribunal of the Mungls. After this, being sent for by the emperor, he, for all his pride, put on the habit of ceremony appointed him by his Chinese majesty, and received a present of about 330 pounds ^d.

Lamas, or priests;

their characters.

THESE Khûtûktûs are attended by Lamas, or priests, who have a great ascendant over the people, and are held in great veneration by them: although the jesuits tell us, if they may be credited, that they are commonly not only ignorant (D), (being accounted learned, if they can but read their sacred books in the Tibetian language); but also great libertines; debauching women, with impunity. They sing their prayers, which they scarce understand, with a solemn yet harmonious air: and this makes almost the whole of their religious worship. They make no sacrifice, or offering; but they give absolution to the people who demand it, bare-headed, on their knees: and are so bigotted to them, that the missionaries say, there are very little hopes of converting them to the Romish faith. It is generally believed, that they can call down hail and rain. This was testified to the jesuits by several Mandarins, as eye-witnesses: and they were told at Pe-king, that the Lamas practised sorcery (E). They pretend also to physic; which they practise. Their dress is like that in which the apostles are painted; and they wear a mitre and cap, like bishops. They do not live in community in Tatary: but, in some places have a kind of prebends; being the lands and flocks of those whom they succeed; of whom they are generally the disciples or companions. They go from tent to tent, and repeat certain prayers; for which they have a salary ^e.

(C) The colour of yellow denotes being in the interest of the emperor of China, whose livery that is.

(D) On the contrary, we are told by Bentink, that one of his popish friends, in his way thro' the Mungls country, having reproached some Lamas for deceiving the vulgar, in making them believe the divinity of the Dalay Lama, and the Khûtûktû; they so smartly retorted on him the Romish doctrines, relating to the pope's supremacy and infallibility, that he had much ado to bring himself off with honour. Abu'lgb. hist. Turks, &c. p. 489. Now, if they are so well acquainted with the religions of other nations, it is not likely they are ignorant of their own.

(E) The antient travellers, as Rubruquis and Marco Polo, speak much of their sorcery and magic: but no wonder, since that superstition is still believed by the Romish clergy.

S E C T. III.

Government of the Mungls.

IN order rightly to understand the nature of government in use among the Mungls, it must be observed, that each of the three great branches is divided into Aymaks, or tribes: and although any one of them comes to subdivide into several lesser branches, yet they are always reckoned as belonging to such tribe. Every Aymak is composed of a number of families, who usually encamp together; and never separate, without acquainting their chief, that he may know where to find them. When an Aymak, or tribe, is assembled, whether to go fight their enemies, or for any other particular reason, it is called Orda, or, as Europeans term it, an hord.

EVERY tribe, or branch separated from it, has its particular chief, who is called Tayki (or Tayghi): which dignity descends regularly to the eldest son. These are all their nobility: and, riches being equally divided among them, there is no other difference between one head of a tribe and another, but that of merit, or the number of families in his Orda^a. These chiefs of tribes are subject to some Khân, whose vassals they are, as well as by birth his generals and counsellors. Khân, or Hân, is a title given to the sovereign of any state, great or small (A): thus, several petty Mungl princes are stiled Khâns, though tributary to the Khân of the Kalka Mungls; who is himself under the protection of the emperor of China: and this last monarch, originally coming from Tatary, is also called Khân; being considered as the Great Khân of the Manchews, proper Mungls, and Kalkas, who are subject to him. It is not permitted to any of the family, excepting the reigning prince alone, to assume the title of Khân^b: that which belongs to the princes of the blood being Tayki^c.

WHEN a Khân dies, all the princes of the reigning family, and heads of tribes, which are under the dominion of that house, meet at the usual residence of the deceased monarch; where they proceed to the election of a new one. They only examine who may be the eldest among those princes, without regard to the seniority of the several branches of the family, or to the children of the deceased; and they never fail to elect him who appears to be oldest, unless some extraordinary personal defect be found in him. It is true, force and usurpation may set this order aside: but this case happens much seldomer among the Pagan than Mohammedan Tatars^d.

THE Mungls, for some considerable time after their dividing into three great branches, continued independent under their respective Khâns: but, at present, only the Eluths retain an absolute sovereignty; the Mungls and Kalkas having become subject to the Manchews, now reigning in China, on two different occasions.

AFTER the descendants of Jenghîz Khân, towards the middle of the fourteenth century, were driven out of China, the princes of his house seized on territories, and formed different hords: however, the title of Khân remained to the chief of them, called Chakar Khân, descended from Hubelay, or Kublay. To this prince the other Mungl tribes (who had continued in Tatary), and even the Eluths themselves, were tributary, till about the beginning of the seventeenth century; when his subjects (B), unable to bear his cruelties and riots, called in the founder of the Manchew monarchy in China; who obliged him to quit the title of Khân for that of Vang, and intirely subdued the Mungls about the great wall^e.

THESE new masters, after their conquest of China, conferred on the most powerful of them the titles of Vang, Pey-le, Pey-tse, Kong, &c. answering to those of regulo, prince, duke, earl, &c.; divided them into forty-nine standards, and settled a revenue on each chief; fixed the bounds of their lands, and established laws, by which they are governed to this day. There is a grand tribunal at Pe-king (called that of the Mungls), to which appeals are brought from the judgment of the princes themselves; who are obliged to appear when cited. The Kalkas, since their subjection, are under the same regulation^f.

THE several countries or districts of the Mungls, even those which are the worst, being dry, sandy, and cold, such as Korchin, Oban, Nayman, and Turbeda, maintain a great number of princes. The house of Korchin only, at the time when the missionaries passed through it (in 1710), had eight or nine, distinguished by their several titles above-mentioned; the number of which is not fixed; because they depend on the will of the emperor of China, who is, with respect to them, the Grand Khân; and who exalts or degrades them, according to their conduct. When they are without title, or military command, they are called Tayghi (C): nevertheless, they are considered as masters of their territories by the Mungls, who are no better than slaves to the heads of their respective families.

(A) In the time of Jenghîz Khân every tribe seemed to have its particular Khân; or those chiefs who are now called Tayki were then called Khân, as being independent, till they were subdued by, or submitted to, that conqueror.

(B) By this, Chakar Khân must be only a title; since he could not have lived two whole centuries and more.

THESE princes have a politeness which distinguishes them from their subjects: who, though they stile themselves slaves, are not treated with severity; but have ready access on the slightest occasions: yet, formed by education, this familiarity takes off nothing of their respect.

The Kalka
Mungls

submit to Khâng-hi.

It does not appear at what time that part of the Mungls called Kalkas assumed the name. These had at first a Khân, who, as well as the other Mungls and Elutbs, was tributary to the Chabar Khân above-mentioned: but the Kalkas increasing vastly in time, and the descendants of Kublai, who had only the title of Tayki, growing numerous; the more powerful among them became by degrees independent on each other, and of the Khân himself, to whom they paid only a slight homage. Before the year 1688 they are said to have amounted to 600,000 families, divided into seven standards, under so many chiefs; on three of whom the Dalay Lama of Tibet conferred the title of Khân: although the Tayki's allowed them no farther superiority than the first place in their assemblies. But, in the year above-mentioned, Kaldan Pojoktu, Khân of the Elutbs, having invaded their territories, to revenge himself on the Khâtûktû, both for his usurpation or revolt from the Dalay Lama, and the death of a Khân, which he had concerted; the Kalka Khâns, after half their subjects had been destroyed by the enemy, implored the assistance of the emperor of China, Kang-hi; to whom, after the war, two of them submitted immediately, with their subjects. These he divided into Shaffaks, or standards, like the Mungls; conferring new titles on their princes, and appointing them lands for their maintenance.

At present powerful.

TUSHETU, or Tushetu, the most powerful of the Khâns (D), after his defeat by the Elutbs, fled; but was not followed by many of his people: most of whom retired into the woods, on the north side of the river Tula; and afterwards, submitting to the emperor, were divided into three standards, under so many princes. However, we are told by other authors, that this submission, obtained by the intrigues of the Lamas, was very precarious, and merely nominal: for that his son Tushidtu Khân, who, in 1720, had his urga, or camp, on the river Orkhon, twelve days journey to the south-east of Selinghinskoy, was very powerful; and had several petty Khâns, who dwelt about the springs of the Jenisea, and the great Kobi or desert, tributary to him. Likewise, instead of paying tribute himself, the emperor of China sends him every year magnificent presents; and the complaisance with which he is treated, shews, that he is feared more than any of the neighbouring princes: for, should he ever come to an agreement with the Elutbs, the union might endanger the present family reigning in China.

vernment;

THE Elutbs, who at first were tributary to the Chabar Khân, as well as the Kalkas, at length became independent also; and are, at present, the most numerous of all the great branches into which the Mungls are now divided. These people grew very formidable in the last century. After subduing Little Bukharia, under the famous Kaldan Pojoktu, before-mentioned, they ruined the Kalkas; and even threatened to attack China itself, with a handful of men: but he was overthrown at last, altho' with much difficulty. Since which time they have kept themselves within their proper bounds, and have not been so troublesome to their neighbours as before.

forces.

THE Khân (called Kontayki, or the great lord) is a potent prince, being able to bring into the field above an hundred thousand men. On this occasion it may be proper to observe, that the Taykis are of account to their Khâns only in proportion to the number of families in their respective Aymaks, or tribes; and the Khâns formidable to their neighbours, only in proportion to the number of tribes which are in subjection to them; and in which consist all their riches and grandeur, as well as power.

Arms of the Elutbs,

THE arms of the Elutbs are chiefly great bows, with sizeable arrows; which they draw very true, and with great force: it having been observed, in the difference which the Russians had with them in 1715, on account of some settlements on the river Irtish, that they pierced men quite through the body with their shafts. They have also great arquebusses, six feet long, with barrels an inch thick; and yet the ball they carry is hardly so much. They fix them on rests, and never miss at six hundred yards distance; firing them off with a match. When they march they carry them across their backs fastened to a strap; and the rest hangs on the right side. As they never go to war but on horse-back (having no infantry), they all use lances, and most of them coats of mail, and iron caps. The commanders, but few else, wear sabres, like the Chineses, the handle behind, and the point before, that they may draw backwards, which is the more convenient way. These commanders are usually the heads of Ordas: so that a a troop is strong, according as an Orda is more or less numerous. Most of the inhabitants of Tatary hang their bow at the left side, in a sort of case, when they take horse: but they carry their quivers at their backs. The left hand is the place of honour with most of the oriental people; particularly the Mohammedan Tatars.

THEY shoot their arrows with as much skill flying as advancing: for this reason they chuse Way of fight: rather to provoke their enemies at a distance, than come to close fight with them, unless they ing: have much the advantage. They have not the method of fighting in lines and ranks: but, upon going to action, divide themselves, without any order, into as many troops as there are Ordas which compose the army; and in this manner each advances, led by its chief, to charge the enemy lance in hand. The Tatars have been ever very expert in fighting flying, as Quintus Curtius, and other antient authors, relate. In this the swiftness of their horses stands them in great stead: for often, when one concludes them intirely routed, they return, and fall upon their enemy with as much vigour as before; and when their adversaries are eager to pursue them without preserving order, they run terrible risks of being defeated. The Eluths are brave beyond what can be imagined, and want nothing but European discipline to make them formidable. They have not yet learned the use of cannon; and, indeed, as they consist only of cavalry, it would not be of much service to them ^m.

EACH Aymak has its particular ensign or banner; which is usually a piece of Kitayka, or some other coloured stuff, an ell square, set upon the top of a lance, twelve feet long. The Eluths Ensigns or co. and Mungls exhibit the figure of a dromedary, cow, horse, or other animal, putting under it the name of the tribe: and as all the branches of the same tribe still retain the figure represented in the ensign thereof, adding thereto only the name of the branch for whose use it is designed, these ensigns serve them, in some measure, instead of a genealogical table. When an Aymak is in march, the ensign proceeds at the head, immediately after the chief ⁿ.

THE present inhabitants of Great Tatary in general, who have exactly preserved the manner Hazard all of living of the antient Mungls, carry their whole substance along with them where-ever they go. at war. Hence it comes, that when they happen to lose a battle, their wives and children commonly remain a prey to the vanquisher, with their cattle, and generally all they possess in the world. They are, in some measure, necessitated to incumber themselves this way; for otherwise they should leave their families and effects a prey to other Tatars their neighbours ^o.

d As there is but little magnificence at present to be found in the court of a Khân, and their The Khân's subjects are obliged to follow them to war, on the hopes of spoil, which is their only pay, they revenue. have no occasion, or rather pretence, for large revenues; which consist wholly in tythes. The Tatars of all denominations pay two tythes annually of all their effects; first to their Khâns, and then to their heads of tribes. The Eluths and Mungls, not cultivating their lands, give the tenth of their cattle, and the booty which they take in war ^p.

WITH regard to the government of the other two branches of the Eluths, the Torgaïti and Eluths Tor- Koshoti; the first, who separated from the Jongari, in the beginning of the present century, gaiti put themselves under the protection of the Russians; and still make use of it, although they possess a considerable extent of country, to the east of the kingdom of Astrakhân, and river Jaik. In other respects they live under the same form of government with the rest of the Eluths, divided into Aymaks, or tribes, with their Taykis, and a Khân over all.

THE Eluths Koshoti have been settled in the country of Koko Nor ever since the Mungls and Koshoti were driven out of China. They are subject to eight Taykis, or princes, who have their respective their govern- territories, but are leagued together for their mutual preservation. They are all of the same family, and dignified by the emperor of China with the titles of regulo, or petty king, prince, duke, and earl: they are all vassals to the Khân, who resides at Tibet, or rather to the Great Lama; on whom one of the ancestors of that Khân bestowed Tibet about the year 1630, after he had conquered it from the lawful prince. But after the defeat of Kaldan, Khân of the Jongari Eluths, by the troops of the emperor, of China in 1691, the emperor Kang-hi sent to invite these eight Taykis to become his vassals. The chief in rank among them, accepting the invitation, was made Tsing Vang, or prime regulo. Some of the others submitted to pay him homage by proxy; and the emperor chose to win the rest by presents, and allowing them a trade custom-free ^q.

BOOK IV.

History of the Mogul or Mungl empire, founded by Jenghîz Khân.

CHAP. I.

The reign of Temujin, till elected Grand Khân.

Mogul empire,

its vast extent :

its history little known.

Asiatic authors

THE empire of the Moguls, whose history we are now entering upon, is one of the most surprizing phænomena which has appeared on the theatre of this world ; and what deserves more than any other to attract the reader's admiration, whether he considers its rise, its extent, or the rapidity of its progress. It was thought that the Arabs had carried conquest to its utmost stretch ; and that no human power could ever do more than a people, who, in the compass of seventy years, subdued more countries than the Romans had done in 500. But the Moguls have gone far beyond the Arabs, and from as small a beginning acquired a much larger empire in far less time : for Jengbiz Khân, in a few years, extended his dominions, from a small territory, to more than 1800 leagues from east to west, and above 1000 from north to south, over the most powerful, as well as wealthy, kingdoms of Asia. Hence he is with justice acknowledged to be the greatest prince who ever filled the eastern throne ; and all historians have bestowed on him the highest titles, as well as greatest encomiums, that ever monarch was honoured with. They style him the conqueror of the world, the only king of kings, the master of thrones and crowns : they likewise say, that God never invested any sovereign on earth with so great authority ^a.

BUT for all Asia so long refounded with the fame of this hero, his name has been scarce known to Europeans, till of late, that his history has been given from the oriental authors : for although some early travellers, as Rubruquis and Marco Polo, wrote concerning the Moguls, and their conquests, yet they have done it in so imperfect and erroneous a manner, as to afford no just idea of them ; whilst the fables, which their relations are mixed with, rendered the whole suspected and despised by men of judgment.

THE short but curious account, which Abû'lfaraj (A) has delivered of Jengbiz Khân, and his immediate successors, first gave the learned of these parts of Europe a desire to know more of their history. In this D'Herbelot in good measure gratified them in his Bibliothèque Orientale (B). Afterwards M. Petit de la Croix, the father, wrote the history of Jengbiz Khân, compiled chiefly from the oriental authors, by order of Lewis XIV. king of France ; to which his son hath added an abridgment of the history of that monarch's successors in the several parts of his empire (C). Since then a translation has been published of the genealogical history of the Turks and Tatars, written by Abû'lghazi Khân of Karazm : wherein is given the history of Jengbiz Khân, in some detail from nineteen or twenty oriental authors, of whom Fadlallah is the principal, with that of his successors, chiefly in Great Bukhâria, and Kapchak (D). ^d

(B) Published in 1690, in folio.

(C) Published in French, in two volumes 8vo, 1722 ; and in English, in one volume, 1730.

(D) He brings down the history to the year 1663. It was first procured by the Swedish prisoners from a Bukhâr merchant, who brought it to Tobolsky, capital of Siberia.

Strahlenberg got it translated into the Russian ; and Mr. Bentink, with his approbation and directions, published it in French, with curious notes, in 1726, in one volume 12mo ; and, in 1730, it was published in English, with additional notes, in two volumes 8vo. The first contains the history ; the second the notes, connected so as to form a regular account of countries, and their present inhabitants.

Lastly,

a Lastly, Anthony Gaubil, a Jesuit at Peking, obliged the world with a history of Jenghiz Khân, and his successors in China, till their expulsion; extracted from the Chinese annals, and illustrated with very useful notes of his own (E). These are the works of any note, taken immediately from the Asiatic writers, which have as yet come to hand; and from them principally have we drawn our materials relating to the Mogul affairs.

But here it must be observed, that Abû'lghazi Khân and De la Croix, or the authors they have made use of, proceed on different plans, or according to different memoirs. The first confines himself to a plain narration of facts, in the order they happened, without enlarging on any thing: the latter improves every thing to the advantage of his hero, in order to make his actions appear with greater lustre. The first leaves him in a state of inactivity, from the death of his father till the fortieth year of his age, that he became in a condition to reduce his revolted subjects, and obtain the empire: the latter fills up that space of time with a great many incidents, and even assigns them their dates, that his reign might not appear with so great a chasm in it. To enhance his future glory the more, he makes him, during that interval, reduced to put himself under the protection of Vang Khân, sovereign of many nations; whereas Abû'lghazi Khân represents him as quite independent all the while. Lastly, De la Croix places Temujin's birth ten years earlier than the other; which makes a great difference in the chronology, from thence to the time he became Grand Khân.

WHENCE this great disagreement arises it is not easy to determine: since Abû'lghazi Khân, tho' he made use of twenty authors, never quotes, or even mentions, any, excepting Fadlallah; and that only to give some account of his work, as being his principal authority: on the other hand, De la Croix commonly cites his authors in the margin, but not distinctly enough to know what belongs to each. However, from thence we are able to discover, that he took not only the date of Temujin's birth, but also his history, especially for the beginning of his reign, chiefly from Mirkbond, Kondamir, and other oriental authors, rather than Fadlallah, whom he seldom quotes on the occasion. Now as this is the principal historian made use of by Abû'lghazi Khân, who also had recourse to several Mogul writers, it is probable he follows them in those particulars: and hence may arise the difference between him and De la Croix.

POSSIBLY Fadlallah relates no more concerning the first years of Temujin's reign than what we meet with in Abû'lghazi Khân; and that the latter historians have swelled it with incidents, and even enlarged the term of his life, for the reason before-mentioned. However that be, it is certain Abû'lghazi Khân took his memoirs, so far at least, from other authors than those whom De la Croix has made use of; and his authority, we think, ought to be preferred; not only because, as being a Mogul himself, he was better able to judge what writers were most to be depended on; but also because the account he gives is correspondent with the Chinese history, whose authority ought to take place, had all the Persian historians, and even Fadlallah himself, contradicted it. For although the Wâzir Fadlallah wrote his curious work in the year 1294, at the command of Gazân, or Kazân Khân (sixth successor of Hûlâkû, Jenghiz Khân's grandson, in Persia), from the memoirs of Pulâd, a Mogul, sent by that monarch into Tatary to collect them; yet Kublai Khân, Hûlâkû's brother, who reigned in the eastern part of Tatary and China, had ordered the history of his predecessors to be written several years before^b. So that, supposing oral traditions, rather than written memoirs, were the chief basis of both histories^c; yet that set on foot by Kublai Khân may be presumed to be more complete and accurate than the other composed by Kazân Khân's order: as not one person only, but many, doubtless, were employed to collect materials; and being written on the spot, recourse might be easily had, from time to time, to proper persons for information and solving difficulties. Not to mention the advantages it must have received from the Chinese historians, who have been always careful to record, by way of annals, the affairs of their neighbours, especially such as they had any transactions with; so that whatever defects occurred in the Mogul traditions, with respect to dates, or otherwise, might have been supplied from thence. It is for these reasons that, in the following history of Jenghiz Khân, and the Moguls, we have preferred Abû'lghazi Khân's history to that of De la Croix; and that given us by Gaubil from the Chinese historians, to both the others: who yet, with regard to the affairs of the Moguls in the western parts, for the same reasons, are preferable to him.

WE have already given an account of the Mogul tribes, their ancient history, and Khâns, to the time of Jenghiz Khân; with remarks on the same^d: we shall therefore in this place only touch on such matters preceding the time of that conqueror, as more immediately relate to him, and may be necessary to complete his history.

(E) This learned and judicious Jesuit transmitted two tracts to E. Souciet, of the same society; who published them first in his Observ. math. astr. géogr. &c. in 4to, 1719. It is intitled, A brief history of the first five Mogul emperors. The second appeared by itself, in 1739, under the title of The history of Ghentchiscan, and all his successors, who reigned in China.

Jenghiz Khân's descend.

ACCORDING to the tradition of the Moguls, Jenghiz Khân was of divine descent, since his family can be traced no farther back than Alankû, or Alankawa; who, being got with child by a spirit, brought forth three sons, who from thence obtained the surname of Niron (F), which their posterity enjoyed: those of her former children being called Dirlighin, to denote that they had no miraculous original. As Jenghiz Khân descended in a right line from Buzenjir (G), the third of Alankû's celestial offspring, and his predecessor in the ninth degree, some authors call him the Son of the Sun (H). According to Fadlallah (I), who wrote his life, his descent from Alankû is as follows: 1. Buzenjir Khân. 2. Bûka Khân. 3. Tutumiten Khân. 4. Kaydu Khân. 5. Bayfankar Khân. 6. Tumena Khân. 7. Kabal Khân. 8. Purtan Khân. 9. Tesukay (K) Behadr. 10. Jenghiz Khân (L).

His ancestors.

AMONG these princes three or four were particularly famous; Buzenjir, surnamed the just, was Khân of Kotan. Bayfankar (or Bassikar, as Abûlghazi Khân calls him) was a prince of great conduct, and conquered many provinces. Kabal, or Kabul Khân, made himself the admiration of all Asia by his courage (M): he had six sons, in whom the name of Kayat, which had been lost for 3000 years, was revived (N). Bisukay (or Tesuki) Behadr, the father of Jenghiz Khân, was remarkable for having brought under his command the greater part of the chiefs of the Mogul nations, with the kings of Karakatay, or Karakitay (O), who troubled his quiet. He vanquished them, though they were frequently assisted by the king of Katay, which comprised the northern provinces of China.

Their conquests.

AFTER this, having received an affront from the tribe of Su Moguls (P), or Tatars, he entered their country, which he pillaged; and, being met by Temujin Khân, lord of several tribes, who came to drive him thence, he put him to flight, after a bloody battle, and returned with honour to his country-seat, where he commonly resided, called Dilon Ildak (Q), in Teka Mogulistan. To commemorate this victory, he gave the name of the vanquished Khân to a son, of whom Olon Ayka (R), the first of his wives, was soon after delivered (S), calling him Temujin (T). As he was born with congealed blood in his hands, Sûghujin, the Khân's relation and first minister, foretold, by his skill in astrology, that he should overcome his enemies in battle, and, at length, arrive to be Grand Khân of all Tatary. On the death of Sûghujin, Pisûka chose his son Karasher Nevian, a man of great parts and learning, to educate Temujin; who had scarce attained his ninth year, when he would apply himself to no other exercise than that of arms.

YESUKAY at length was unfortunately taken prisoner by the Khân of Kitay (U); but after a long imprisonment, making his escape by bribing his guard, he resolved to revenge himself: in order to which, he married Temujin, though not thirteen years old, to the Khân of the Naymans daughter; but died (X) before he could execute his design.

(F) This, the oriental authors say, is a corruption, or contraction, of Nûranîyûn, which signifies children of light.

(G) Abûlghazi Khân's translators call him Budenfir Mogak.

(H) According to Abûlghazi Khân's history, something as bright as the sun fell into Alankû's chamber, and assumed the shape of a man.

(I) This is the first and most eminent of all who have written of Jenghiz Khân, and his successors. An account has been already given of him, p. 123.

(K) De la Croix writes Pisûka; and seems to have followed Mirkhond, and others, who call him Bisukay, or Pisukay. But Kondamir, Abûlghazi Khân, and the Chinese annals, name him Tesukay; which we have followed.

(L) The names in this succession differ a little from those given by Abûlghazi Khân, probably through some mistake in transcribing.

(M) Page 5, it is said, that the Moguls under him made a vast progress, and advanced as far as Karakatay, where they obliged some Khâns to pay them tribute: but that, in the twelfth century, in which Jenghiz Khân was born, they were tributary to the Kara-its. The Tumena Khân, in this list of ancestors, must be a different person from the hero of that name, mentioned before, p. 134, & seq.

(N) They were called Niron Kayat, of which tribe Jenghiz Khân was chief. It is called his own tribe, p. 18.

(O) The Chinese annals do not seem to make him so powerful: it is only said, that he was chief of the principal hord of the Moguls. This hord was contiguous to that of the Naymans, near the city of Holin, or Karakorum, to the north of the sandy desert. Souciot observ. mathemat. &c. p. 185. and Gaubil histoire de Gentchisc. p. 2.

(P) It may be questioned, if this distinction of Su Moguls, or Tatars, is to be found in any oriental author; for it seems to be taken from Carpin the friar, who was sent into Tatary by the pope, in 1246.

(Q) The same, probably, called in Abûlghazi Khân's history, Blunuldak.

(R) In Abûlghazi Khân's history, p. 48, & 67, she is called Ulan-Iga. The surname of Iga, in the Mogul language, signifies great. She had also the surname of Kujin, which, in the language of Kitay, is an old woman. She was of the tribe of Alakours, and had a vast deal of wit.

(S) This date is according to Abûlghazi Khân; and agrees nearly with the Chinese history, which puts it in 1162: but De la Croix places his birth in 549, ten years higher, from Mirkhond, and other historians.

(T) According to the Chinese annals, he was first named Kyravwen: but afterwards, in memory of the victory over Temujin, chief of a Tatar hord, whom his father Tesukay took prisoner, he was called Temujin. He was born at a mountain near the river Onon, or Amûr, where Tesukay incamped after the battle. Gaubil hist. de Gentchisc. &c. p. 2.

(U) De la Croix places this in 562 of the Hijrah, of Christ 1166.

(X) According to the Chinese, he died in the flower of his age; left five sons and a daughter; and appointed Temujin chief of the hord.

a BEFORE we proceed, it will be proper to acquaint our readers with the state of Tatary, and State of Asia, the neighbouring countries, at the time of this prince's death. The whole region between mount Altay and the eastern Tatary, was divided among a great number of Aymaks, or tribes; who had each one or more Khâns, according as it was more or less numerous, and divided into branches. Among these, that of the Kara-its was most powerful, whose prince assumed the title of Grand Khân: to him most of the other tribes, and, among the rest, the Moguls, were tributary; but, according to the Chinese historians, both one and the other paid tribute to the emperor of Kitay, or Katay.

b CHINA was at that time divided into two parts: the nine southern provinces were in the hands of the Chinese emperors of the Song family, who kept their court at Hang-chew, the capital of the province of Che kyang: the five northern provinces, except part of Sben-si, with the adjoining parts of Tatary, were possessed by the Kin, a people of eastern Tatary, from whom the Man-chew, at present masters of China, are descended. This vast dominion was named Kitay, or Katay, and divided into two parts: that which belonged to China was properly called Kitay; and the part which belonged to Tatary was named Karakitay; in which some even include the territories of the Moguls, Kara-its, and other nations, mentioned in this history.

c THE western part of proper Kitay was possessed by a prince of Turkish extraction, who had lately formed an empire there, called by the Chinese Hya and Si Hya; whose capital city was Hya-chew, at present Ninghya, in Sben-si, from whence the kingdom took its name. To the west of Hya lay Tangut; a country of great extent, and formerly very powerful; but at that time reduced to a low state, and divided among several princes; some of whom were subject to the emperor of Hya, and others to him of China.

ALL Tatary to the west of mount Altay, as far as the Caspian sea, with the greater part of Little Bukhâria, which then passed under the general name of Turkestan, was subject to Gur-khân, Kurkhân, or Kavar Khân; to whom the Oygûrs, Vigûrs, or Igûrs, and even the Karazm Shâh, who reigned over Great Bukhâria, Karazm, and most part of Irân, or Persia, were tributary. This Gurkhân had been prince of the western Kitân, or Lyau; who, driven out of Kitay by the Kin, settled in Little Bukhâria, and the country to the north, between Turfân (about which the Oygûrs inhabited) and Kashgûr, where they founded a powerful state in the year 1124.

d THIS was the state of the north part of Asia at Pisukay's (Y) decease; at what time between thirty and forty thousand families, all from the same stock, were under his obedience. But Temujin being so young, the Tayjuts first, and then two thirds of the rest, deserting him, went over to one Burgani Kariltuk. All the Kataguns, the Jipjuts (Z), the Jaygherats (or Fajekats), and the Nirons, excepting a few families, joined him to a man. Hereupon the Markats, who never would submit to Tesughi (or Pisûka) Babadr, submitted to him. They who continued faithful to Temujin were the descendants of his great grandfather, half the tribe of the Markats, and several families of the other tribes: there remaining out of some fifty families, one or two hundred out of others, and no more than ten or five out of many. It is true, Temujin did all he could to remedy this evil in the beginning: for this end, while scarce thirteen years old, he took the field against those revolters, and fought a bloody battle; but, in regard it was not decisive, he was obliged to temporize till the fortieth year of his age. This is all which Abû'lghazi Khân relates concerning him till that period; but many remarkable transactions happened during that interval, which are mentioned by other authorsⁱ.

e PISUKA's death threw things into confusion: for soon after the Khâns of Tanjut (A), Mer-kit, and several other Niron tribes, his relations, whom he had subdued, with his cousin Jemuka (B), revolting, came to attack Temujin: who, encouraged by his mother, set up his standard, which displayed a horse's tail, and marched along with her at the head of his forces; which fought the enemy with good success^k.

f THIS affair is related more particularly in the Chinese history: which takes notice, that Temujin being very young, his mother Ulun governed in his stead, and brought back several of his vassals, who had gone over to Taychot (C) and Chamuka, two princes, enemies to his family. These, having formed an army 30,000 strong, of soldiers chosen out of seven hords, came to attack Temujin: but being assisted by his mother, who led a body of troops herself, and by Porji, a young lord of the hord of Orla, but thirteen years old; after a bloody battle, in which those three did wonders, Taychot was slain, and Chamuka put to flight. This action made a noise all over Tatary, greatly to the advantage of the young Mogul prince: who discovered on this occasion much grandeur of soul, in the manner of rewarding his officers and soldiers, making them ride his own horses, giving them habits, and the like. Almost all Taychot's hord, which was very numerous, and possessed a large country, submitted to the victor; and Potû (D), who was lord of the country about the river *Ergona*¹ (or Argun), became his fast ally, marrying his sister Tumulun; upon whose death Jenghîz Khân gave him his daughter to wife^m. But after this we are told, that, fortune turning against Temujin, he was beaten; and fell several times into the hands of his adversaries: yet had always the luck to escape.

A. D. 1176.

In his fourteenth year he espoused Purta Kujin, daughter to the Khân of the Kongorats, and kinswoman to Vang (or Ung) Khân of the Kara-its (E); by whom he had a daughter that same year. But next year, while he was on some expedition from home, the Merkits entered Niron Kayat, which belonged to one of his tribes; and, having defeated the few forces who guarded it, carried off all that was valuable, with the princess Purta Kujin, who was big of her second child. Her they sent to Vang Khân, and her husband's enemies pressed him to marry her: but, though she was very beautiful, he declined it, saying, He could not marry his son's wife. He spoke thus, because, at the time when he made a league of amity with Tesukay, he called Temujin his son.

The Moguls revolt:

retires to Ka-rakorum.

So soon as the Mogul prince heard of his wife's captivity, he sent an ambassador to Karakorum, to demand her of the Khân (F); who immediately granted his request. Happening to be delivered of a son on the road, she wrapped him in paste; and so carried him in her lap, without hurting his tender limbs, to the palace of her husband, who called him Fuji (G). Two years after this, his own tribe of Niron Kayat, seduced by Tukta Bey, Khân of the Merkits, his most powerful enemy, took up arms against him; and he was himself made prisoner by the tribe of Tanjut (or Tayjut). He had however the address to escape again from the hands of his enemies. After this, reflecting on the bad posture of his affairs, he offered the Khâns all they could desire to procure an accommodation; but their design being entirely to ruin the house of Tesukay, they rejected all his proposals, and seized the greater part of his dominions. Hereupon, resolving to take refuge under the Grand Khân, he sent a Nevian, or prince of his court (H), to Karakorum, to implore the protection of Vang Khân, who readily granted it; in consideration, as he said, of the signal obligations which he lay under to his father Pisuka. Upon this Temujin married his mother Ulon Ayka to Buzrak (I), an eminent man, whom he placed on his right hand above all the princes; and leaving the regency of his kingdom to his uncle Utejekin, departed with Karashar, and all his faithful servants, escorted by a guard of 6000 men, for the court of the Grand Khânⁿ; of whom it may be proper to give some account.

Vang Khân's
descent.

THE predecessors of this prince, whose original name was Togrul, had been powerful lords in Mogulistân, Jelayr, Türkestân, and Karakitay. Some of his ancestors had even assumed the title of emperor; but their greatness in time decayed. His family, one of the most illustrious in Karakitay, contained six great tribes of Derligbin Moguls; among whom were the Kara-its, who made war with their neighbours. Mergûs (K), the grandfather of Togrul, whose tribe resided at Karakorum, was one of the most considerable and valiant Khâns of the Kara-its, but at the same time unfortunate: for several Khâns of Karakitay having combined against, and twice vanquished him; one of them, named Nawr, his relation, drew him into an ambuscade, and sent him to the king of Kûrga (L) in China, who caused him to be sewed up, bound, in a sack, and left to expire on a wooden ass.

(D) Afterwards said to be lord of I-ki-lye-tse hord.

(E) This, following the Chinese and Abûlghazi Khân's computation of his birth, must have been in the year 1176, or 1177.

(F) Hejrah 567, A. D. 1168. De la Croix.

(G) That is, in the Mogul language, happily arrived. So says De la Croix: but Abûlghazi Khân says it signifies a guest. This prince was named also Tufbi.

(H) About this time he dreamed that his arms were grown of an extraordinary length; and that, holding a sword in each hand, that in the right pointed to the east, the other to the west. Which the queen his mother interpreted, as prefiguring to him the empire of two parts of the world. Marakishî.

(I) In De la Croix he is called Amir Buzrak; in Abûlghazi Khân, Menglik Izka. He brought the whole tribe of Kunakmars, of which he was, to submit to Jenghîz Khân; and informed him of Vang Khân's design against him.

(K) Mergûs îli, in Abûlghazi Khân's history.

(L) De la Croix says, some pretend that this Kûrga was Korea: but that country is too far distant.

a for her before her marriage with Mergüs, she would not scruple to make him her husband. Nawr, falling into the snare, the lady immediately sets out, attended by waggons laden with great vessels made of ox hides, filled with Kammez (or Kimis), a hundred sheep, and ten mares, which were ordered to be dressed. The Khan met the princess with all the demonstrations of joy; and having drank plentifully of the liquor which she presented him, she gave the signal to her attendants: these opening the great barrels, there came forth armed men, and cut to pieces Nawr (whom she had already stabbed), with all his domestics. After this, she made her retreat, without the least suspicion; and for so great an action was highly esteemed by all the princes of that age.

b MARGUS KHAN left two sons by his princess, Koja Boyruk and Gürkhân. The first at his death left several children; the eldest of whom was named Togrul (M): at ten years of age he accompanied his father in the wars, and was in that expedition where his grandfather was taken by Nawr, and with much difficulty escaped himself. As he had more merit than the rest of his brothers, he succeeded his father, which made them hate him (N). After this, having frequent quarrels with his brothers and cousins, he put some of them to death; which rigorous treatment moved his uncle Gürkhân to make war upon him. Vang Khân being vanquished, and being dispossessed of his dominions, fled to Pisuka, Temujin's father; by whose assistance he recovered his throne, and pursued Gürkhân even to the kingdom of Kashin°.

c THIS Vang Khân (or, as it is commonly written, Ung Khân) was the prince who made so great a noise in the Christian world towards the end of the twelfth century, under the title of the Prester John of Asia, which the Nestorians first conferred on him: and there are four letters extant, said to be sent by him to pope Alexander III. Lewis VII. of France, the emperor of Constantinople, and the king of Portugal. That to the king of France, of which there is a French copy, begins, “Prester John, by the grace of God, the most powerful monarch, king of all Christian kings, witheth health, &c.” He boasts of his great wealth, and the vastness of his dominions; speaking of seventy kings who serve him, and vaunting of the tribute which he extorts from an Israelitish king, who is lord of many dukes and Jewish princes. He invites the king of France to come and see him, promising to give him great dominions, and make him his successor. He proceeds to name the different kinds of people and rarities that are in his kingdoms. He calls himself a priest, because he performs the sacrifice of the altar; and a king, as he executes the office of a sovereign judge. He speaks of St. Thomas according to the fabulous notions of the Indians; and, at the conclusion, desires the king to send him some valiant cavalier of French generation^p.

d BUT it is not difficult to discover that this letter is spurious, and written, not by Vang Khân, a Nestorian but the Nestorian missionaries; who were very numerous, and had been established there in the year 737, by means of those of Musol and Basrah. These, by their emissaries, had spread a report all over Christendom, that they had converted the greater part of the inhabitants of Tatary, and even the Great Khan himself; who, they said, was actually become a priest, and had assumed the name of John. They invented these fables to make their zeal more conspicuous, and render their sect more respected. There is also a letter of the pope's, which styles him, a most holy priest; although, in reality, there is not the least appearance that he was a Christian: but only, that he permitted Christians to live in his dominions, with their bishops; and that some of his subjects had embraced their religion.

e ALL that can be allowed as true, is, that this prince was the most powerful Khan of the country north of Kitay; and that a great many sovereign princes paid him tribute. Abûl'faraj observes, that he was lord over all the eastern Turks; for, in his time, the greater part of the inhabitants of Tatary were called Turks. Vang Khân was a native of the tribe of Kara-its, whose dependants were the inhabitants of Jelayr and Tendük, who possessed the largest parts of that region. The capital of this kingdom was Karakorum (O), situate about ten days journey from the place where Temujin first kept his court, and about twenty days from the borders of China. This city, after Vang Khân's reign, became the residence of the Mogul emperors, and had the name of Ordubaleg given it by Oktay Khân, the successor of Jenghiz Khân^q.

(M) Called, in Abûlghazi Khân's history, Tayrel; perhaps by some mistake. These translations name him also Manak, which is a corruption of Vang; and say his brothers were Jakakara (by others, Erkekara), Baytimur, Numisay, and Jukambu, who is called Hakambu by others.

(N) It is added here, that this aversion was increased by the king of China's (or rather Kitay) honouring him with the title of Ung Khân. But this, according to the Chinese history, happened not till afterwards, in the time of Temujin; as will be related presently.

(O) De la Croix says, it signifies black sand. In Abûlghazi Khân, karakum is said to be Turkish for black sand. Perhaps both names may signify the same thing.

esteemed.

THIS prince was in his twentieth year (P), when he arrived at Karakorum, where he was received with great marks of affection by the Grand Khân, whom he assured of his obedience, professing to devote himself intirely to his service. Vang Khân, on the other hand, promised him his protection, and to force the Mogul Khâns to return to their duty. He sent lords to menace them with war, if they continued hostilities against Temujin; and daily heaped honours on his royal guest: called him his son, and even placed him above the princes of his own blood: increased the officers of his retinue; and committed the conduct of his armies to him, in the war he had with the Khân of Tendûk. Temujin made his courage appear on this occasion, and humbled some Mogul Khâns, who refused to pay Vang Khân the usual tribute. But this success and favour of the sovereign created him many enemies among the courtiers; who, at first, following the example of their master, strove who should please him most.

daughter.

THIS enmity was increased by another accident. The princess Wisûljine, daughter to the Grand Khân, charmed with the valour and person of the young Mogul prince, fell in love with him; and rejected the offers of Jemuka, Khân of the tribe of Jajerat (Q), who had, with much earnestness, asked her in marriage. But Vang Khân having given her to Temujin, Jemuka was so enraged, that he vowed revenge; and stirred up many persons, as envious as himself, to join with him: yet the credit which that young prince had with the Grand Khân, who had made him his prime minister, and the great number of his friends, for a long time defeated all their contrivances. However, Vang Khân, who wanted nothing but firmness of mind, at last suffered himself to be seduced with calumnies.

THIS is the account given by the Persian historians; but the Chinese do not speak of Temujin as seeking protection of the Kara-it Khân. On the contrary, they represent him as in friendship with, but independent of, him, and in good circumstances; ever since the defeat of Jamuka and Taychot, by his mother's assistance: at which time he seems to have reduced the revolted tribes under his obedience.

duced.

AFTER this, probably about the time that he is said to have retired to Karakorum, the Chinese history informs us, that the hord of the Tatars, who usually incamped along the Enon (R), having revolted against the emperor of Kitay, this monarch ordered all his tributary princes (S), to assemble near that river, and march against them. To-li (T), lord of the Kara-its (U), and Temujin, having distinguished themselves on this occasion, the first was made a Vang or Wang (X), which answers to Khân; whence afterwards called by his subjects Vang Khân; and Temujin had a considerable post in the army conferred upon him.

League against them.

AFTER this, Toli's brother, in discontent, fled to the Naymâns, and prevailed on their Khân to attack him. This obliged him to fly to the countries of the Whey-bu (Y), to the west of the Whang-ho, or yellow river, which runs through China. In this distress Temujin lent his troops to Vang Khân; who, marching to the river Tula, defeated the Merkits (or Markats), who were neighbours and allies of the Naymans: then joining Temujin, both together fell upon the Naymans, and routed them. But altho' Vang Khân got much plunder in these actions, he gave none to his benefactor, who yet concealed his resentment. The Persian historians relate this affair more at large, in the following manner. Tûktabey, Khân of the Merkits (or Markats), was at the head of those who sought to ruin Temujin; and finding that their plots did not succeed, broke friendship with Vang Khân, in order to compass his design by force (Z). With this view he made a league with the Khân of Tanjût (or the Tayuts), who both together assembled a formidable army, into which they admitted all who were enemies either to Temujin or his protector: and, to confirm their union, took a solemn oath, usual with the Moguls on such occasions. All the Khâns and chiefs, or their deputies, hewed in pieces with their swords a horse, a wild ox, and a dog; after which they pronounced this formula: "Hear, O God! O heaven! O earth! the oath that we swear against Vang Khân and Temujin: if one of us spares them, when occasion offers, or fails to keep the promise which he has made to ruin them, and assist their enemies against them, may he become as these beasts."

* ABU'LFARAJ, ap. eund. p. 28, & seq.

(P) Then, according to Abû'lghazi Khân, and the Chinese computation, it will be in 1182 or 1183.

(R) Or Wa-nan; the same with the Saghalian Ula, or Amûr.

(S) From hence it appears, that the Kara-its and Moguls were tributary to the emperor of Kitay. And indeed, what is so often mentioned in De la Croix's history of Jenghiz Khân, from the oriental historians, of the Moguls and other tribes inhabiting Karakatay, shews this to be so; since with them Karakatay was part of the empire of Kitay, signifying black Kitay, to distinguish it from the other part, which was cultivated, and inhabited mostly by *Chinese*s.

(Y) The princes of the Whey-lû, at first called Whey-be, were possessed of the territories to the north or north-west, and west, of Turfân, in Little Bukhâria, and perhaps to the south of that city. They were descended from the Whey-bû, who, during the Chinese dynasty of Tang, were so powerful, and afterwards became Mohammedans. Gaub. Perhaps the same with the Whey-ke, p. 136.

(Z) This is placed, by De la Croix, in Hejrah 573. A. D. 1177.

- a THIS oath was long kept secret : but at length the Grand Khân, and Mogul prince, having been informed of all by a Kongorat lord, prepared to prevent their enemies. Temujin joining his Moguls to one half of the Kara-it army, which was given to him, marched to the borders of the Tanjûts (or Tayuts) ; and, by his extraordinary diligence, surprized them with his arrival. However, their general, to avoid fighting, till some of the allies had joined him, amused Temujin by various stratagems. Mean time the Naymâns having learned by their scouts that the Grand Khân had but part of his army with him at Karakorom, Erkekara (A), a younger brother of his, who many years before had retired to that tribe, persuaded their Khân Tayyan Khân, who thought of nothing less than an irruption from that quarter ; having, the year before, made peace with Tayyan Khân, on terms very advantageous to the Naymâns.

- b THE Grand Khân, at this unexpected visit, made a brave defence ; but, after an obstinate fight, was obliged to fly, to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy. The greater part of his soldiers were either killed or wounded, and the capital city pillaged ; where his brother Erkekara ascended the throne, as Khân of the Kara-its. The remainder of his scattered troops, with prince Sankûn his son, retired to the mountains (B) ; and Vang Khân himself hastened to seek his son-in-law, whom he found ready to give battle to the Tanjûts and their confederates. The Mogul prince was much amazed when he saw the king in his camp, and heard of his disaster : but comforting him with the hopes of having now his full revenge ; he resigned to the Khân the command of the main body, and put himself at the head of the left wing, a Kara-it lord being intrusted with the right. The victory was a long time doubtful : but at length Temujin broke in with such fury upon the confederate forces, that he put their left wing into disorder ; which animating the rest of the troops, the enemy was intirely routed, and the Tanjût tribe almost quite destroyed.

- c NEXT year (C) Temujin got together a formidable army of Kara-its, with intent to restore the Grand Khân : nor was that of the confederate Khâns less considerable. Tuktabey, for want of Tanjûts, brought Merkits with him. Tayyan Khân led the Naymâns in person, and the tribes which Erkekara had engaged to his part, helped greatly to augment his army. After skirmishing a while, Temujin, at the head of his troops, began a general battle, the most bloody, perhaps, that was ever fought. At last the leaders of the enemy gave way, and fled, followed by their troops ; of whom the pursuers made a terrible slaughter. It was not known what became of Erkekara (D) : but the Grand Khân, his brother, entered victoriously into Karakorom, in 1179, and was re-established in his throne.

- d ABU'LGHAZI KHAN does not mention this restoration of Vang Khân by Temujin, but speaks of his dethronement by Jakakara, as an event which happened in the reign of Tesukay Behadr *. That author leaves Temujin in a state of inaction for the space of twenty-seven years. He tells us, that, after the battle which he fought when but thirteen years old, finding himself not able to reduce the tribes which had revolted from him, to Burgani Kariltûk, he was obliged to temporize till the year Bars, or the tiger ; when entering into the fortieth year of his age, a man belonging to the revolted tribes came to tell him, that the Tayjuts and Nirons were joined with the Bayjuts, the Markats, and the Tatars, intending to surprize him. On this news Temujin, who had already considerably augmented his forces, and acquired great experience in war, gave a general review to the thirteen tribes, which were then under his obedience. After this he ordered the baggage and cattle to be placed in the middle of the camp ; and putting himself at the head of his troops, proposed, in that posture, to wait for the enemy : but, at their approach, he ranged his 30,000 men in a line, to cover, by so large a front, his baggage and beasts. Having in this manner engaged his foes, he gained a complete victory, with the slaughter of 5 or 6000 slain on the spot, and a great number taken prisoners.

- e IMMEDIATELY after the battle, he ordered seventy large caldrons of water to be put on the fire, and caused the principal of the revolters to be thrown in headlong, when the water was boiling hot. After this he marched to the habitations of the revolted ; and having plundered them, carried away the men, cattle, and all other effects. He condemned to slavery the children of the chief men of the tribes ; and distributed the rest among his troops, to serve for recruits.

- f PRINCE Chamaka (or Jemuka) envying the reputation of Temujin, stirred up several princes, the chief whereof were those of Hatakin, Sachibu, Kilupan, and Tatar, who resolved to seize on both him and Vang Khân. Te-in (E), lord of the Honkirats (or Kongrats), who had been raised by Jamuka.

Hereupon Temujin and Vang Khân took the field, when least expected, and defeated the confederates in several battles. The Moguls were considerably reinforced by the accession of the Ulutay, Mangu, Chalar (or Jalayr), Honkirats, and I-ki-ye-tse. These five hords, which furnished excellent officers, and sprung from the five sons of Laching Patâr, sixth ancestor of Te-in dwelt along the Onon, Kerlon, Ergone, Kalka, and other neighbouring rivers. At this time Temujin and Te-in made a treaty, famous in the history of the Moguls; by virtue of which the chief of each family was to take his first wife out of the other: which treaty was strictly observed, so long, at least, as the descendants of Temujin reigned in *China*².

A. D. 1202.

IN 1202 Jamuka having assembled the confederate princes near the river Tulu Pir (F), they elected him their chief, and took an oath to obey him. This league was exceedingly strengthened, b by the accession of Boyrak (G), king of the Naymâns. Temujin, who was assisted by the princes of his house, and his allies, had in his army four generals, called Palipankuli, or the four intrepids, named Mubuli (H), Porchi, Porokona, and Chilakona (I). Besides these, there was a stranger called Say-i, who was expert in the art of war; and being a fire-worshipper, was called Chapar (K).

Vang Khân's
inconstancy.

NEXT year Temujin joined Vang Khân, near the mountain Kau (L), where Jamuka and his allies had assembled their forces. But Jamuka, fearing the success of a battle, chose rather to render the Kara-it prince jealous of Temujin, by suggesting to him that he was not to be trusted. Vang Khân hereupon secretly decamped in the night, and retired first to the river Hafwi (M), and thence to Sali, between the Tula and Onon. They had scarce separated, when the Khân c of the Naymâns attacked several parties of the Kara-its, and plundered the habitations of that hord. On this Vang Khân dispatched couriers to Temujin, desiring the aid of his four intrepids; who, on their arrival, beat the Naymâns, and recovered the booty. This seasonable assistance begat a firmer union than ever between the two; and each promised a daughter in marriage to the other's son.

Ilako's envy.

MEAN time Ilako (N), Vang Khân's son, who had long envied Temujin's reputation, by the instigation of Jamuka (O), persuaded his father, ever wavering and distrustful, that the prince of the Mungls had betrayed him. In this belief he resolved to destroy Temujin by artifice: with which view he invited him to his camp, with his son Chuchi (or Juji), and the princess his daughter; under pretence of accomplishing the double marriage before agreed on. Temujin indeed d set forward; but returning again, sent an officer to put off the ceremony till another opportunity. Soon after, being informed of the whole plot, he sent to his allies, and took proper measures to prevent a surprize².

Plot against Temujin,

THE reason of Temujin's sudden return is not mentioned in the Chinese history; nor does Gaubil inform us from thence in what manner he came to know of the plot: but both are related by Abû'lghazi Khân (P). According to this author, Vang Khân, at the same time that he invited Temujin, under pretence of making a more strict alliance by the marriage, sent to tell Menglik Izka, Temujin's father-in-law, that, as nothing stood between him and the crown but his wife's son, he would come and help him to put that prince to death, and then divide his possessions between them. As Vang Khân was an intimate friend of Posuki, and owed great e obligations to him, Temujin, after receiving his ambassador with honour, set forward to go to his court: but meeting on the road with his father-in-law, who discovered the Grand Khân's proposal to him, he returned back, and dismissed the ambassador, with an apology to his master for putting off his visit for the present.

(O) According to De la Croix, in 1180, the year after Vang Khân's restoration by Temujin, Jemuka, by Sankun's mediation, obtained leave to return to court, where he persuaded Sankun that Temujin's design was to deprive him of the succession; and, for that end, corresponded with Tayyan, Khân of the Naymâns, Vang Khân's enemy, whose daughter he had married in his minority. That young Sankun hereupon, in 1180, wrote his father an account; who, with reluctance, at last, in Hej. 588. A. D. 1192. resolved to seize Temujin. De la Croix, hist. Geng. p. 34, & seq. also Abû'lghazi Khân, p. 70, 72.

(P) Who, p. 69, places this affair in or after the year 1201, agreeable to the Chinese annals: whereas De la Croix, in Hejrah 590. A. D. 1193, eight years earlier; which must be owing to the error in placing Temujin's birth so many years too early.

a FIVE or six days after the ambassador's departure, Badu and Kishlik, two brothers (Q), who kept the horses of one of Vang Khân's chief domestics, came and informed Temujin; that the Grand Khân, finding he had missed his point, was resolved to set out instantly, and surprize him next morning, before he could suspect any danger. They said they heard their master tell this to his wife, the day before, when they went to carry milk to his house; and, without delay, came to give him notice^b.

TEMUJIN was then, according to De la Croix, encamped at some distance from Karakorum, Temujin by Vang Khân's order; who had sent him from court, under pretence that his pretence was ^{stands} necessary in the army (R); but, in reality, to get him away from his own guards: for all the soldiers adored him for his brave actions in the field, and liberality to them. Although the Mogul prince could hardly believe what Badu and Kishlik had told him, he thanked them for their affection; and having consulted Karasbar, with the rest of his friends, it was resolved that they should lie in ambuscade. And as the slaves had assured him that he was to be seized in his tent, he ordered all things of value to be removed out of it; that all his domestics and officers ^{upon his guard.} should quit theirs; and that fires should be left burning all night in the camp (S). After which he marched, with all his troops, to possess himself of a narrow lane or pass, called Jermegab, two or three leagues distant.

THEY were scarce departed from the place, when Vang Khan's forces arrived, commanded by Sankûn and Jemûka (T). The prince rode full speed up to the illuminated tents, and, with his followers, shot a prodigious number of arrows at Temujin's; not doubting but the cries of the wounded would soon drive out him they wanted: but hearing no noise, they entered the tents; where, to their surprize, they found no-body. Hereupon, concluding that he had fled through fear and guilt, they followed him by the track of his troops, in great hurry and disorder.

MEAN time Temujin had posted himself at the foot of a mountain, in the narrow pass, which ^{Defeats Vang} was covered by a wood, with a brook before him: but when he saw the enemy advancing in ^{Khân.} disorder, although much inferior in force, having only 6000 men against 10,000 (U), he crossed the stream, and attacked them so hotly, that, after a very slight resistance, they fled before him. In this fight they lost a great number of soldiers and officers: prince Sankûn, who, with the rest, fled back to Karakorum, was wounded in the face with an arrow. This action happened d when Temujin was forty years of age (X), and had been eighteen years in Vang Khan's service^c.

ACCORDING to the Chinese history, when Vang Khân perceived that his plot was discovered, he openly attacked Temujin on all sides: but the Mogul prince got the advantage in four battles, in the last of which he fought with Vang Khân himself; and Ilako, being wounded with an arrow, retired out of the engagement. Temujin, after this, went and encamped at the lake Tong-ko, from whence he sent an officer to reproach Toli in the following manner: "When your uncle Kior (Y) defeated you at Hala-wben (Z), you lost your possessions. My father defeated Kior in Ho-si, and restored you. When your brother armed the Naymâns against you, and you were obliged to retire westward, I sent my troops, who beat the Markats, and e " hindered the Naymâns from defeating you. When you were reduced to so great misery, I gave you part of my flocks, and every thing else that I had; yet you sent me nothing of all the great plunder which you got from the Markats: altho' it was by the help of my officers that you became so rich, and my four generals brought you out of the plunge you were in. You know what I have done to prevent the ill designs which the confederate princes so often formed against you; will you, after so many obligations, attempt to destroy me in so base a manner?"

(U) According to Abû'lghazi Khân, he could get together no more than 2500 men; but Vang Khân had 12,000 with him.

(X) De la Croix, or his authors, place this action Hej. 590, A. D. 1193, when he was forty years old: but if Temujin was born in 1162, that battle will fall in 1202, near the time to which it is referred by Abû'lghazi Khân, and the Chinese authors.

(Y) Kior, according to prince Kantemir (Othm. hist. p. 305, note 48), signifies one who is blind, or has but one eye. This seems to be the Gurkhân of De la Croix and Abû'lghazi Khân. Perhaps he was blind. We will not say that the western historians have made Gur out of Kior.

All Tatory in motion.

THE rupture between Temujin and Vang Khân put most of the princes of Tatary in motion: a the first was joined by his brother-in-law Hasar-Whachin (A), prince of the Hongkirats (or Kongorats), and Putu, prince of I-ki-lye-tse; Queli, Vang Khân's brother; Chapar, and several other lords. After many consultations with his four generals, the army set forward, ; and being arrived at the river Panchuni, or Long-ku, whose water was very muddy, Hasar caused a horse to be killed. Then Temujin, taking up some of the water, drank it; and, invoking heaven, promised to share with his officers, during his life, both the sweet and the bitter; wishing, in case he ever should be so unhappy as to violate his oath, that he might become as the water which he drank. All his allies and officers did the same after him. This ceremony linked them exceedingly firm to his interest; and the families of those who drank the water on that occasion, valued themselves much on account of their fidelity: nor were they held in less esteem by b others. After this they marched to fight the enemy^d.

League of Panchuni.

The Kunkurats submit.

THESE matters are related with no small variation, and more circumstances, by the western historians. According to Abū'lghazi Khân, Temujin, after the above-mentioned battle, contenting himself with the honour of having beaten the enemy with such a handful of men, judged it convenient to retreat, before all their forces came down upon him; and shaping his course to Baljuna-Balak, where he had sent his family and effects for security the night before, found so little water there, that he was constrained to march towards the river Kallajui (B). As the tribe of Kunkurats (or Kongorats), at this time dwelt on that river, and had a chief named Turkili, who was a relation of Temujin, he sent an officer to acquaint him; that he intended to visit him, and should be glad to know if he was disposed to keep up the friendship which had long subsisted between them. Upon this method Turkili (who seems to be Hasar above-mentioned), c thought proper to submit to Temujin, and join him with all the Kunkurat tribe. From thence they marched towards the river Kollanuaer (C), on whose banks they stopped for some time. After this, he sent Arkayjum Behadr to upbraid Vang Khân with his ingratitude; who confessed the charge: yet as the war had been entered upon by the advice of his son, he sent the envoy to him for an answer: but Sungun, resolving to be revenged for his late hurt, would hear of no accommodation^e.

Sanghin inexorable.

DE LA CROIX relates this affair with a greater number of circumstances, and still farther variation from the Chinese history, as follows: Temujin, after the battle, retired with his troops to the lake Baljuta (D), of salt water, and in no great quantity; where his friends and the discontented d Kara-its resorting to him, he went and encamped on the frontiers of China, at the river Kakul (E), near a high mountain. From that place, after some stay, he marched for Mogulistan (F), where he was joyfully received by his subjects of Yeka-Mogul, and Niron Kayat. After this, in several kurulties, or assemblies, summoned to sound and animate the people (G), he proposed throwing off the yoke of the Kara-its: telling them they had now a fair opportunity; and, to induce them the sooner, pretended he was sent from God for that purpose. This speech had the desired effect: for applauding his enterprize, they promised to obey him. Hereupon he raised only 4500 soldiers more than he had before; and then sent to propose a league with the Khân of the Kongorats; son to his father-in-law, who was dead; also with the Khân of the Kurlas: but those of the Sû Moguls, or Tatars, refusing his offers, he constrained them by force of e arms. The Khâns of Merkat, seeing this, chose to do freely what they would otherwise have been compelled to; and several other tribes followed their example, although solicited to stand out by some Khâns, particularly those of Merkit; of whom Tuktâbey, Temujin's mortal enemy, was the most powerful.

AFTERWARDS, all the allied Khâns, by proclamation, forbade paying any more tribute to Vang Khân; who, on this, tried gentle means. But finding nothing would reclaim them, freed the Merkits from all tribute, and made large promises to Tuktâbey (H); hoping that this party of Moguls would ballance the power of the other. Mean time Temujin, seeming to be for peace, advised sending to propose an accommodation to Vang Khân, on condition that he should release them from all taxes, as he had done the Merkits^f.

a As they left the management of this affair to himself, he pitched on Arnijân to be the Temujin pro-ambassador; who, after reciting the obligations he owed to his master, and Vang Khân's ungenerous returns, intreated him to grant peace to the Moguls, and renew his friendship with his son-in-law. Vang Khân, having referred the affair to his council, for a while (†) put off the envoy; who, in the mean time, suffered a thousand indignities from the friends of Sanlun and Jemûka, which he loudly complained of: but meeting with no redress, sent an account of all to Temujin, who ordered him forthwith to return.

THE Grand Khân would willingly have made peace; but Sanlun, prejudiced by Jemûka's suggestions, opposed it with all his might; and carrying his father's answer himself, told the ambassador, "that the Moguls were to expect no peace, but by submitting absolutely to the Khân's will; and that, as for Temujin, he would never see him but with sword in hand (I)." The confederate Khâns, exasperated by so haughty a message, prepared for war. Here-
b upon Sanlun sent troops to ravage Mogulistân, but they were always repulsed with loss. The Grand Khân, enraged at this disgrace, levied troops all over his dominions, and drew above 20,000 men out of the provinces of Turkestan (K), Tendik and other parts, depending on the kingdom of Jelayr. Then sending to summon the Moguls to submit, he promised them all the satisfaction they required if they complied; but if not, threatened to treat them with the utmost rigour.

SOME Khâns were at first of opinion to accept of Vang Khân's proposals; but others, less timorous, nobly opposed them. At length, animated by Temujin's arguments, who produced letters from Karakorum, assuring them that the Grand Khân and his son had sworn the ruin of the confederates; it was resolved by the whole assembly, then met at Mankerule, to raise all the forces their tribes could furnish, and to carry on the war with the utmost vigour. Then declaring Temujin general, they presented him the Topûz, or truncheon of command: but he would not accept of it, but on condition that every man should punctually obey his orders: and that he should have full power to punish those who did not do their duty. Having granted all his demands, they returned to their respective countries, in order to get their troops ready to take the field.

TEMUJIN, the better to secure his friends in his interest, loaded with benefits those who had left Vang Khân, to follow him; and out of them chose all his general officers. But he in a singular manner rewarded the two slaves who gave him notice of that prince's designs against him: for besides the considerable presents which he made them, he declared them Terkâns (L), and assigned them a revenue for their maintenance; ordaining that these privileges should continue to them and their descendants to the seventh, some authors say to the ninth, generation. These acts of gratitude and liberality were of great service to him. When all the confederate troops were come together, contrary to the custom of the Moguls, who used to attack their enemies in one main body, he divided his army into two wings, and in the center placed his own troops, as a body of reserve. Then marching directly towards the Grand Khân's dominions, he found that his army was already in motion; but being incumbered with carriages, was slow in his march to the plain of Tangut, in the country of the Kara-its, where Temujin waited his coming.^a

To avoid the confusion which would arise from mixing discording relations together, and to leave our readers to chuse for themselves, we have laid before them separately, as we have hitherto done in the like cases, the accounts of the several authors in view; and shall make no remarks on them, farther than to observe, that neither those made use of by Abû'lghazi Khân, nor De la Croix, speak of the famous oath taken by Temujin and his confederates, at the river Panchuni, as mentioned by the Chinese historians, to whom we shall now return.

TEMUJIN having marched from that river in quest of the enemy, the two armies met between the Tula and Kerlon, or Kerûlon: and though that of Vang Khân was by far the most numerous, yet, after a bloody fight, Temujin gained a complete victory: after which the greater part of the vanquished troops joined his. Vang Khân had much ado to get off; and many of his own officers would have killed him. He was pursued, however, and taken by one of the parties sent after him; but the same day escaped, and retired into the territories of the Nay-

(K) This cannot be understood of the country of the Turks, in the west of Tatary; but there were some Turk-izb tribes who bordered westward on the territories of

*mân*s : where an officer of that country knowing him, caused the unfortunate prince to be slain. ^a
His son Ilabo (or Ilako Sanghin) retired first into the kingdom of Hya ; from whence being driven, and flying to the country of Kiu tse (M.), between Turfân and Kashgar, he was there killed by order of its prince ⁱ.

With this account the western historians agree, but relate the several matters more at large : they tell us, that prince Karashar, who commanded the van-guard of Temujin's army, began the battle by attacking that of the enemy, headed by Jemuka. The conflict was the more bloody, as the personal hatred betwixt those two generals was very great ; but Karashar was at length overthrown. Then Suida Behadr, at the head of the veteran troops, joined with the Sû Moguls, or Tatars, so vigorously charged Vang Khân's main body, that they gave back ; and Jemuka, who advanced to sustain them, was obliged also to give ground. At the same time the two wings of Temujin's army, commanded by the princes Hubba and Irka, attacked the two wings of the enemy, and for three hours both sides behaved with extraordinary bravery. The Kara-its fought with so much courage, that the victory seemed often ready to declare in their favour. But, in the end, the Moguls gained it (N) : for Temujin, when he saw it was time to advance with his corps-de reserve, where he was with the prince his son, fell on with such fury, that the Kara-its began to give back, and break their ranks on all sides ; nor could their Khân, and prince Sankun, rally them again ; so that they were at last obliged to follow their flying army, who fell in heaps before the pursuing enemy. This victory greatly enriched the Moguls, who, besides the plunder of the baggage, took abundance of prisoners, and a great number of horses ^k.

Vang Khân flies ; THIS day, which was fatal to Vang Khân, proved the most prosperous to Temujin, who was then forty years of age : for it put him into possession of the kingdom of the Kara-its, and all Karakitay. The vanquished not only lost 40,000 men, killed in the battle ; but the best troops, which remained went over to his enemy. As he was wounded in the fight, he was obliged to quit the command of his army, with design to retire to Karakorum ; but seeing himself pursued by a troop of Moguls, he fled for refuge to his enemy Tayyan Khân. This retreat was much wondered at, as that Khân hated him ; and there were in his court several great Naymân lords, whom he had ill treated : these lords did not fail to aggravate the injuries which he had done their country ; and even to allege, that his flying thither was only with a malicious design to ruin them, by drawing the victor's anger upon the *Naymân*s. ^c is put to death. TAYYAN KHAN, who was naturally ungenerous, readily gave ear to their advice, to put the Grand Khân to death. As soon as he was seized, they held a council, at which their prince took care not to be present ; imagining, by that means, to avoid the charge of having violated the law of nations and hospitality. He even pretended to be displeased at his enemy's death ; but when Vang Khân's head was presented him, he could not conceal his joy, nor refrain from insulting it with words full of scorn and spite ^l.

SOME authors relate this matter very differently. According to them, Vang Khân, being on the road to Tayyan Khân, he was met by Karimaju and Tamika, two Naymân chiefs ; who knowing there had always been animosity between him and their Khân, slew him with all his attendants : but, that, on presenting his head (O) to Tayyan Khân, he blamed the action, saying, that Vang Khân, having been a great prince, and venerable for his age, they had much better served for his guard, than been his executioners. Farther to honour the memory of so great a prince, he had his head incased in silver, and placed upon his own seat, with his face turned to the door ^m.

His dominions seized. TEMUJIN, when informed of Vang Khân's death, without loss of time continued to seize his dominions, as his right by conquest ; and Sankun being no-where to be found, he remained

(M) 'Tis hard to say what place this is : Abû'lghazi Khân says, that he retired to the city of Khatin (or Kotan), in Little Bukhâria, which belonged to Kalijohara, a lord of the tribe of Kallatz ; who, instead of protecting, put him to death. But according to De la Croix, after removing in disguise from one country to another, and thinking himself unsafe at Kashgar, he returned to Tibet, where he was put to death the same year for a spy.

(N) Marco Polo reports, that this prince ordered the astrologers and magicians to try his fate by wands : they split a piece of green cane in two ; then writing the name of Cingis on one, and of Umcan on the other, stuck them in the ground at some distance. After this they began to read their conjurations, during which the sticks approached ; and having fought, Umcan's remained undermost ; which presaged the victory to Cingis. This piece of juggle is still in use among the Turks, Africans, and other Mohammedan nations, which they call do the book ; whereof Thevenot gives an account in his travels to the Levant.

(O) Both De la Croix and Abû'lghazi Khân mention the circumstance of the tongue thrusting itself several times out of the mouth ; from whence some presages were drawn in favour of Temujin. The first says, this happened when the head was fresh ; the latter when it was dry.

a peaceable possessor of all the Kara-it territories. About the end of the year (P) he returned to his own country, where he was received with acclamations by all the Mogul Khâns, who came to pay their acknowledgements to him, for having delivered them from the tyranny of Vang Khân, whom they called the persecutor of their nation.

AFTER this, Hakembû, a brother of Vang Khân, came to offer his service to Temujin, and a Hakembû daughter in marriage. The Grand Khân received him favourably, gave him the employment ^{submits.} he desired, and accepted of his daughter with joy : at the same time telling him, " that he " owed him a kind treatment, in return for that which his brother had given to him in his " misfortunes. That although both Vang Khân and prince Sankûn had, without cause, con- " spired against his life, yet he never blamed them, but imputed all their persecutions to Jemû- b " ka ; nor had, on that score, one jot the less respect for their memories, than if they had " always continued his friends." Temujin fully designed to have married his daughter ; but perceiving that the captain of his guards, whom he much esteemed, was fallen in love with that princess, he gave her to him for a wife.

TAYYAN, Khân of the Naymans, one of the most considerable princes of Karakitay, was Jemûka alarmed and uneasy at his son-in-law's surprising fortune, notwithstanding the harmony there had ^{stirs up} been of long time between them. While his thoughts were employed on this subject, Jemûka, who had escaped out of the late battle, with the remains of Vang Khân's army, and most of the officers, arrived at his court ; and being known to be a man of great abilities, was very well received. As he had a subtil wit, and was skilled in all the arts of courts, he endeavoured to c stir up his jealousy against Temujin. He represented him as a man of unbounded ambition, ^{the other} who quarrelled with princes, for a pretence to invade their dominions ; as well as the most un- ^{Khâns.} grateful and perfidious : alleging that he contrived to deprive both Vang Khân and Sangun of their empire and lives, at the same time that they loaded him with their favours. Tayyân Khân knew this to be all calumny ; yet, urged more by his own fears than Jemûka's solicitations, he resolved to make war on Temujin. To this purpose he proposed a league with some other Khâns, whose interest it was to put a stop to the new emperor's growing greatness ; into which Tuktabey, and the other Merkit (Q) Khâns, the Khân of the Virats, and he of the Kerit, who was a relation of Vang Khân, presently entered : and Jemûka engaged for the whole tribe of Jajerats (or Joygherats) ⁿ.

d Among the rest, Tayyân Khân had likewise invited Alaku (or Alakus) to join with him and prince Jemûka, in order to curb the power of Temujin. This Alakus (R) was chief of the ^{The plot dis-} white Tata, who dwelt to the south-south-east of the mountain Altay. These Tata are differ- ^{covered.} ent from the Tatars : that name being sometimes given by the Chineses to the people in general inhabiting beyond the great wall ; and at other times to certain particular hords, where- of some were called Tata of the waters (S), situate almost due north of Korea ; others, White Tata, of whom we are speaking. Their chief, Alakus, was a descendant of the ancient Turkish princes (T) ; and having had a very great esteem for Temujin, he detained the messenger who came from Tayyân Khân, and gave the Mogul prince notice of the proposal. Hereupon his brother Kanchekin, pressing him to take speedy and vigorous measures, he mount- e ed his horse ; and, followed by his choicest soldiers, marched to the mountain Hang-hay (U), where Tayyân was incamped with his Naymâns ; who, though much more numerous, were defeated, and their Khân slain : on which many hords declared for the victor, who before Naymâns were restrained by fear. This happened in the year 1204 ; and next year Temujin began to ^{routed,} make incursions on the territories of the king of Hya ^o.

WITH regard to this new victory, the western Asiatic historians tell us, that Alakus, having sent Tayyân Khân's letter, containing all the particulars of the conspiracy, with the names of

But, according to Abû'lghazi Khân, p. 78. he was no more than forty years of age, when he gained the victory ; and was acknowledged by the Moguls for their Khân, in the country of Naumankura, where he then resided. He places this event in the Mogul year of the Hog, and of the Hejrah 599, which answers to the year of Christ 1202 ; at the end of which De la Croix also puts it : so that here the chronology of these two authors, which disagreed before, coincides, and thenceforward tallies pretty well. On this occasion it must be observed, that the authors followed by De la Croix, spin out to ten years length the affairs, which those made use of by Abû'lghazi Khân comprize within the compass of one year : for the former puts Vang Khân's plot to seize Temûjin in Hej. 588, the latter in 598, A. D. 1201, at which time the Khân says he was forty ; but De la Croix, that he had entered into his forty-eighth year. Whence this the before-mentioned Khâns, to Temujin; this latter convened a council, in which he would have his eldest son Juji, otherwise called Tusbi, to assist; and, the designs of the co-conspirators being made known, war was resolved on (X). The army assembled in the beginning of the year (Y): soon after which Temujin began his march; and, having passed his own frontiers, came at length to the river Altay (Z). Where no troops appearing, to dispute the passage, he was surprized; because he must have suffered much, had there been ever so few to have opposed him. Jemuka would have had Tayyan Khân go meet the enemy, and not wait their coming; for that in so doing he would prevent the Moguls from ravaging his country, and his own men from flying, by leading them far from home. But the Naymân Khân, instead of hearkening to his advice, flattered himself, that the farther the Moguls advanced, the less able they would be to fight; and, on the contrary, that his troops, being in full strength, would easily get the victory.

The Naymâns reduced.

The Merkits defeated.

WHILE he deluded himself with these vain imaginations, the Moguls, who were well supplied with provisions and forage, approached his camp. But when his officers brought him word how formidable the enemy was, he began to repent that he had not followed the counsel of Jemuka; who yet shewed not the least discontent, nor appeared less zealous for the cause^p. The two armies being in sight, and drawn up in order, prince Juji, and one of his uncles, Jujikar, began the fight, with great vigour: but Kashluk, Tayyan Khân's son, sustained the shock without giving ground. The two young princes, whom the love of glory equally inflamed, strove to signalize their skill and valour. The brave resistance which the van-guards made on both sides, by degrees engaged the other corps, and brought on a general battle. The fight lasted from sun-rise to sunset, with great obstinacy; but at last the Moguls, breaking the enemy's ranks, put them to flight, and made a terrible slaughter of them. Tayyan Khân, who performed all the parts of a good general, was, at the beginning of the battle, mortally wounded, and died soon after. Kushluk, his son (A), and Tukta Bey (B), fled, with all those who escaped the swords of the enemy. As for Jemûka, spurred on by his hatred to the Grand Khân, he signalized himself by a thousand heroic actions; but his rage made him venture too far, for he was taken prisoner; and after the battle, had his head struck off (C), as the principal cause of all the late distractions.

THE kingdom of the vanquished being thus subdued by Temujin, who brought under his obedience a vast tract of land, he returned to Karakorum; where, during the winter, his court was filled with ambassadors, who were sent by their masters, either to congratulate him, ask his protection, or submit to his government. Almost all the Kalmûk (D) tribes in the eastern parts put themselves under his protection: but, to the north, some Khâns, jealous of their liberty, and even some Mogul tribes, who were most out of his reach, refused to ask his favour. Tukta Beg, who was once a very powerful prince, could not bear to see the sudden grandeur of the new emperor, strove all he could to foment their hatred against him. On the other hand, Temujin, looking on him as his worst enemy, resolved to turn his arms against this Khân, who had so highly injured him. Accordingly, early in the spring (E), he set out at the head of a powerful army against the Merkits (or Markats).

TUKTA BEY was not insensible of the provocations he had given Temujin: yet his envy flattering him with hopes of success one time or other, he also made great preparations for war: and was joined by some Tanjuts (or Tayjuts), with prince Kushluk. But when he heard that Temujin approached his capital city Kashin, with an army, the like of which was never seen before in Mogulistan, his heart failed him; and he, with his eldest son, fled to Boyrak, Tayyan Khân's brother, to whom Kushluk, his nephew, had already retired for shelter^q.

(X) Abû'lghazi says, that the heads of tribes alleged, that they were not in a condition to undertake any thing, till their horses were recovered from the fatigue of the former expedition: but that Daritlay Oljigan, or Bulay, Jenghîz Khân's uncle by the father's side, offered to furnish the whole army with horses of his own; which obviated the objection.

(Y) De la Croix places this affair in Hej. 600, A. D. 1203.

(B) By Abû'lghazi Khân called Tokta Beghi, who fled to Boyrak, another Khân of the Naymans, and Tayyan's eldest brother.

(C) It appears not, from Abû'lghazi Khân, p. 86, that he was in this battle: but after Tayyan Khân's death he returned to his tribe: who, considering him as the cause of the war, carried him bound to Jenghîz Khân, their present sovereign, who caused him to be drawn limb from limb.

(D) By these seem to be meant the tribes who continued Pagans, or who were not Mohammedans, when our historians wrote. De Lisle, in his map to the history of Jenghîz Khân, places them to the north of the river Saghalian, or Amûr, in Karakatay, where Karakatay never was. But that map is full of gross errors.

(E) De la Croix places this in the spring of the year 1204.

a THE Grand Khân by this means found none in the field to oppose him. However, the city of Kashin (F) seemed resolved to stand a long siege: but although, at first, the inhabitants made a vigorous resistance, yet they were in a short time obliged to surrender; and Temûjin, having put all to the sword who had been in arms against him, razed the fortress. After this he took an oath of fidelity from all the tribe of Kashin, as well as others of the Merkit tribe; and all the Khâns whom he pardoned swore to obey him.

THE Grand Khân, having finished the conquest of Mogulistan, returned to his capital Karakorum; where, reflecting on the vast number of his acquisitions, he judged it proper to regulate his empire. With this view he called a general dyet, which he appointed to be held on the first day of spring the next year, when the sun entered Aries; to which were summoned

b all the great lords, both Mogul and Tatar. In the interim, to establish good order in the army, he divided his soldiers into several Tomâns, Hezarehs, Sedehs, and Dehehs; that is, bodies of ten thousand, one thousand, one hundred, and of ten men, with their respective officers, all subordinate to the generals who commanded the Tomâns; and these were to act under one of his own sons. He next turned his thoughts to making new laws; whereof he ordered a memorial to be drawn up, which he communicated to his privy-council, before he exposed it in the general dyet.

At length, the day of holding it being come, the princes of the blood and great lords met Temûjin in at the place appointed, dressed in white. Then the Grand Khân, clothed like the rest, sitting flashed, down on his throne, with his crown on his head, was complimented by the whole assembly, who wished the continuance of his health and prosperity. After this they confirmed the Mogul empire to him and his successors; adding all those kingdoms and nations which he had subdued, the descendants of whose vanquished Khâns were deprived of all right or title to any of them. When he had thanked them for these marks of love and respect, he declared his resolution to add to the antient laws some new ones, which he commanded that they should observe; and which we have inserted at the end of his reign.

AFTER this, in the tenth month of the year 1206, the princes of the family of Temûjin, the chiefs of hords, and generals of the army, assembled at the source of the river Onon. All the troops were divided into nine bodies, each of which having set up a pavilion, and displayed a standard, they acknowledged Temûjin for their sovereign, by this general cry, Chinghîz Kobân and acknowledged (G). After which he nominated Mûbûli and Porchi his two chief generals and prime ministers. From this event the Chinese history commences the empire of the Mongol (or Mongl) conqueror.

ABU'LGHASI KHAN, conformable to the Chinese historians, gives Temûjin the empire and name of Jenghîz Khân at the same time: but De la Croix places those events three years asunder; the first in 1202, just after the defeat and death of Vang Khân (in which year Abû'lghazi places both), the latter in 1205. They likewise relate them with different circumstances. With regard to Temûjin being acknowledged sovereign, Abû'lghazi Khân only says, that, in the year 599, called by the Moguls Tongûz, or the Hog, Jenghîz Khân being full forty years old, all the tribes of Moguls who had submitted to him, acknowledged him for their Khân in the country of Naumankura; where at that time he resided: on which occasion he gave his subjects a great feast. De la Croix enlarges much on the subject; and informs us, that Temûjin laid hold of the opportunity which his victory over Vang Khân afforded, to strengthen his interest with the people; who, gained by his eloquence, and the encomiums of his friends, resolved to chuse him their Grand Khân. The Khâns who were already in his interest importuned the other Khâns to yield to the request of Temûjin, whose presents were still more prevalent. Notice having been given to the absent Khâns, of what was agreed on in this great assembly, they repaired to Dilon Idak, in the province of Yeka Mogul (H), to perform the ceremony of his inauguration. There Temûjin, placing himself on a plain seat, set for him upon an eminence, harangued the people with his usual eloquence. After which they set him on a black felt carpet spread on the ground; and then the person who was appointed to give the people's suffrages, pronounced aloud their pleasure: first he told him, "that the authority or power, which was given him, came from God; who would not fail to prosper him, in case he governed his subjects well: but that, if he abused his power, he should render himself miserable, as the black felt, on which he sat, intimated to him." After this remonstrance, seven Khâns lifted him up with an air of ceremony, and bore him to a throne, which was prepared for him in the midst of the assembly. Then they proclaimed him emperor, with the title of Grand Khân, or Khaan, of all the Mogul tribes; and bowed their knees nine times before him, in token of obedience: after which the people performed the same ceremony, accompanied with acclamations of joy.

Moguls and Tatars.

THE new emperor promised on his part to govern them with as much justice as mercy, and defend them against all their enemies; always to procure their good and ease; to acquire glory for them, and make their names known to all the earth. As he had much reason to commend the Sû-Moguls, or Tatars, he declared, that, in reward of their services, he would join their name in his title, by styling himself Grand Khân of the Moguls and Tatars. When the ceremony was over, he distributed presents, both to great and small. He likewise made magnificent entertainments (I); which, according to the custom of those nations, continued for several days together. After this he dismissed the assembly.

Named Jenghiz Khân,

CONCERNING the name of Jenghiz Khân, Abû'lghazi Khân relates, that, during the ceremony of the inauguration, one Kokza (or Kokja), son of Menglish Izka (or Iika), by the first venter, father-in-law of Temûjin, came to him, and declared, "that he came from God to tell them, that from thenceforth he should take the name of Jenghiz (K), and order his subjects to call him Jenghiz Khân (L)." He foretold at the same time, that all his posterity should be Khâns, from generation to generation. This Kokza used to go bare-footed in winter, and very thin of cloaths: but as he suffered no injury by it in his health, as others would have done, they surnamed him the image of God. He gave out, that a white horse came to him, from time to time, which carried him up to heaven, where he conversed with the Deity*. Many believed that Kokja was set on by Temûjin to play this game. However that be, from this time forward he assumed the name of Jenghiz Khân; which we shall use for the future.

TOWARDS the end of the year 1205 a dyet was called, wherein the Mogul lords, who were in the secret of the pretended revelation, supported it so strongly, that the Moguls every-where gave credit to it; and already looked upon all the rest of the world as belonging, by divine right, to their Grand Khân. In this persuasion they breathed nothing but war; and even thought it a crime against heaven in those princes who resisted, in defence of their own dominions.

Boyrak Khân
defeated.

A. D. 1208.

BUT to return to the Chinese historians. The year 1206 was farther memorable for the intire defeat of Pologu (or Boyrak), brother of Tayyan, Khân of the Naymans. His son (M) Kushluk, and Toto (or Tokta Bey), lord of the Markits, retired to the river Irtish; where the former had still a powerful party: but, in 1208, Chinghiz Khân, having attacked them both, slew Toto with his own hand, and Kushluk fled into the kingdom of the Kitan (N). This victory put him in a condition to subdue the rest of the hords, which still stood out.

THE Persian historians say, that Boyrak being pursued, was taken, and put to death in the camp. After this, according to Abû'lghazi Khân, Kushluk and Tokta Beg retired to the river Irtish. But De la Croix, who quotes Mirkond, Kondamir, and Abû'lkayr, for his authorities, says, they retreated to Ardish, a fortress on the frontiers of their respective territories in the tribe of Merkit; where they designed to recruit their scattered forces, with some others who were left behind: but that, two years after (O), Jenghiz Khân, to prevent their having time to fortify themselves, marched against them in the midst of winter. Those princes, amazed at his sudden arrival, and not being strong enough to oppose him, retired under the fortresses of Ardish: but Jenghiz Khân, for all the rigour of the season, and difficult roads, soon appeared before

(I) At this feast, according to Abû'lghazi Khân, he assumed the name of Jenghiz Khân, at the instance of Kokza.

(K) Our royal author, explaining this name, says, that Jin, in the Mogul language, signifies great; and the termination ghiz making the superlative, Jenghiz is as much as to say the most great. De la Croix says, it signifies the Khân of Khâns.

(L) Abû'lfaraj, p. 281, says, he named him Jenghiz Khân Tubt Tangri; but Mirkond and others say, Tubt Tangri (or, as D'Herbelot, p. 379, writes it, Tubi Tangri) was the name of the prophet. De la Croix says, that Mirkond calls him Bar Tangri. This signifies the son of God, and seems designed for an explanation of Tubt Tangri; which perhaps, after all, signifies the image of God, and was Kokja's surname.

(M) The western Asiatic writers make him the son of Tayyan Khân, as has been observed in a former note.

(N) This must be understood of the Kitan settled in Little Bukhâria; of whom an account will be given hereafter. They were called Karakitayans, as coming originally from Karakitay.

(O) This is placed in the year 1207 by De la Croix.

- a that place, and forcing them to come to an engagement, quickly put them to flight. Tukta Kuchluk of Beg was killed in the action: but Kushluk, with some expert soldiers, escaped to Turkestan, ^{capet.} where he was kindly received by Gurkân (P), a very powerful monarch; who, touched with the misfortunes of this young prince, gave him his daughter in marriage ^a.

OUR readers cannot but be surprised at the great disagreement among the authors before Mistake made us, concerning the place of action; some making it to be at a river beyond the regions of the Moguls; others at a fortress at a great distance from thence, not far from the borders of Tangut and Kitay. Whether those who assert the latter as fact (for we take the concurrent testimony of Abû'lghazi Khân, and the Chinese historians, to be a proof that the Irtish was the scene of action), had it from the memoirs of Pulâd, or, finding only a bare name of a place, b supplied the want of a description by conjectures of their own, we will not venture absolutely to determine: but this latter looks to be the case, since Ardish and Irtish are written with the same Mogul or even Arabic characters: and De la Croix does not cite Fadlallah, who wrote his history from the memoirs and assistance of Pulâd; which seems to shew, that he says nothing to support the matter in question.

JENGHIZ KHAN, in his approach to the Irtish, passed near the habitations of the Joygherats Joygherats and Karliks: the first subject to Konaka Beghi; the latter to Arslân Khân; who, not being in ^{and Karliks} a condition to oppose his forces, both submitted to him, and conducted him to the camp of ^{submit.} Kuchluk and Tukta Beghi. In his return from this expedition he summoned Urûs Inâl, chief of the Kergbis: who likewise submitted, and sent him a shungar, or shonkar, for a present ^b.

C H A P. II.

Jenghîz Khân invades the kingdoms of Hya, Kitay, and Turkestan.

- a THE Grand Khân, having finished the conquest of Mogulistan, or that part of Tartary ^{Jenghîz Khân} inhabited by the various tribes of people comprehended under the name of Moguls and ^{invades} Tatars (extending from the borders of what is called Eastern Tartary to mount Altay in the west), began to think of invading the countries out of Tartary to the south: which, unlike the deserts he had already subdued, where no works of stone appeared to stop the progress of an enemy, were full of fortified cities, and strong places, as well as inhabitants. A consideration which at once presents to the reader's mind the difficulty of the enterprize, to people as yet, it may be presumed, unexperienced in the art of taking towns; and shews the genius of the prince who formed so grand a design.

- b JENGHIZ KHAN, who, as hath already been observed, had, in the year 1205, begun to ^{the empire of} make incursions upon the territories of the king (or emperor) of Hya; in 1209, attacked ^{Hya.} his dominions, with design to reduce them under his obedience: but, after forcing several posts ^{A.D. 1209.} near the great wall, Li-gan-tsoen, to save his capital, which Jenghîz Khân was preparing to attack, submitted to become his tributary, as will be related hereafter ^a.

ALMOST at the same time that prince conquered the countries of Krekir and Kashin; which last name, we are told, formerly the region of Tangut bore ^b: but where those countries lay is hard to determine. If any such there were, they must, by the circumstances of the history, have been in the neighbourhood of Kampion, either belonging to the province of Shen-si, or on its borders.

- c THE same year, Parchukorte Tikin (A), prince of Igûr, styled Idikût (B), slew the Kitan (C) ^{The Igûrs re-} officers, who were in his city; and, going in person, put himself under Jenghîz Khân's protection: who gave him a daughter in marriage ^c.

THE occasion of this proceeding is related by the Persian historians. They tell us, that a Idikût, Khan of the Oygûrs, or Igûrs, though a very powerful prince, was yet tributary to Gurkhân, king of Turkestan; who usually kept a deroga among the Oygûrs, to gather his tribute. Shuwakem, who at that time was his officer, exacting more than his master's due, the prince, on the people's complaints, spoke to him. But the other, instead of forbearing, threatened Idikût: who, to revenge the insult, had him assassinated; and, then to screen himself from Gurkhân's resentment, sent to ask the Grand Khan's protection. The envoys overtook Jenghîz Khân in the country of Tangut, where he was gone to reduce Shidaskû; who, with some other Khâns, had revolted from him: among the rest was the Khân of Krekir, whose territories he intirely ruined.

submit to Jenghîz Khân. THE Mogul emperor, glad of an opportunity to make Gurkhân uneasy, who was never a friend to him, and had now made an alliance with Kashluk, received the Oygûr (or Igûr) envoys much better than otherwise he would have done; and sent them back with two persons, to assure their Khân of his friendship and protection. Idikût, charmed with this generous behaviour, strait went himself, with costly presents, to offer his service to Jenghîz Khân: who received him with affection; and afterwards, to reward his fidelity, gave him one of his daughters in marriage. Gurkhân, on the news of Shuwakem's death, had threatened Idikût with fire and sword: but, hearing he was become the Grand Khân's son-in-law, he smothered his rage, for fear of drawing the Mogul forces against himself^d.

Their country described. IDIKÛT was of an antient family among the chiefs of the Igûr tribe, for above 500 years standing. The first possessed the country where the Selinga rises. In process of time they became masters of the country of Kau-chang, Igûr, or Kyau-chew, being the same with that of Turfân, in Little Bukhâria. The Chinese geographers agree, that the country of Igûr (Vigûr, or Oygûr) was situated where Turfân now stands; but seem unacquainted with its extent. The same authors farther inform us, that the Igûrs understood the Chinese characters, and had the books of Kon-fû-tse, or Konfusius: that they honoured the spirit of heaven, had many Bonzas among them, and followed the Chinese kalendar. The chief city, where Idikût resided, was called Ho-chew; the ruins of which still remain, seven or eight leagues to the east of Turfân^e. To the north of this last city lay Bishbâlig, which all the oriental writers make the capital of the Igûrs; whose territories, according to Abû'lghazi Khân, extended to the Irish: for they were divided into three branches; some living in towns, others in the fields^f.

The Kitân empire. JENGHIZ KHAN, being now in peace with all his neighbours, and strengthened by the accession of so many princes, who either submitted to, or joined in league with him, resolved to shake off the yoke of the Kin; to whom at this time the Moguls were tributary (D), as they had been before to the Kitân. Sometime before the Mungls (E) and other hords of Tatary had acknowledged that prince for their sovereign; Tay-bo, emperor of the Kin, sent Yong-tsi, a prince of the blood, to the city of Tsing-chew (now called Khûkkû-hotun^g), to receive from them the annual tribute. On this occasion Yong-tsi made slight of Temûjîn, and advised framing some pretence to put him to death. But the emperor rejected the proposal; which coming to Temûjîn's ears, he resolved to be revenged on the author of it.

refuses to pay tribute. WANG-YEN-KING, emperor of the Kin, dying in the tenth month, Yong-tsi, who succeeded him, sent, the following year (1210), an officer to order Jenghîz Khân to pay the tribute. That prince demanded, whom he came from? and being told, from Yong-tsi, then emperor; he absolutely refused; saying, he was himself a sovereign, and would never acknowledge Yong-tsi for his master. It is said, added the Khân, by way of sneer, that the Chinese ought to have the son of heaven for their master; but, at present, they know not how to chuse a man. Having spoken these words, he mounted his horse, and rode towards the north. Yong-tsi was strangely nettled at these cutting expressions. Jenghîz Khân had other reasons to be displeased with the Kin. Among the rest, Ching-pu-bay, a prince of his house, had been slain by them, in 1206; to revenge which injury (F) the Mungls waited for an opportunity: besides, their Khân was told, Yong-tsi intended to have him seized. These things determined him to go and encamp along the Kerulon; where he assembled a formidable army, composed of veteto the east of Kashgar, then subject to Gurkhân, king of Turkestan and the Kitân; whose country was from them called Karakitay.

(D) In the tenth month of the year 1147, the emperor of the Kin, unable to subdue the Mongols, was obliged to make peace with them. Their chief was then Aolopükiliay, and called himself emperor. This shews, that since then the power of the Mongols had been weakened: for the history of Jenghîz Khân says positively, that, in his time, they paid tribute to the

Kin. Gaubil. hist. De Gentchis, p. 20. There is no such prince as Aolopükiliay among the predecessors of Jenghîz Khân, as given by Abû'lghazi Khân, and other oriental authors.

(E) They are always called Mongu in the Chinese history; which shews, that the word Mogul had obtained only in the west of Asia.

a ran troops. From thence he ordered Chepe Noyân (G), and Yelu Kobay (H), to march towards the borders of Shan-si and Pe-che-li: who, having observed the country, and made some spoils, returned to the main army ^h. With a great army

THE Kin had considerable forces at Lyau-tong, which was the bulwark of their empire. In the same province, and countries depending on it, there still remained also a great number of Ki-tân, and many princes of the family of the Lyau, whom they had deprived of the empire. But as Tong-tsi grew jealous of them since the rise of Jenghîz Khân, he commanded double the number of Nyu-che (or Kin) families to be put in all places where they were settled, in order to watch their motions. After this precaution, which gave a general discontent to the Kitân, the emperor caused notice to be given every-where, that the Mungls intended to attack him, raised powerful armies, and posted troops in all the fortified places on both sides of the great wall, from the Whang-bo to Lyau-tong.

IN the spring, and first month of the year 1211, Arslân, prince of the *Karluk*s (I) in the west, came with a body of troops, to offer his service to Jenghîz Khân; and Idikût, prince of Kin, invades the Igûr, to consult the preservation of his country. The army began its march southwards, the beginning of the second month: on which Tong-tsi sent to make proposals of peace (K); but they were rejected. Chepe with the choicest of the troops forced the posts of the great wall (L), to the north-west and north-east of Tay-tong-fû (M), whilst others seized the fortresses without the barrier. Mibûli took the posts about Pau-gan, and Yen-king, in Pe-che-li. Chapar surprised the garrison of Ku-yang-quan (N), an important place: and Jenghîz Khân defeated a considerable body of the Kin, near Swen wha fû; which city he took, with the fortresses about Tay-tong-fû, then called Si-king, or the western court, all in Shan-si: in short, the Mungls made incursions as far as the capital.

HASAR WHA-CHEN, prince of the Honkirats (or Kunkurats), Jenghîz Khân's brother-in-law, who had been sent to the frontiers of Lyau-tong (O), to sound the pulses of the Kitân lords, and attack the Kin on that side; found the prince Yelu Lyew-ko at the head of an hundred thousand men, ready to declare in favour of his master. In testimony of his sincerity, that prince, ascending the mountain Kin (P), sacrificed a white horse and black ox, broke an arrow, and made an oath to be faithful to Jenghîz Khân. Lyew-ko, who was of the royal family of the Lyau, a good officer, and had many vassals, provoked at the indignities which the Kitân daily received from the Kin, took arms, as soon as he heard that the Mungls intended to make war upon them. The Khân, to prevent Lyew-ko from being drawn off again, made him very advantageous offers, and conferred on him the title of king (Q); furnishing Wha-chen and Chepe with good troops, to assist him. Lyew-ko ordered himself to be proclaimed king wherever he came; over which he obtained a signal victory. Hereupon many Kitân lords shook off their yoke, and several cities submitted to him. After which he reduced Tong-king (R), or Lyau-yang, a city of Lyau-tong. This great success swelled the reputation of the new Kitân king; and made the Kin raise numerous forces, to save that provinceⁱ.

(G) He was one of the Moguls best generals. The title of Noyan (so also it is written in Abû'lghazi Khân's history, but Nervian, by De la Croix) is given only to princes of the reigning family, sons-in-law of *Khân*s, or great lords, who are chief of hords. Gaubil.

(H) Yelu Kobay (written also Yelu Kolay, perhaps by mistake) was a great mandarin, or officer, of the Kin emperor; who, being sent to settle some affairs with Jenghîz Khân, was so charmed with him, that he entered into his service. He was a prince of the imperial family of the Lyau, whose name was Yelu. Gaubil.

(I) So we explain Arslân, prince of A-la-lu; which last word Gaubil was at a loss about. This Arslân, Khân of the *Karluk*s, or *Karlik*s, is mentioned by Abû'lghazi Khân and De la Croix, as repairing to Jenghîz Khân about the same time with Idikût.

(K) Abû'lghazi Khân relates, that Jenghîz Khân sent to summon Altûn Khân to submit; and that this prince, falling into a passion, said to the ambassador, You believe, perhaps, you have to do with one of your petty Turkish tribes. Abû'lgh. hist. Turks, &c. p. 89. Or, as De la Croix has it, Your master treats me as if he thought me a Turk, or a Mogul. Hist. Gengh. p. 100.

(L) Both Abû'lghazi Khân, p. 44, and De la Croix, p. 101, say, that Alakûs, Khân of the Ungûts, or Ankût, opened one of the great gates of the wall, of which he had the custody, to Jenghîz Khân.

(N) A fortress nine leagues north-north-east of Pe-king; and Yen-king is three or four north of Ku-yang-quan. Gaubil.

(O) De la Croix, p. 100, says, Jenghîz Khân sent three of his sons to attack Kurje, which he calls Korea: but it must be Lyau-tong, as well from the circumstances of the history, as the description of it, which he gives from Fadlallah; viz. that it was situate to the north of China, and had the sea on the east: that the country contained about 700,000 inhabitants; and had been always governed by its own kings, who were sometimes masters of China (rather Kitay); which, in its turn, was master of it. That Lyau-tong is Kurje, appears further, from what is said, p. 108, that Mukli Goyank (who is Mubuli) was sent to Kurje, with a body of troops, to hinder the forces of that country to join Altûn Khân.

(P) According to the Chinese geographers, 45 or 50 leagues north of Mûgden, capital of Lyau-tong. Gaubil.

(Q) That is, Khân, or Vang, we presume of Lyau-tong.

(R) That is, the eastern court, lat. 41° 20' long. 6° 56' east of Pe-king. In the map of the Jesuits it is placed on the north side of the river Taksa, which falls into the Lyau; and is a distinct town from Lyau-yang, which lies three miles to the south, and was then a great city.

Jenghiz Khân ^{wounded:} IN 1212, Jenghiz Khân subdued Whan-chew (S); and Milili, the fortresses without the great wall, near the Whang-bo. When the Mungls had reduced all the strong places between that city and the river, they prepared to besiege Tay-tong-fü. To prevent them, Tong-tsi sent Hüjakü, or Ki-shelye, and Wan-yen at the head of 300,000 men. The Khân, by advice of Milili, marched to meet this army, which was encamped near the mountain Tebü (T), where they were attacked by the Mungls; who, notwithstanding the superiority of their numbers, defeated them. In autumn he invested Tay-tong-fü; where, although the governor Hüjakü fled, he met with more resistance than he expected. At last, having in a vigorous attack lost many men, and been dangerously wounded by an arrow, he raised the siege, and retired into Tatary: after which the Kin retook Pau-gan, Swen-wba-fü, and even Kü-yang-quan.

^{progress in Ki-tay.} JENGHIZ KHAN, who, in this disgrace, was comforted by the news he received from Liau-tong, being cured of his wound, re-entered China in 1213; recovered Swen-wba-fü and Pau-gan; defeated an army of the Kin, after a bloody battle (U), near Wbay-lay (X); and one of his generals took Ki-pe-kew (Y). After this battle, the Khân, not able to enter Pe-che-li by Ku-yang-quan, forced the fortrels of Tse-kin-quan, and took I-chew and Cho-chew (Z). However, Chepe, in his return from Liau-tong, passed on to Nan-kew (a place of importance), and took Kü-yang-quan, which is not far distant. On the other side, in the seventh month, a great battle was fought at the mountain U-wbey-lin, near Quan-chang-byen (A); wherein the Kin were overthrown, with a great slaughter.

^{The emperor murdered} IN the eighth month, Hüjakü, generalissimo of the Kin troops, who had been cashiered in 1212, for bad services, and restored, seized on the person of Tong-tsi; and, soon after, caused him to be murdered. The true cause of the successes which attended the Mungls was, that general's hatred to those who were the occasion of his disgrace (the year before); which lasted two months. After being replaced, he was ordered to encamp to the north of the court: but instead of endeavouring to stop the enemies progress, minded nothing but hunting, nor regarded the emperor's order. At length he marched with his army to the imperial city, under pretence of preventing a conspiracy which he had discovered. Being arrived before it, he sent horsemen to the palace, to cry aloud, that the Mungls were at the city gates: he next put to death such as he suspected; and, having disposed his troops in different quarters, the officers both civil and military assisted him; not imagining that he had a design to dethrone their prince: but as soon as he had secured the gates of the city, he seized the palace, and confined the emperor; then deposed and put him to death. After this, finding he could not get himself declared emperor, he enthroned San, a prince of the blood. These distractions determined Jenghiz Khân to besiege the imperial city. Chepe, after taking Ku-yang-quan, set forward with 50,000 chosen horse to join the army. But the van-guard, coming to the river Tsau (B), and, endeavouring to pass the bridge, was intirely defeated by Hüjakü; who was carried in a car, being hurt in the foot. Next day, being hindered from marching himself, by his wound opening, he ordered Chu-bu-kau-ki to advance with 5000 troops, to oppose the enemy; but that general coming too late, Hüjakü would have put him to death; which the emperor, knowing him to be a good officer, would not suffer. Then Hüjakü said to him, if you beat the enemy, I will spare you; if you are defeated, you shall die. Kau-ki marched against the enemy; but a north wind arising, which blew the sand into his soldiers eyes, he was obliged to re-enter the city with loss. As he took it for granted, that Hüjakü would put him to death, he ran with his troops to that general's palace: who, being apprized of his design, got on his garden-wall; but, falling, broke his leg. The soldiers having killed him on the spot, Kau-ki carried his head to the gate of the imperial palace, and surrendered himself to the mandarins, in order to be condemned to death: but the emperor published an edict, wherein he charged Hüjakü with several crimes, and commended Kau-ki; whom he made generalissimo in his room^k.

a LI-GAN-TSVEN, king of Hya, finding himself pressed by the Mungls, demanded aid of the Kin ^{The Kin land}; who refused it, as having occasion themselves for more troops than they had. Here-^{pressed} upon the Hya, after they had made a treaty with the Mungls, before-mentioned, in 1210, declared war against the Kin; with whom they had been at peace for fourscore years, and attacked Kya-chew (C), in Shen-fi. The same year, Li-gan-tswen dying, Li-tsun-hyu, his relation, succeeded him. This prince, more successful than his predecessor, reduced King-chew (D), at the end of 1213.

b SINCE the time Jenghiz Khân began to invade the Kin empire, many Chinese officers, who had been taken prisoners, entered into his service. These he shewed a great esteem for, and gave them parties of their own nation to command. As he now resolved to attack the enemy on every side, he mixed the Chinese and Tatarian troops together, forming out of them four armies. One he ordered to incamp to the north of Yen-king, the imperial city: another to ravage the country to the north and east, as far as Lyau-tong: the third, under three of his sons, was to destroy all to the south and south-west as far as the Whang-ho; while he himself, with Tuley, his fourth son, marched through Pe-che-li to Tsi-nan-fû, the capital of Shan-tong.

c THE Kin, for their defence, sent their best troops to guard the difficult passages of rivers and mountains; obliging all people fit to bear arms to retire into the cities. The Khân, being informed of this, ordered his generals to take all the old men, women, and children, out of the villages and unfortified towns, and set them in the front of the army. The people from the walls, on hearing the voice of their friends and relations, refused to defend themselves, to their destruction. The desolation was general throughout Shan-fi, that part of Ho-nan, to the north of the Whang-ho, Pe-che-li, and Shan-tong. The Mungls plundered and destroyed more than ninety cities; reduced to ashes an infinite number of towns and villages; took all the gold, silver, and silk, they met with; and massacred thousands of useless people: carrying into slavery a vast number of young women and children. The spoil which they took in cattle was inestimable; and in all those spacious countries there were but ten cities which the Mungls could not subdue: among which in Pe-che-li were Yen-king, the imperial city, Tong-chew, Ching-ting-fû, and Tay-ming-fû. All this devastation happened in the year 1213. ^{Great devastation.}

d IN 1214, Jenghiz Khân, being returned from Shan-tong, assembled all his troops in one body, and invested Yen-king, in the fourth month; pitching his camp on the north side. His generals pressed him, without delay, to scale the walls, and ruin the city: but the Khân, having had other views in his mind, instead of following their counsel, sent an officer to tell the Kin emperor, that his master was willing to return into Tatary: however, that, to appease the anger of the Mungl troops, it was necessary to make them considerable presents; adding, that he ought to consider Yen-king was almost the only place which remained in his possession to the north of the Whang-ho. One of the Kin ministers, provoked at this message, proposed to march out and fight the army of Ta-che (E): saying, that many of the Mungl soldiers were sick; and that they were not in a condition to withstand a vigorous attack¹. ^{The capital invested. A. D. 1214.}

e ANOTHER minister was against this advice: saying, that they had every thing to fear, if they lost a battle; and but little to expect from a victory. He added, "that the troops in the city had nothing in view but to quit it, as most of them had families of their own: that the best measure therefore was to accept of peace; and when the Mungls were retired, they should be better able to consult what was proper to be done." The emperor, approving this counsel, sent a lord to the Mungl camp, to desire a peace; wherein it was stipulated, that a daughter (F) of the late emperor Yong-tsi should be given to Jenghiz Khân; with 500 young boys, and as many girls, 3,000 horses, silk, and a great sum of money. As soon as the conditions were performed, the Khân raised the siege; and, departing by the way of Ku-yong-quan, commanded all the young children, whom he had taken in the four provinces of Shan-tong, Ho-nan, Pe-che-li, and Shan-fi, to be massacred. ^{Buy a peace.}

f AFTER the retreat of the Mungls, the emperor San declared to his council, that he resolved to remove his court to Pyen-lyang (G), in Ho-nan. Tu-shi-ni, a wise and faithful minister, represented, that, in such case, the northern provinces would be lost. He observed, that Lyau-tong being very strong by situation, it was easy to maintain themselves there: that no more was to be done, than to make new levies, fortify the court, fill the garrison, and recruit the troops of that province. Most of the grandees were of his opinion: but the emperor said, ^{The emperor removes the court.}

that as the treasury was exhausted, the troops weakened, and the cities round the capital destroyed, Yen-king was no place of security for him. Accordingly he departed, with his family and some troops; leaving the prince, who was to be his successor, to encourage the inhabitants.

Its bad consequence.

THE Kin monarch had soon occasion to repent this bad step. Being arrived at Lyang-byang, (a city five leagues south-west of Pe-king) he demanded back from his troops their horses and cuirasses. The major part of them, refusing to obey, slew their general, and chose three others in his stead: after which they returned, and seized the bridge of Li-kew (H). From thence Kanta, one of their generals, sent a courier to Jengbiz Khân, who was then encamped at the city Whan-chew, in Tatary, to offer himself and his troops at his service. As soon as that prince was apprised of the emperor's retreat, he was much incensed; complaining that he had been deceived by the Kin, and thereupon resolved to re-enter China. With this view he sent his general Mingan, with a great force, to join Kinta, and besiege Yen-king (I). When this news reached the emperor, he ordered his son to leave that city, and repair to Pyen-lyang. This also was against the advice of his ministers, supported by the example of Ming-whang, or Hwun-tsung, a Chinese emperor of the Tang race (K). The departure of the prince discouraged the garrison, not only of Yen-king, but of other strong places^m.

State of China.

THE rapid conquest of the Mungls, and retreat of the Kin emperor, gave great uneasiness to the Chinese monarchs of the Song race; who were then masters of the southern provinces of China, called by some authors Manji, viz. Quan-tong, and the isle of Hay-nan, Quang-si, Yun-nan, Se-chwen, Quey-chew, Hu-quang, Kyang-si, Che-kyang, Fo-kyen, and almost all Kyang-nan, where the Kin had a few cities. In Shen-si they possessed the country of Hang-chong-fu, besides some places in the district of Kong-chang-fu, and on the borders of Se-chwen. The great wars which they had carried on against the Kin, had forced them to make a shameful peace, whereby they were to pay a yearly tribute (L) in silk and silver. It was resolved therefore, at this juncture, to refuse tendering the tribute any longer: but the proposals made by the king of Hya, to join forces against the Kin, were rejected.

Conquests in Lyau-tong.

THE Kin possessed in Lyau-tong an army of 100,000 men, who had retaken many places, subdued the preceding years by king Lyew-ko; and, among the rest, Lyau-yang: but in the ninth month, Mubuli, followed by the general Wir, of the hord of Shan-tsu, entered that province, in order to succour the prince, and cut off the communication with Pe-che-li, which was effected. The huge army of the Kin, being filled with traitors, dispersed; and the inferior officers killed their general. King Lyew-ko recovered Lyau-yang; and Pe-king, now called Mugden, surrendered to Mubuli. This general put to the sword a great number of submitting soldiers, under pretence that they came in too late: but stopped the slaughter, on being told, that such a conduct would hinder many other places from yielding. Towards the end of the year, the city of Tong-chew (M), an important post, to the east of Yen-king, surrendered to the Mungls. The emperor of the Kin having been obliged to lay taxes on the people, it furnished several lords with a pretence, some to throw off their dependence, and others to submit to the Mungls.

Lyew-ko's fidelity.

IN 1215 many of the Kitân advised Lyew-ko to be declared emperor, independent of the Mungls: but that prince rejected the proposal, as contrary to the oath which he had taken, to be Jengbiz Khân's subject. At the same time he sent his son Sye-tu to the Khân, with ninety waggons loaded with rich presents (N); and a list of the families which had submitted to him, amounting in all to 600,000. Towards the end of the year he came in person, to do homage to the Mungl sovereign. Mean time the emperor of the Kin, being informed of the distress Yen-king was in, sent a great quantity of provisions, with forces for its relief: but the first convoy, under the escort of an inexperienced general, arriving at Pachew (O) his army was there

In 736, Gan-lo-shan rebelling, 150,000 men from Turkestan, and the Mohammedan countries, came to aid the empire. The particulars of this great revolution are one of the most curious parts of the Chinese annals; and give considerable light into the history and geography of the countries between Shen-si and the Caspian sea. It appears that, in those times, a great number of Arab and Persian ves-a defeated; on the news whereof the other generals fled, and left all the provisions a prey to the enemy^a.

THE two generals, who commanded in Yen-king, were Wan-yen Chang-whey (P) and Mo-nyen Chin-chong; the former of whom, out of all hope of succours, or withstanding the enemy,^{death.} proposed to the latter to die for their country. Mo-nyen, on whom the troops immediately depended, refusing, Chang-whey retired in a rage, and told a Mandarin his resolution. The first day of the fifth month he wrote a petition to the emperor, wherein he touched on matters of government; and mentioned the crimes of a bad minister, whom his master made use of, meaning Kau-ki, who slew Hijakû. He finished, by confessing himself guilty of death, for not being able to save the imperial city (Q). This done, with a composed air, he called together all his domestics, and divided all his effects among them: then ordering a cup of poison to be filled, he wrote a few words. After which, commanding the Mandarin who was with him to leave the room, he drank it off; and died before his friend was gotten many paces from the house.

THE same evening the emperor's wives, knowing that Mo-nyen was preparing to leave the city, came to acquaint him, that they would go out along with him. He seemed pleased^{The capital taken.} with the proposal; but said he would go before, to shew them the way. The ladies, confiding in his promise, returned to the palace: but Mo-nyen, not caring to be troubled with their company, marched off, and left them behind. On that general's departure, the Mungl army entering the city, a great number of the inhabitants and Mandarins perished in the disorder which ensued. A troop of soldiers set fire to the palace, which continued burning for a whole month. Jenghiz Khân, who was then at Whan-chew, in Tatary, sent to compliment the general Min-gan on the occasion; ordering him to dispatch into Tatary the silks, gold, and silver, found in the imperial treasury. Mo-nyen arriving at Pau-ting-fû, in Pe-che-li, told those who accompanied him, that they should never have gotten thither, had he undertaken to conduct the ladies of the palace. When he came to Pyon-lyang, the emperor (R), though extremely troubled at the loss of his capital city, did not speak to him about it, and gave him a very considerable employment: but shortly after he was put to death, for having been engaged, as it was said, in dangerous designs. On the other hand, his majesty, having read Chang-whey's petition, declared him Vang, or Wang, that is, king.

d MIN-GAN, who was ordered to search for a Mandarin of the royal race of the Lyau, or Ho-nan in-Kitân, called Telu-chû-tsay (S), having found him conducted him to Jenghiz Khân; who, at the first interview, conceived a high esteem for this great man, and let him at the head of his affairs. San-kepa, being sent with 10,000 horse to besiege Ton-quan (T), a famous pass in the mountains, between Shen-si and Ho-nan, marched through the territories of the king of Hya; who still continued the war against the Kin, and this year wrested from them the city of Lin-tau-fû (U). He took his route by Si-gan-fû (the capital of Shen-si); but failing in his attempt on Ton-quan, marched to Yû-chew, in Ho-nan, through cross roads, full of deep torrents, over which they made bridges with their pikes and halberds. At last arriving, after many difficulties, in sight of Pyen-lyang (X), capital of that province, the Kin troops sallied, and made him retire to Shen-chew (Y), on the Whang-ho; which being frozen, San-ke-pa crossed it, and escaped. The emperor San, after this, sent to desire peace of Jenghiz Khân; who proposed such hard conditions, that he could not accept of them. Mean time Mûbûli and Wir, in Lyau-tong, dispersed, with much address and courage, several parties which endeavoured to shake off the Mungl yoke^o.

In 1216 the Mungls took their measures so right, that Ton-quan was forced in the tenth month: after which they posted themselves between the city Yû-chew and the mountain Song (Z). The court being greatly alarmed at this, one of the censors of the empire represented to his Kin majesty, that Pyen-lyang would be reduced in the same manner as Yen-king was, unless he took the field with the garrison, which was very numerous; seized the post of Ton-quan, fortified the frontiers of Shen-si, and passages of the Whang-ho: unless also he hindered the Mungls from gaining footing in Ho-nan, and making inroads thither, by which they ruined the inhabitants. On the contrary, the minister Cbu-hû Kau-ki persuaded the emperor to think only of securing the capital: which conduct, says the history, ruined the dominion of the Kin.

MUHULI, after the parts of Lyau-tong towards Lyau-yang (A) had been conquered, ordered, Chong-ping, one of the generals in that province, to march into China, and join the other troops: but being informed that he was a traitor, had him put to death; in the end of the year 1215. Hereupon Chang-chi, to revenge his brother's death, revolted, and took King-chew (B); with most of the other cities of the province, included between the great wall of China, the river Lyau (C), the wooden palisade (D), and the sea. After this he caused himself to be proclaimed king; and, in 1216, declared for the Kim, who gave him the command of their troops in Lyau-tong. Mûhûli, who had retaken Quang-ning-byen (E) the preceding year, at the end of this besieged King-chew (F). Chang-chi had good troops; and the place being very strong, Mûhûli ordered Wir to go and attack an important post on a neighbouring mountain, while another general should be ready to cut off the troops detached from the city to succour it. Wir having obeyed his orders, Chang-chi sallied out with part of the garrison: hereupon Monku pûwba placing himself between that post and the city, gave notice thereof to Mûhûli, who lay towards Quang-ning. This general, marching all night, by break of day came up and attacked Chang-chi on one side, while Monkû did the same on the other; so that he was entirely defeated. Yet escaping back to the city, he defended it gallantly for more than a month; when an officer of the garrison seized and delivered him to the Mungls: who cut off his head, and took possession of the place.

THE Mungls, after a great struggle to get footing in Ho-nan, at last abandoned that province; and passing the Whang-ho, under the conduct of Sa-me-ho (G), surnamed Patûrû, or the courageous, marched towards Ping-yang-fû, in Sben-si: but Su-ting, who commanded the troops there, having gathered those from the dependent places, met and defeated them.

THIS is the account of Jenghîz Khân's first expedition into Kitay, transmitted to us from the Chinese historians. We shall now subjoin a view of that given by the western Asiatics, that our readers may the better compare them, and judge of their merit.

THESE authors tell us, that Jenghîz Khân being ready to enter Kitay, in 1210, divided his army into two bodies; and that, keeping the most considerable with himself, he gave the command of the other to three of his sons, Fuji, Jagatay, and Oktay: that these princes marched through the Kalmûks country (H), towards Kurje; which being unprovided with troops, who were gone to join Altûn Khân, they made terrible devastations in the towns, and carried off all the cattle: that Jenghîz Khân, marching by the Til, a river of Karakitay, entered Kitay, at the great gate in the wall of China, which Alakûs, Khân of Ankût, to whose care it was committed, opened to him: that he spared all the cities which made no resistance; but plundered those which opposed him: that Altûn Khân, with his united forces, hastening to meet Jenghîz Khân, a battle was fought, in which the former lost 30,000 men, and the latter more: that Jenghîz Khân retired with all his spoils into Pe-che-li; and Altûn Khân, fearing he might besiege Pe-king, sent to propose a peace, with his daughter Kubbû Khatûn in marriage, which was accepted: that Jenghîz Khân being returned to his dominions, in 1211, set out, accompanied with his son Fuji, to conquer (I) Kapchâk (or Kapjâk), the most western and considerable part of Tatary; judging he had a right, by conquest, to several tribes, who inhabited the country, as having been subject to Vang Khân: that as soon as he appeared, those tribes, with others inhabiting the country of Jetab, or the Getes (K), in Kapchâk, on the borders of Mogulistân, submitted to him, which all together formed a vast army: that, leaving one half of his forces with Fuji, who defeated the Komâns, Walâks, Bulgarians, and Hungarians, he, with the other half, returned to Karakorom: that there, being joined by Arslân, Khân of the Karlûks, and Idikût, Khân of the Tugûrs (or Igûrs), he resolved to invade Kitay, to revenge some threats uttered by Altûn Khân; but more by the persuasion of a Khân of Karakitay (L), who, provoked at the ravages made by Altûn Khân in that country,

(H) De la Croix tells us, on this occasion, that these Kalmuks, who had submitted to Jenghîz Khân, were a nation situate on the borders of Karakitay to the eastward; and not to be confounded with the Kalmuks who dwell in the west, towards the Wolga. But these seem to be an imaginary nation of Kalmuks, which name came in use long after. See before, p. 278, note (D).

(I) Abûlghazi Khân mentions nothing of this Kipjâk expedition: but, conformable to the Chinese historians, says, that after the peace, he left his son in Pe-king, and retired to Nan-king.

(K) This country, placed here in Kipjâk, is frequently mentioned by the oriental historians, and cited by D'Herbelot, and in Sharifoddin's history of Timûr Bek; but they place it to the east of Kipjâk, between it and Mogulistân. Nay, Kâshgar seems to be included in it; as Kamroddin, Khân of that country, is called prince of the Jetab. It belonged now to one, then to another country.

(L) According to Abûlghazi Khân, Altûn Khân, before

- a try, had, by means of some rebels, seized a considerable fortress, which opened a way into China: that in 1212, Jenghîz Khân being indisposed himself, sent Samûka Behadr, with a great army; who seized on all the provinces of Karakitay remaining to Altûn Khân, and with ease entered Kitay, by means of the intelligence which the rebel Khân held in the country: that, at the same time, Miklî Gâyank (M), one of the most able Mogul generals, marched to Kurje, to hinder the forces of that kingdom from going to assist Altûn Khân, and reduced several cities there: that, for all this, Altûn Khân advanced to attack Samûka Behadr, expecting to obtain an easy victory: but although the van-guard of the Moguls gave way at first, they at length obliged the enemy to fly, and shut themselves up in their cities: that the Moguls, instigated by the rebels, laid siege to Pe-king, or Khân-bâlik, which was so vigorously defended by Altûn Khân's son, that Altûn Khân they assaulted it in vain: that being no hopes of taking by force a city defended by such defeated. numerous troops, the siege was turned into a blockade; and when the famine became so great that the inhabitants ate one another, the city was taken by a stratagem, Hej. 610, A. D. 1213: that, on the news of this loss, Altûn Khân poisoned himself (N); and Jenghîz Khân gave the Kitay em- government of Pe-king to Miklî Gâyank, who, in two years, finished the conquest of Kitay, quered. with that of Kurje ^a.

- THE authors made use of by Abû'lghazi Khân differ from those consulted by De la Croix in several particulars, especially touching the second expedition of the Moguls into Kitay. According to him, five or six months after Altûn Khân's remove from Khân-bâlik (or Pe-king), to Nan-king (or Pyen-lyang), his son, who had been left to govern in that city, went to Nan-king, c to acquaint his father with the bad condition of their affairs on the frontiers. That, in the mean time, Jenghîz Khân, understanding that the empire of Kitay was rent by factions, sent Jamuka Behadr, and Maskan Behadr, with a numerous army, to invade the country, and besiege Khân-bâlik: that on the frontiers they were joined by a great number of deserters from Karakitay; while Altûn Khân, hearing of their march, sent provisions to that city, under the guard of a large body of troops, commanded by two of his best generals; but that, being met by the army of Jenghîz Khân, they were defeated, and the two generals taken: that Altûn Khân, overcome Altûn Khân's with this misfortune, poisoned himself; and, at the approach of the Mogul generals, Khân-bâ- death. lik surrendered without striking a stroke: that Jenghîz Khân afterwards arriving at Khân-bâlik, took, by degrees, most of the cities belonging to the empire of Kitay; and having employed five d years in this expedition, returned into his hereditary dominions, in order to watch the motions of his enemies ^c. Let us now return to the Chinese historians.

- IN the year 1216, Jenghîz Khân, after resting for some time in the palace which he had built Kuchluk near the river Lûku (O), in Tatary, went and incamped near the Tula; from whence he sent routed. Supûtay against the Markats, who had raised new troops, and always supported the king of the Naymâns. This prince (P), after his defeat, had endeavoured to stir up several tribes of the Kitân, Naymâns, and Markats, against the Mungls. Chepe therefore was detached, in the year 1217, towards the river Irtîsh, where he vanquished Kuchluk, son of Boyrak, late king of the Naymâns, who had taken up arms afresh. After this victory, he directed his march westward; but the Chinese history mentions no particulars of this expedition. At the same time Chuchi
e (or Fuji), the emperor's eldest son, took his journey towards a country very remote from China, to the north-west. The history does not name this country: but mentions some people, or tribes, whom he subdued; as the U-se-han, Ha-na-sa, Kû-lyang-û-ke-she, and Tay-miboynirk-hân.

- JENGHIZ KHAN, having now resolved to carry his arms westward, declared Mûbûli, whose Expedition great qualities he publicly extolled, generalissimo of the troops, and his lieutenant-general in westward. China: he conferred on him likewise the title of king (Q), and made it hereditary in his family. On this occasion he caused the Chinese and Tatar troops to be drawn out, with their standards displayed, and ordered them to obey Mûbûli as himself; delivering to him, at the same time, a royal seal of gold, to put to all his mandates. That general, the same year, marched
f with his troops for China, where, in a short time, he subdued many cities in Shen-si, Pe-che-li, and Shan-tong. Li-chew (R) having held out to the last extremity, Mûbûli would have put all the inhabitants to the sword: but, at the intreaty of Chau-tsin, one of his best officers, who offered fore he left Khân-bâlik, cut off the heads of some Karakitay lords for slight offences, which made several of them retire with their effects into Jenghîz Khân's dominions. One lord, among the rest, having surprized and ruined some of Altûn Khân's cities, sent to offer his service to Jenghîz Khân, and was so well received, that many others followed his example.

(M) The same with Mûbûli, as he is called before, from the Chinese history.

expedition, might have been the foundation of this error in the more western historians.

to die himself, to save his mother, brothers, and the rest of the citizens (being a native of that place), they were spared^a.

Kuchluk pursued.

AT the end of the year 1217, or beginning of the next, Jenghiz Khân put himself at the head of a powerful army, in order to march into the west. Before he set out, he declared the prince Tye-muko (S), called also Wa-che, his fourth brother, regent of the empire. Among the chosen generals who accompanied the Khân, there were several Chinese; and he formed companies of soldiers, who had the art of casting huge stones against cities. His first enterprise was against Kuchluk, who had put in motion all the countries to the north-west of Turfân, as far as the rivers Sihûn and Jihûn (T) on one side, and on the other as far as the Osi and Irtîsh. He was leagued with the Markats, and princes of Kicha (U), a vast country, to the north and north-east of the Caspian sea; besides those of the Kangli, who inhabited the country to the north-east of the territories of Samarkant.

taken.

AN army of 300,000 men, said to be the remains of the Kitân (X), of whom there were many tribes about Turfân, having advanced with design to oppose the Khân's passage, he intirely defeated them. Ko-pau-yu, one of the Chinese generals in the Mungl army, having been desperately wounded in the battle, Jenghiz Khân honoured him with a visit in his tent. When recovered, he was sent to besiege Bishbâlig (Y), which was taken, with the other cities in that country. At the same time Gonchor, a lord of the tribe of Tong ku, in the western parts of Tatary, subdued the city and country of Almâleg (Z). Kosmeli, one of the great officers of the last Khân of the western Lyau (or Kitân), understanding that the Mungls were come to make war on Kuchluk, persuaded the chief of the city of Asân (A), and those of other tribes, to submit to Chepe (B). Jenghiz Khân being informed of this, sent for Kosmeli, and gave him the command of a body of the van-guard. Kuchluk, after this, being defeated, his head was cut off by the Khân's order; and exposed to view in all the towns and villages of the Naymâns (C) and Kitân, through which they passed. Hereupon those tribes, together with the Kangli (or Kankli), acknowledged Jenghiz Khân for their sovereign^c.

slain.

His ingrati-
tude.

THE more western historians of the Mungl affairs agree pretty well with the Chinese. They inform us, that Jenghiz Khân, after the reduction of Tangut (or Hya), intended to have returned, and finished the conquest of Kitay; but that he was diverted by the rumours of his old enemies in Tatary beginning to raise new disturbances. The tribes, which had still refused to acknowledge him for their master, had submitted to Kuchluk as their Khân: who thus finding himself in a condition of power, by the advice of Mohammed Karazm Shâb, the most potent prince at that time in the west of Asia^d, on some pretence of discontent, unexpectedly attacked Kavar dominions. On the other hand, Kudath, brother of Toktabeghi, Khân of the Markats, with the two sons of the latter, had arrived among the Naymâns, and began to make the subjects of Jenghiz Khân in those quarters uneasy; for the Naymâns, being but newly subdued, were the readier to listen to proposals of freeing them from his yoke.

subdued.

HEREUPON the Khân sent two of his generals, Suida (D) Behadr, and Kamu Tushazar, with a considerable force against Kudath (E), and his adherents; who were defeated at the river Jam Muran (F), and all of them killed or taken: which put an end intirely to the sovereignty of the Markats (G). As the Tumats (H) had invaded the Khân's dominions while he was employed in Kitay, he sent against them some troops, under Burgu Noyan (I), or Nevian, who caused some of them to be slain; and treated the rest with so much rigour, that Jenghiz Khân was concerned at it. To reduce Kuchluk, who appeared a more formidable enemy, he detached

But the Mungls charged him so vigorously that he was constrained to fly, followed only by a small number of his men; the rest having been all cut to pieces. Zena Noyân, not content with the victory, set out in pursuit of him; and pressed him so closely, that he even killed all the men who accompanied him, excepting three. His pursuer, arriving soon after in the country of Sarakol, was Hej. 611. informed by a peasant, that four strangers were newly passed by, who had taken the road to A. D. 1217. Badagshân (L). Hereupon, redoubling his speed, he came up with the unfortunate prince before Kuchluk's he could reach that city, and had him put to death on the spot. Zena, after this, returned to Jenghîz Khân; who rewarded him magnificently for the services done him in that expedition^a.

THIS is the account given by the historians of the west of Asia, whom we shall almost wholly follow for what regards Jenghîz Khân's wars in those parts: the Chinese authors having been as little acquainted with what passed in Great Bukhâria and Persia, as the others were with his transactions in Lyau-tong and Kitay.

(K) Whether this be the same called by the Chinese Ch. pe, we cannot determine: for De la Croix, from Mirk-boud, names the general sent against Kuchluk, Hubbe Noyân. According to De la Croix, Jenghîz Khân first sent to draw Soltân Mohammed from Kuchluk's interest, which was easily effected (the Karazm Shâh growing jealous of his power, and willing to weaken Jenghîz Khân's); and then sent Hubbe Noyân to pursue him, by way of Kâshgar, which Hubbe reduced; and Kuchluk was taken as he was hunting in the mountains of Badagshân, where he passed for an inhabitant of the country, but was known by some Moguls.

C H A P. III.

From the invasion of Karazm to the death of Soltân Mohammed.

- c JENGHIZ KHAN, having established peace in his dominions, and completed the reduction of all the Turkish tribes under his obedience, resolved to cultivate amity with his neighbours, particularly Soltân Mohammed Karazm Shâh. To this purpose, at the end of the year 1217, he sent Makinut Jalûzi, his ambassador (A), to acquaint the Soltân, "That, having become master of all the countries from the farthest east to the frontiers of his empire, he was desirous to enter into a treaty of amity with him, for their mutual interest; and that the Soltân would consider him as his father; in which case he proposed to look on the Soltân as his son." Mohammed, having heard the ambassador's proposal, took him aside, and asked him, "If it was true, that Jenghîz Khân had conquered Kitay?" and, at the same time made him a present of a rich scarf adorned with jewels, which he had then on, to induce him to be more open and sincere. Upon this, Makinut protested before God, that what he had related was fact; adding, "That he would soon find he told truth, in case he came to have any difference with him." At this answer the Soltân fell into a great passion; "I know not," said he, "what your master means, by sending to tell me that he has conquered so many provinces? Do you know of how great extent my empire is? or upon what ground he pretends to be greater than I; expecting that I should honour him as my father, and be content to be treated only as his son? Has he then so many armies?"
- d THE ambassador, perceiving how disagreeable truth was to the Karazmian monarch, altho' he required it, began to soothe him; saying, "I know very well that you are more powerful than my sovereign; and that there is as much difference between you two as between the true son and a mock one: but, on the other hand, you know that he is my master, and that I must obey his orders; however, I can assure you, that his intentions are very good." This flattery mollified the Soltân, so that he consented at last to every thing which the ambassador proposed, and a treaty of peace (B) was concluded on^a. He returned with presents both

Nasser. AFTER this there subsisted so great an harmony for some time between the two empires, that a man might have travelled from one to the other, with gold and silver in his hand, without the least danger: but as two great neighbouring princes cannot possibly live long without distrusts and jealousies, Soltân Mohammed soon became uneasy at Jenghiz Khân's greatness; and, after his reduction of Gazna, he treated the Mungls with less respect than before: at the same time his subjects committed such acts of hostility as obliged Jenghiz Khân to complain of them. Yet this did not alter his intention to keep the peace^b; nor could even the importunity of Nasser, the Khalifah of Baghdâd, draw him from that resolution. Mohammed, having cut off the heads of above one hundred princes, to make himself master of their treasures and domi- b nions, would needs oblige the Khalifah to grant him the privileges which the Seljukian, and other Soltâns had enjoyed before; particularly that of establishing his seat in Baghdâd, to govern and be named in the publick prayers, in the same manner as he was. But Nasser refused to comply with his demands, alleging, "That former Soltâns had some right to those " privileges, for great services done to the Khalifat; whereas he had no occasion for Moham-
" med's assistance: nor had that prince done any thing to intitle him to such powers."

His army
ruined. SOLTÂN Mohammed received the Khalifah's ambassador (who accompanied his own back) very honourably: but was so far from abating any thing of his demands, that he called a general council of the Muftis, Mûlas, Kâdîs, Imâms, Sheykhs, and other lawyers, to depose him; and having nominated another Khalifah, set out with a great army to take Baghdâd. By good luck c for Nasser, this army was almost intirely destroyed by the frosts and rains of a severe winter, which obliged the Soltân to return home. However, the Khalifah, fearing in the end to be reduced to extremities by that powerful prince, resolved to make an alliance with Jenghiz Khân; and excite him to invade Mohammed on one side, while he attacked him on the other. Part of his council were against this measure: alleging, that it was contrary to the Mohammedan law, to bring the enemies of God into the country of the faithful, as it might occasion the ruin both of the Musulman religion and empire. But the Khalifah's zeal for the faith could not make him change his sentiments: He answered, "That a Mohammedan tyrant was worse than one who " was an infidel: that it only became cowards to abandon the care of their preservation to avoid " the pains of watching: that, since they saw themselves threatened with apparent ruin, they d
" might attempt any thing to prevent it: that, besides, Jenghiz Khân did not hate the Moham-
" medan religion, since he suffered Mohammedans to live in his dominions, and had even one
" for his Wazîr (or Vizier): that, in short, supposing him an enemy to the faith, they had " nothing to fear from the Mungls, since it would be many years before they could enter into " those countries which were really Mohammedan."

to Jenghiz
Khân THE opinion of the Khalifah prevailing, an envoy was accordingly sent into Tatary, with his credentials impressed on his head (C), to prevent discovery: and having been admitted to a private audience, Jenghiz Khân told him, "The treaty which he had just then concluded would " not permit him to make war upon the Soltân at that juncture: but that he knew the rest-
" less spirit of Mohammed would not suffer things to remain long in the posture they were then e
" in; and that, on the first occasion given, he would not fail to declare war against him."
The Mohammedan historians greatly blame this conduct of the Khalifah: and although it does not appear that he ever gave any assistance to Jenghiz Khân, yet his having but excited him to make war on a prince of their religion, was sufficient to draw their reproaches upon him^c.

for assistance. MEAN time Soltân Mohammed, careless of preserving the good harmony on his side, gave much occasion of discontent, by sending, or permitting, his soldiers to enter the borders of the Mungl empire, and commit depredations. At last, he seized a province which belonged to Kashluk, but became the Khân's by right of conquest: and one day, by his order, his soldiers attacked the Mungl troops, which guarded the borders of the country of Ardishb. Yet all these injuries could not provoke Jenghiz Khân to declare war against Mohammed: on the contrary, f as he had in view to enrich his subjects by commerce, and polish their manners by conversation with strangers, he resolved, if possible, to live at peace with him, and even cultivate a firm alliance^d.

- a his dominions, drew thither merchants from all parts; and, among the rest, from Great Bukharia, which was subject to Soltân Mohammed. Upon the arrival of some of these latter with very rich commodities, the Khân sent for them: but they set so extravagant a price on their goods as made him very angry: and having shewn them above a thousand chests, with all sorts of valuable commodities, told them, "They might see by what was before them, that it was not the first time he had cheapened such merchandizes: but that, since they durst exact upon him with so much assurance, he resolved to pay them in their kind;" and so made them take back their goods without buying any. After this, sending for other merchants of the same country, with the like commodities, he began to cheapen several parcels: but they, warned by what had happened to their countrymen, told the Khân, "That they left it to himself to give them what he pleased for them; or that, if he paid them nothing at all, his majesty was well come to take them." This answer pleasing Jenghîz Khân, he not only ordered them to be paid double the value of their goods; but also gave them leave to sell the remainder of them in his camp, without presenting the chief men with the least trifle.

- At the departure of these merchants for their own country, the Khân took that opportunity to put in execution what he had before projected. He sent with them four hundred fifty merchants of his own subjects, to trade in the Soltân's dominions: accompanied by Mohammed of Karazm, Ali Khoja of Bokhâra, and Yusef of Otrar, three officers of his court, whom he sent in quality of ambassadors to that monarch, with a very obliging letter; importing, "that he had treated his merchants so well during their stay in his dominions, that he flattered himself the Soltân would do no less by his subjects, who went to trade in his empire: that he engaged his promise always to act the part of a good father by the Soltân; and reckoned that he would, on his side, prove a good son to him; which obligations being performed by both parties, could not fail to aggrandize their empires, and encrease their common glory."

- The ambassadors, having passed through Mogulistan, Karakitay, and Turkestan, at length arrived at Otrar, called by the Arabs Farab, a city of great trade, seated to the north of the river Sihûn, now called Sir, at the west end of Turkestan, but subject to Soltân Mohammed. They immediately went to salute the governor, cousin-german to the mother of the Soltân, who had given him the name of Gaghîr Khân. The merchants likewise paid him their compliments, and offered him some presents: but one of them, an old acquaintance of his, happening inadvertently to call him by his former name Inaljik, he was so offended at it, that, without farther ceremony, he ordered both ambassadors and merchants to be arrested: and then dispatched a courier to inform the Soltân, that there were arrived at Otrar strangers, who indeed pretended to be merchants and ambassadors; but that, having strong reasons to suspect they came on some ill design, he had caused them to be arrested, till he knew his pleasure concerning them. Mohammed, without taking any farther information of the matter, sent orders that they should immediately be put to death: which sentence Gaghîr Khân executed to the rigour, and confiscated all their effects to the Soltân's use.

- This affair is somewhat differently related by the authors made use of by La Croix. They tell us, that Jenghîz Khân sent but one ambassador with the Karazmian merchants, accompanied by one hundred and fifty Mungl merchants; four of whom had the principal direction of trade: that he also ordered each of his wives and great lords to send some domestics with the merchants, to buy what they found most curious in the countries as they passed: that most of this large company were Mohammedans; and, for their greater security, the guards of the roads, which had been already established through his dominions, were doubled: that, being come to Otrar, the governor, whom they call Gayer Khân (D), gave them a very courteous reception, and promised to acquaint the Soltân immediately with the ambassador's arrival: that the ambassador, deceived by his complaisance, having talked too openly of the money brought by the merchants, the covetous governor, with design to enrich himself with their spoil, represented them in his letter to Soltân Mohammed as spies, extremely inquisitive to inform themselves of the strength of garrisons and forces of the country; in order, as he pretended, to discover the weakest side for invading his dominions: that hereupon, having received commands to watch the Mungls, with a power to act in the matter as to him should seem expedient, he resolved to murder the ambassador and all his company, four hundred and fifty in number: that, for this purpose, he invited them to an entertainment in his palace, where he caused them to be secretly slain one after the other, and then seized their treasure.

NOTWITHSTANDING the perfidious governor took all possible precautions to conceal his crime, that it might not come to the knowledge of Jenghîz Khân; yet one of the merchants had the good fortune to escape the massacre, and carried the news of it to that prince: who, at the recital of a fact so unexpected, as well as execrable, fell into an extreme rage; and having given immediate orders for assembling his troops, sent to tell (E) the Soltân, “That a “ since by so infamous an action he had violated all the engagements which were between them;

 “ he, from that instant, declared himself his mortal enemy, and would take vengeance on “ him by a rigorous war.” It is related, that the Khân recounted to his children and great lords of his court, assembled for that purpose, the story of the assassination at Otrâr: he set forth the matter in such dismal colours, that he filled all their hearts with grief and anger; and represented the murder of his ambassador with such fire, that it inspired nothing but vengeance and fury against Soltân Mohammed, whom they looked on as a monster.

Makes regulations

AFTER Jenghîz Khân had assembled the forces of his empire, he wrote to the foreign princes who were either his friends or tributaries; acquainting them with the reasons of his marching against the Karazm Shâh, and desiring them to join him with their troops: which, when done, b upon a review, his army amounted to 700,000 men. Before he set out on this expedition, he ordered levies to be made and sent him from time to time. He likewise established some new laws for regulating his soldiery. He forbade the Mungls, under pain of death, to fly without fighting, whatever danger there might be in resisting the enemy. He ordered, that where ten commanders, with their troops, were joined together in one body, if any of such officers, or troops, should offer to break their ranks and fly, without being accompanied by the whole body, they should be killed upon the spot without delay; he also made it death for any out of ten men, who, seeing their companions engaged in fight, did not go to assist them: or who, being present when one of their comrades was taken prisoner, did not do their utmost to rescue him.

He appointed the proper arms which each soldier was to carry; the chief of which were the sabre, the bow, and quiver full of arrows, the battle-ax, and some ropes. The officers were to have helmets and breast-plates either of leather or iron, or else an entire suit of armour or coat of mail; nor was it forbidden the private soldiers to wear armour if they were able to buy it. Persons of substance were obliged to arm their horses, so that arrows could not wound them. It was likewise ordained that the soldiers should, on all occasions in the field, do nothing but what was conformable to the laws, under the penalty of the most rigorous punishment.
 Lastly, he commanded, that in case he died in the expedition, the books, in which the laws were written, should be read in the presence of his children at the election of a Grand Khân:
 to the end that such election should be made pursuant to those laws; and that the new Khân d might regulate his conduct by them.

 march

H. 616.
 A. D. 1218.

EVERY thing being now ready for the war, the Khân detached his son Juji, or Tusbi (F), with a large body of troops towards Turkestan, in order to dislodge the friends of Kushluk, who still remained there: after which he marched to attack the dominions of Soltân Moham- med. And since it is from the date of this expedition, that the great irruption of the Mungls, or Moguls, and Tatars, into the southern part of Asia, is reckoned to commence, it will be proper to acquaint our readers with the state of this part of the world at that remarkable juncture.

State of Asia

THE Indians were governed by many kings; the most powerful of whom was the king of the Patans (G), who reigned in Multan and Debli. The southern part of China, then called Manji, had its own emperors of the Song race; and the northern part, named Kitay, or Katay, e was under the Mungls; as were also both the eastern and western Tartary, with most of Tur- kestan. The rest was possessed by Soltân Mohammed, who was also master of Great Bukhâria at his invasion. and Karazm, where the monarchy was first established, and from whence the family took the title of Karazm Shâh. Besides these, his dominion extended over the greater part of the empire of Irân, or Persia at large; containing, among the rest, Khorassân, with the frontiers of India, Pârs, or proper Persia, Irâk Ajemi, and Azerbaijan. Georgia, and the adjacent countries, had their particular princes, who were independant: as for Armenia, its king paid tribute to the Shâh of Karazm. The Khalifah Nasser reigned in Baghdâd, over Irâk Arabi, or Khaldea, part of Jazireh, or Mesopotamia, the three Arabias, and some countries of Persia, contiguous to his other dominions. The Atabek princes of Musel, or Mosul, the descendants of the great f Nûro'ddîn, prince of Syria, possessed almost all the rest of Jazireh. The successors of Salâ- bo'ddîn (or Saladîn) were also very powerful; Egypt, with part of Syria, (where the Christian

(E) According to Abûlfaraj, three ambassadors were sent; others say, but one; who declared the subject of their embassy with so much warmth, that the Soltân, instead of disavowing his governor's crime, put them to death. He adds, that Jenghîz Khân was so touched with this barbarous proceeding, that he wept, ate nothing for three days, and could take no rest, till he got all things in readiness to revenge the injury.

(F) According to la Croix's authors, Tusbi was in Kap- chak (or Kipjak) at this time; whither he was sent for to be at the rendezvous. Perhaps he came time enough to be detached to Turkestan.

a affairs were in a very bad posture) having submitted to them. Anatolia, or Asia minor, was for the most part under the power of the Seljukians, called Soltâns of Konia, or Ikonium; and of Rûm, or the Romans: and the empire of Constantinople was at this time in the hands of the French ^b.

HISTORIANS do not mention the places through which the Mungls marched in their way to Soltân the Karazmian dominions; nor even the month in which Jenghiz Khán left Mogulistan in the Mohammed year of the Hare. Mean time Soltân Mohammed made great preparations to oppose him; and, having raised 400,000 men (a vast army, though inferior to that of the enemy), marched towards Samarkand, and from thence to Kbojend (H), in order to meet the Khán ⁱ: but being informed at this last place, that Juji was returning from Turkestan, he changed his design; and directed his course to attack the Mungl prince before he could join his father. Having at length, by forced marches, arrived on the borders of that country, he turned off towards the river Kabli, in order to cut off Juji's retreat. Being arrived between that river and the Kamzi, he found a great number of men; who, as he was informed by a wounded soldier, had been slain the day before by the Mungls: upon this he hastened his march, and overtook them next morning. The generals, who accompanied Juji, counselled him to make an orderly retreat: inasmuch as the Khán had not commanded him to fight with the Soltân's whole army; and he was not strong enough for such an undertaking: they added, that, in case the Soltân should pursue them, it was only to be done by small detachments; against which they might easily defend themselves, without running so great a hazard as that of a general battle.

THE prince alone was against this advice: "What," replied he, "will my father and brothers say, should I return flying in the sight of the enemy? It will, on all accounts, be better to stand our ground, trusting to our valour, than to be slain in flight. You have done your duty, in admonishing me of the danger we are in: I am now going to do mine, by trying to bring you out of it with honour." After this, he ranged his troops in military order, and led them cheerfully to the charge. In the height of the confusion Juji pierced twice or thrice the enemy's ranks; and, having encountered Soltân Mohammed, gave him two or three strokes with his sword, which the other parried with his buckler. The Mungls, animated by the example of their prince, performed wonders that day: so that, notwithstanding the superiority of the enemy, they were on the point of flying; if the Soltân, finding that his presence could not revive the courage of his soldiers, had not called out to them to stand their ground only for a few minutes, till night came on to part them. They obeyed this command, and thus saved him from the shame of seeing his whole army fly before a small part of the Mungl forces.

JUJI, who thought he might be content with the honour acquired in that one engagement, caused great fires to be lighted in several places of his camp, and retired silently in the night. Next day, the enemy, imagining that he still waited for them on the field of battle, marched out again to renew the fight; but finding he had decamped, they retreated likewise. The prince, having rejoined his father with the troops under his command, was joyfully received, and loaded with presents for his gallant behaviour ^k. This is the account given by Abû'lghazi Khán: but, according to La Croix, Jenghiz Khán himself was in the battle, and his whole army engaged in this action. Soltân Mohammed, says that author, not doubting but the Mungl emperor had a design upon Otrâr, as the bloody tragedy was there acted, and it would open him a free passage into the very heart of his dominions, led his army thither. In short, having met the Moguls in a place called Karakû, the two armies immediately prepared to fight: the great trumpet, Kerrena, fifteen foot long, was blown; the brass timbrels, called Kûs, the drums, fifes, and other warlike instruments, sounded the charge. The Karazmians, who were all Mohammedans, implored the assistance of their prophet; while the Mungls, trusting to their good fortune, and the emperor's conduct, promised themselves a complete victory.

JUJI KASSAR, Jenghiz Khán's second brother, who commanded the Mangalay (I), advancing towards the first ranks of the enemy, defeated the troops which were detached to oppose him. Then Jalalo'ddin, the Soltân's son, began the general engagement, and charged prince Tusbi (or Juji), who was at the head of the first body of Mungls. The dispute was long and bloody; at length, Jalalo'ddin getting the better, nothing but shouts of joy were heard through the Karazmian army, who now deemed themselves secure of the victory. But Jenghiz Khán, under no concern at this disadvantage, sent other troops, under the command of Tuli, his fourth son, to secure Tusbi; whilst he, at the head of the main body, with his son Jagatay, fell upon the Soltân himself, who had very ill-treated his left wing. This shock was terrible: but the Karazmians, notwithstanding the example of their king, who fought with extraordinary bravery, began to give way ; when Jalalo'ddin, after having defeated the other troops sent against him, joined his father, and renewed the fight with greater fury than ever. The prince did, on this occasion, surprizing things ; whilst the officers, and very soldiers, gave proofs of extraordinary valour.

On the other hand, the Mungls never behaved more bravely ; and having now to do with men as valiant as themselves, there ensued a dreadful slaughter on both sides, and the victory remained a long time doubtful : but at last Jenghîz Khân, who had still a great body of reserve, under the conduct of his son Oktay, bad him march and charge the enemy in flank. The prince executed his orders with much resolution : but although these fresh troops made a terrible havock, yet the Karasmians sustained this last attack with great firmness, till night putting an end to the dispute, both parties retired to their respective camps ; which they fortified the best they could, to avoid being surprized, with design to renew the battle next morning. But when Soltân Mohammed came to examine the state of his troops, and found they were diminished by more than 160,000 men, killed and wounded ; whilst, by the report of his spies, the Mungl army, though so ill-treated, were still much superior in numbers ; he thought only of securing himself from being soon attacked ; and accordingly intrenched his men so well, that Jenghîz Khân did not think fit to attempt to force his camp¹.

The Soltan

Jenghîz
Khân advances.

DURING this short suspension of arms, Soltân Mohammed, not daring to risk a second battle, the loss of which would have been the entire ruin of his empire, distributed his army into the most considerable places of strength (K) ; and kept with him only a flying camp, to be ready to march where there was the most urgent occasion. He gave all the rest of his troops to prince Jalalo'ddin, who did not approve of this way of proceeding ; and, contrary to his commands, retired to Khorassân, where he increased his army with all the troops which he could get together. The truth is, that, in thus dividing his forces, the Karasm Shâh yielded the victory to his enemy. Thus La Croix. On the other hand, according to Abû'lghazi Khân, Jenghîz Khân was still on his march to Great Bukhâria ; where at length arriving, after he had been joined in the way by Arslân, Khân of the Karliks, Idikût, Khân of the Vigûrs (or Oygûrs), and Saknâk, lord of Amâlik (or Almâlig), he turned first on the side of Otrâr : but, understanding that Soltân Mohammed had left the country open to him, and distributed his troops into the places of strength, he detached his two sons, Ugaday (or Oktay) and Jagatay, with a considerable body of forces to besiege Otrâr ; and his son Fuji, with another party towards Najan (L). He also ordered two of his generals Alan (M) Noyan (or Nevian) and Suktu Buku, with 50,000 (N) men towards Farnakant (or Fenakant) and Khojend, reserving with himself the gross of his army ; with which he continued his march, accompanied by his son Taulay (or Tuli) towards Great Bukharia^m.

surrenders.

THE first city which Jenghîz Khân found in his passage was Zarnuk (O), under the walls of which his soldiers encamped with so terrible an outcry, that the inhabitants in a fright shut the gates ; but Hajîb, one of his officers, being sent to advise them to submit, by demolishing their castle, and sending to the camp all their young men capable of bearing arms to serve in his army, they flocked in crowds, loaded with presents, to put themselves under the protection of Jenghîz Khân ; who received them very graciously, and gave to their city the name of Kût-lûk Bâlek, after which he permitted all the elderly men to return.

Nûr submits.

FROM hence the Khân marched to Nûr, under the guidance of an inhabitant of Zarnuk, who led his army a nearer way, ever since called the Grand Khân's route. This city, which is situate between Samarkant and Bokhâra, had the name of Nûr, or light, given to it, on account of the many holy places within it ; resorted to from all parts by crouds of devotees. The inhabitants, after several summonses to surrender, at last agreed to open their gates ; but Jenghîz Khân, to punish them for daring to form even a thought of resisting him, allowed them to keep only such cattle and provisions as were necessary for their subsistence ; and gave all the rest for pillage to his soldiers. Others say, the governor, through cowardice or bribery, having persuaded the citizens to surrender, they were obliged only to furnish the emperor's troops

(K) Abû'lghazi Khân says, that, after thus distributing his troops into the cities, he returned to his usual place of residence, and gave himself up to debauchery, which was attended with several excesses. Among the rest, that he caused a Sheykh, who passed for a holy man, to be assassinated, on suspicion of having a criminal conversation with his mother Turkbân Khatun : for which, however, he was much troubled when sober ; and would have bought absolution of another Sheykh, with a great bason full of gold and jewels.

a with some necessaries, and pay him yearly the 1500 crowns of gold, which they before paid to Soltân Mohammed.

THE Khân made no stay here, being desirous to get as soon as possible to Bokhâra, in regard The Soltân it was the center of the Soltân's dominions; and he knew that prince had retired thither with his the greater part of his riches: but Mohammed, too wise to wait his coming, left 20,000 men to defend the place, and retired secretly to Samarkant with all his effects. His flight was owing, in great measure, to certain counterfeit letters dropped among his troops; insinuating, that his best officers intended to quit his service. These letters, which bred confusion in the Soltân's army, were written by Badro'ddîn, formerly one of his officers; to be revenged on him for putting his father, uncle, and brothers to death. Jenghîz Khân, to whose court Badro'ddîn had retired, permitted him to make use of that artifice, after being informed that there was a misunderstanding between Soltân Mohammed and his mother; and that several commanders had left him, to follow that princess. The Khân even offered his assistance to this queen, and a settlement in any part of his dominions; but she did not care to trust the promises of an infidel prince.

BOKHARA is situate one day's journey to the north of the river Jihûn, or Amû, very advantageously for trade, and in a delightful country. Besides the city walls, which were very strong, it had an outward inclosure, twelve leagues in compass; which shut in not only the suburbs, but also many pleasant seats and farms, watered by the river Soghd: from whence the ancient Soghdania took its name. Arts and sciences flourished no-where more than in this city, to which students flocked from all parts; and we are told, that the word Bukhâr, in the Mungl language, signifies a learned man. Among the many who have rendered it famous was Ebn Sîna, commonly called in Europe Avicenna, of Afghana; who was bred in this university, and was master of all the sciences at eighteen years of age. He was afterwards called to court, and made prime minister, yet still followed his studies: and is said to have written above 100 volumes. He died in 1036, at the age of fifty-eight ⁿ.

THE Mungls arrived in the plain of Bokhâra towards the end of July 1219 (P), and continued before the city during the following winter. In March 1220 the Mungls forced the outer wall, destroyed the suburbs, and began to besiege the city in form. Soltân Mohammed had left in the town a very numerous garrison, under the command of three generals, Kuk Khân, Siunj Khân, and Kuchluk Khân. At the approach of Jenghîz Khân these three generals made a sally in the night with all the garrison, consisting of 20,000 men: but being repulsed with great loss, their courage failed them; and, instead of staying to defend the inhabitants, as soon as they had got into the city by one gate, passed out by the opposite one, with their families, and almost all their soldiers, hoping to escape by the darkness of the night unperceived by the enemy: but their design being discovered, 30,000 Mungls pursued, and overtaking them at the river Amû, after a bloody dispute, almost all of them were cut to pieces ^o.

MEAN time Jenghîz Khân, informed of the confusion which the inhabitants of Bokhâra were thrown into by the desertion of their garrison, ordered the city to be attacked on all sides. But while the engines were getting ready for that purpose, next morning all the magistrates and clergy, attended by the principal citizens, went out and presented the keys of the city to Jenghîz Khân: who granted them their lives, on condition that they gave no shelter to any of the Soltân's soldiers, and put out all who should be suspected of being in that prince's interest; which they promised to do upon oath. As for the castle, which was strong, all the young people, who were displeased with the surrender, retired thither with the governor; a brave man, who was resolved to hold out to the last extremity.

JENGHIZ KHAN, having taken possession of Bokhâra, entered on horseback into the great mosque, and asked merrily, If that was the Soltân's palace? On being answered, that it was the house of God ^p, he alighted; and, giving the principal magistrate his horse to hold, mounted the gallery where the ecclesiastics usually sat; then, taking up the Korân, threw it under the feet of his horses. As soon as he was seated, his soldiers began to eat and drink in the temple, without the least regard to the place. From hence he retired to his camp; and a few days after assembled all the principal men of Bokhâra, and ascending a pulpit erected for that purpose in the midst of them ^q, began his speech by praising God, and recounting all the favours he had received from the Deity. After this he represented to them the perfidious behaviour of their Soltân towards him, in commanding his merchants and ambassadors to be assassinated: he added, that God had chosen him to punish Mohammed for all his cruelties, and to rid the earth of such tyrants. As to them, he testified his satisfaction for their having freely furnished his army with necessaries, and promised that his soldiers should not meddle with any goods, which they made use of in their houses : but commanded them to deliver up to him a all which they had hidden, threatening otherwise to oblige them by torture.

burned.

THE inhabitants, for fear of the worst, carried to his officers not only the goods which they had hidden, but those also which they had in use. This compliance satisfied him for that time : but, understanding afterwards, that several of the Soltân's soldiers were concealed in the town, he ordered it to be set on fire ; so that there remained nothing of that great city, excepting the Soltân's palace, called Ark, built of stone, and some few private houses built with brick, all the rest having been of wood. After this, he sent to search the said palace and houses, and caused all the soldiers he found in them to be slain. Bokhâra continued in this state for some years ; but at length the Khân ordered it to be rebuilt, a little before his death. The castle, which b had held out for some time after the city was yielded, surrendered also at discretion, and was demolished ; but the governor and garrison had their lives spared.

Otrâr besieged,

THE reduction of this place gave Jenghîz Khân much satisfaction, which was increased by the arrival of the princes Jagatay and Oktay from Otrâr, which city they had taken ^r. Soltân Mohammed had left Gaghir, or Gayer Khân (Q), with 50,000 men, near that place, to oppose Janghîz Khân, in case he turned on that side ; and when he understood that prince had detached two of his sons to besiege it, he sent a further reinforcement of 10,000 men, under the command of Haraja Hajib (R), one of the lords of his court. With these 60,000 soldiers the governor shut himself up in the city, and made all the necessary preparations for a vigorous resistance, by strengthening the fortifications, and laying in store of provisions. The Mungls began the siege with their battering engines, and attempts to fill up the ditch (S) : e which, after much obstruction, they accomplished ; and then placed their machines against the walls with more advantage. But the besieged, by their frequent sallies, in which they often burned the engines, and otherwise damaged them, so well kept off the Mungls, that for several months they made very little progress. This inclined the princes to turn the siege into a blockade : but as it was necessary to consult their father on the occasion, and he returned no other answer than that they must fight ; his orders were obeyed with such indefatigable pains and ardour, that, in less than a month, the besieged saw all their towers and batteries beaten down, their engines broken, and breaches made in their walls : in short, they were obliged to retire behind their inner works ; which, however, were no less strong than the outer had been.

THE siege had now continued five months, when Karaja Hajib, seeing things reduced to this desperate condition, told Gayer Khân that it was time to think of capitulating, since it was not possible to defend the place much longer ; and, if the surrender was deferred, the enemy would not hearken to any agreement. But the governor, who was conscious of being the sole occasion of the war, and that there would be no mercy shewn him, absolutely to rejected the proposal, and resolved to hold out to the last extremity. He had likewise, by his address, inspired such an aversion against the Mungls, on account of their being infidels, that he gained over both the inhabitants and garrison to his sentiments. Hajib, finding he had, by this step, made himself liable to suspicion ; with the consent of the officers under him, in the night, caused the gate called Dervasi Sufi, of which he had the guard, to be opened, and retired, e with his 10,000 men, into the Mungl camp : but the princes, pursuant to a maxim among them, that a man who was capable of betraying his natural lord, would make no scruple of betraying them also upon occasion, ordered him, with all his followers, to be slain (T). After this, they entered Otrâr by the same gate which the deserter had come out of.

reduced.

THE governor, seeing the city taken (U), retired with 20,000 men into the castle ; all the rest of the garrison, who were driven out of the town, were put to the sword. Gayer Khân, finding the castle too little for such a number of men, endeavoured to free himself by frequent sallies, which incommoded the enemy extremely : but the princes redoubling their efforts, as the defence of the besieged became more obstinate, the castle, after a month's leaguer, was at last taken sword in hand, and all the garrison slain. The narrow places, which were fortified, f held out longer, being difficult of access ; and the very ruins of the houses, which were beaten then departed for Great Bukhâria. And this might well be ; for, in his way to Zarnûk, the first town he besieged, he must have passed near Otrâr.

(T) According to La Croix, only the general, the officers, and some of the soldiers, were put to death, but the rest were made slaves of.

down,

a down, afforded means for the remainder of the Karazmian soldiers to fight under cover : but the besiegers, still pouring in fresh troops, cut them all off by degrees⁵.

GAYER KHAN, seeing all lost, retired with two men to a terrace of his palace, and there defended himself desperately ; as Jenghiz Khân had given orders to take him alive, the execu-^{The governor slain.} tion of them cost the lives of many Mungls. At length his two companions were slain ; and although he was in want of arrows to shoot at those who strove to get up to the place where he was, yet he still defended himself a long time with great stones, which his wife brought him for that purpose. At last, being surrounded, he was taken prisoner, and brought before the princes, who ordered him to be loaded with chains ; and in their march to Bokhâra, at a place called Kuk Saray (X), they had him put to death, pursuant to orders received from their father.

b The castle of Otrâr was rased, but the city walls were rebuilt ; and the old men, women, and children, who had been turned out by Gayer Khân, permitted to return. It was likewise forbidden, under severe penalties, to the garrison who were left there, any way to disquiet or molest the inhabitants.

As Jenghiz Khân perceived it was necessary to reduce several other cities situated on the Sîr,^{Slaughter at Saganâk.} before he could undertake the conquest of Great Bukhâria ; when Otrâr was taken, he sent orders to Fuji, or Tushî, who was in these parts, to begin with the siege of Saganâk (Y). As soon as he arrived before the town, he sent Haji Hassan, a Mohammedan, to summon the inhabitants to surrender, with a promise of kind treatment : but although he had the governor's parole for his security, in a tumult raised by the chief officers, he was torn in pieces. Fuji, upon the news of this assassination, made his soldiers swear revenge, and never ceased assaulting the place until he had taken it. All the officers and soldiers, with more than one half of the inhabitants (Z), paid with their blood for Hassan's murder ; the rest of them, with the city itself, would have been destroyed, if it had not been found necessary to keep it for carrying on the war to advantage. Fuji likewise, to honour the memory of his unfortunate officer, and remind the people of their barbarity, ordered a stately monument to be erected for him in the most eminent place of the city.

In taking this revenge, the Mungls lost more men than the place was worth : but the severity they used produced a good effect, by obliging several cities to yield without resistance :^{yield.} thus the inhabitants of Uzkant (A), made wise by the sufferings of Saganâk, came out to meet d the prince, then two days journey distant, with magnificent presents, and delivered up their town without opposition ; the governor, and such as would have defended the place, retired to Tonkat. Fuji forbid his soldiers to offer those who staid the least insult, or take any thing which belonged to them. From thence he marched to Alshâsh (B), a very beautiful city, with a garden well-watered to every house. It was situated near the river Sihûn, now Sîr, four days^{Alshâsh taken.} journey to the north of Khojend. This place refused to surrender to Fuji, who therefore besieged it ; and, having taken it, caused a great number of the inhabitants to be slain, for daring to defend themselves¹.

AFTER the reduction of Alshâsh, the prince marched to Jund (C), a city on the borders^{Jund besieged.} of Turkestan, and at a small distance from the Sîr ; famous for the abode of several learned e men. The governor was named Kâtlûk Khân ; which title was given him, because the town, with the adjacent country, belonged to him by inheritance. He possessed great riches, and had promised to make a brave defence, if attacked : but as soon as he heard the Mungls were advancing towards him, he crossed the Sîr with his treasures, and retired thro' the desert into the kingdom of Karazm. However, the inhabitants resolved to defend the place to the last ; and although part of them would have surrendered, on the promise of good treatment, offered by Jitmûr, a commander sent from Fuji, or Tushî, yet the majority were against it ; and he had certainly lost his life like Hassan, if those who approved his proposals had not helped him to escape. Jitmûr, who was a good engineer, and had observed the strength of the place, judging that it would cost much time and men to take it by force, proposed laying f bridges over the ditch, which was full of water ; and, scaling the walls, in a part where the besieged thought themselves most secure, became masters of the town by surprise.

stratagem.

THE matter was referred to a council of war : and although Elak Nevian recommended force, as the noble way of taking cities, yet the rest approved of Fitmûr's stratagem : and, to second it, resolved to amuse the besieged with three false attacks on the weakest part of the town. The attacks began a little before night, with great shouts ; and as soon as the battering engines began to play, all the garrison ran on that side, and abandoned their other posts. When it was dark, Fitmûr caused his bridges to be laid across the ditch, and two wooden ladders to be raised against the wall, one of which he mounted himself, followed by his men, who soon fastened so great a number, that the troops entered the town, and seized a gate without much noise. The army being thus let in, seized the principal posts ; while the besieged, quite stunned at this surprise, abandoned the care of the places assaulted, and fled where they could, to hide themselves.

The inhabitants spared.

THUS was Jund taken, without any loss on either side : for the Mungls, not having lost any men of their own, destroyed none of the inhabitants, excepting two or three ; who were put to death for having abused Fitmûr, when sent to summon them. However, they imagined they were going to be massacred, when a message was brought from the prince, commanding them all to repair to a neighbouring plain : but the design was only to take the number of them ; after which they had leave to return to their houses, where they found nothing which the Mungls could take away. To keep them in obedience likewise, a strong garrison was placed in the city, and Ali Kojâ, a Mungl officer, although a Mohammedan, was appointed governor ^u.

besieged,

AFTER the reduction of this place, Fuji, or Tushî Khân, dividing his army into two bodies, gave 50,000 men to Elak Nevian (C) to subdue the countries of Ilâk, Alshâsh, and Khojend ; and ordered the rest of his troops to keep the open country, to facilitate the taking of this last city, which was a place of great importance. That general marched with such speed into Ilâk, that several towns surrendered without opposition. Among those which resisted, Tonkât, called by Abû'l-kair, Daro'l Ilm, or the palace of the sciences (D), was the most considerable. It depended on Alshâsh, and served to secure the frontiers of Ilâk ; it was also a common mart for the merchants of both countries. This city was rather a place of pleasure than of strength ; full of springs, gardens, and delightful walks : insomuch that it became a saying, that God never made a more delicious dwelling than Tonkât. The garrison was composed of Kanguli (E), native Turks, a brave people ; and the Bey, named Ilenko Malek, who was lord of the place, answered fiercely, when the Mungls summoned him to open the gates : but on the first attack retired into the castle, with the principal inhabitants.

THE besieged resisted vigorously for three days ; while Elâk Nevian, who thought it necessary to take this place before he attempted Khojend, gave several assaults to the city ; and having, on the fourth, made a breach in the walls with his engines, the frightened defendants desired to capitulate, but the Mungl general obliged them to surrender at discretion. Thinking he had cause to be displeased with the garrison, they were put to the sword, and the inhabitants made to go out of the town, that their houses might be more conveniently plundered (F). Ilenko Malek had the good luck to escape before the rendition, or he had fared like the soldiers. The Mungls built there a considerable magazine for warlike stores, and then marched towards Khojend ^{*}.

described.

KHOJEND, or Kojend, was situated along the south bank of the river Sir, in a fruitful and beautiful country, large, and well fortified. It traded chiefly in musk, and other odoriferous commodities : was seven days journey north from Samarkant, and the key of Bukhâria on that side. In short, a city in high esteem, on many accounts ; particularly for the bravery of its inhabitants : and the valour of the chief, who at this time commanded in it, made it still more renowned. This illustrious person was Timûr Mâlek, sovereign prince of the place, and a Khân ; who paid tribute to the Karazm Shâh, and had often commanded his armies. As soon as Elâk Nevian sat down before Tonkat, the Khân, who expected to be attacked next, omitted nothing which might be necessary for his defence ; laid in stores, broke down the bridges, spoiled the roads, and caused the corn, fruits, and cattle, of the circumjacent country to be carried away. The Mungl general began the siege of Khojend, by building a bridge of communication a little below the city : after which, he sent part of his army beyond the river, and

(C) According to Abû'lghazi Khân, Alân Noyan (who, as we have observed in a former note, is the same with Elâk Nevian), and Suktu Bûka, were both sent on this expedition, as hath been already mentioned.

Tonkât is called also Feneket ; for Fenket, or Farnakant, is a different town from Tonkât : being the same which afterwards, on its rebuilding, was named Shâh Rukîya, between Tonkât and Khojend. See before, p. 148.

a began to play his battering engines ; shooting whole mill-stones, if you will believe the historians, against the city, and exposed himself to a thousand dangers.

On the other hand Timûr Mâlek contrived a thousand methods to destroy the enemy's ^{Timûr Mâlek,} machines. He had twelve Kerûd ; a kind of large boats (G) or barks, six of which he sent armed on each side the river, to shoot stones, darts, or arrows, into the Mungl camp, which killed and wounded abundance of men. The garrison was likewise supplied, from time to time, with recruits, by means of a marsh, which hindered the besiegers from surrounding the city ; so that the Khân was in hopes to have wearied them out : but as Elâk Neviân received fresh troops from prince Juji, he, with redoubled assaults, so harrassed the besieged, that they despaired of resisting him much longer. On this occasion Timûr Mâlek had recourse to stratagem. A little before the siege, he had caused to be built a kind of fortress, at the farther end of the city, in a little island (H), very difficult of access, in which he put a thousand soldiers ; and then sent certain persons into the Mungl camp, who, under pretence of being deserters, should advise them to attack this fort, with an assurance that, as soon as it was taken, the city must surrender. The general, suffering himself to be deceived, turned his engines on that side : but the castle being extremely high, as well as strong, and at too great a distance from the shore, after several days battering to no purpose, their stones and other materials began to fail. This delayed them much, and the difficulty of supplying themselves, a great deal more ; for they were obliged to go above three leagues to fetch them.

HOWEVER, this difficulty did not discourage the Mungls, who went cheerfully about that labour. But, when a vast quantity of stones was brought together, the general employed them ^{his brave defence ;} another way to reduce the fort ; and, instead of throwing them against it out of reach, ordered them to be cast into the river, so as to form a jetty, or bank, by which they might approach nearer with their engines. The greater part of the army was employed in this work (i), which the holes in the river rendered extremely laborious. The foot soldiers carried the stones to the brink of the water, and the horse went and threw them in, among the earth and trees tied together, laid before-hand for the purpose. Over these were placed fascines, and other materials, to finish the bank, and render it firm. The work was interrupted greatly by the besieged ; who, by their engines, and sallies made in their barks, often threw down the pier, and destroyed all they had done. In short, Timûr Mâlek opposed this enterprize by all sorts of contrivances : but when he found he could dispute the passage of the channel with the Mungls no longer, he betook himself to his barks, with all his men. He had, during the siege, increased their number ^{quits the place ;} to seventy ; plastered over with a composition made of wet felt, worked up with clay and vinegar, which defended the vessels both from missile weapons and fire. To destroy the bridge of communication, which was an obstacle to his escape, he one night caused a sally to be made : and while the commanding officers attacked those who kept the head of the bridge, several barks, filled with tar and naphta, set fire to the pontoons of which it was composed ; and opened a way for the Khân, and the rest of his fleet, which drove swiftly down the stream.

As soon as the Mungl general was informed of Timûr Mâlek's escape, he ordered him to be ^{battles his pursuers ;} pursued by a great body of horse, who followed the barks along the river, and attacked them from time to time with arrows and wild-fire ; often advancing into the water, to get nearer their enemies. In these engagements many men were killed on both sides : but the bloodiest disputes were, when any rocks or sand-banks on the north-side the river obliged the fleet to approach the south shore. On these occasions the Khân appeared a prodigy of valour ; especially at a flat, where the river being fordable, the horsemen had an opportunity of coming nearer the barks : but after a furious fight, they were obliged to make a shameful retreat.

SOME authors relate, that the Mungls contented themselves with observing the motions of ^{and escapes} Timûr Mâlek, in his passage down the river, imagining that he could not escape them ; as a chain had been drawn across the channel at Farnakant, or, as others say, at Tonkat. But the Khân found means, by hatchets and files, which he had brought for the purpose, to cut the chain in the night, and pass through, tho' not without great loss of men. However, at ^{down the river.} length coming to a place where the river was extremely narrow and shallow, he was obliged to quit his barks, and try to escape by land. Some authors say, he was under no necessity of going ashore, but did it of choice, to attack the Mungls ; which he did from an eminence, with success ; and then retired from one difficult place to another, to fatigue his pursuers. Meanwhile the barks, neglected by the Mungls, escaped with the Khân's family to a town on the river, belonging to Soltân Mohammed. As for Timûr Mâlek himself, his followers being at length all cut off, and finding himself closely pursued by three Mungls, he let fly an arrow at the foremost; which hitting him in the eye, so scared his companions, that they all stopped, and let him escape to a neighbouring town called Kent. There, gathering a small body of men, he went and surprized Farnakant; and, having cut the throats of the Mungl garrison, returned to Soltân Mohammed, who loaded him with praises, and conferred on him the government of that city (K).

KHOJEND having surrendered the day after Timûr Mâlek's departure, Elâk Neviân settled matters there, and then went along with prince Juji, or Tushi, to rejoin the Grand Khân; whom they found within a day's journey of Samarkant, in a place where they had encamped the latter end of May (L) 1220, Hejrah 617.

described.

SAMARKAND, supposed to be the Marakandus of the ancients, was at this time the capital of Great Bukhâria, and seventy furlongs, or three leagues, in compass; though in the time of Alexander it was more than twelve. It was likewise inclosed with an outer wall, which was more regularly built, and better fortified, than those of Bokhâra. In it were twelve iron gates, a league distant from each other; and at every two leagues there was a fort, able to contain a good body of troops: the walls were likewise fenced with battlements and towers, to fight under shelter, and surrounded with a very deep ditch, through which an aqueduct was laid, conveyed thither by leaden pipes, from a little river called Sogd, and thence into the city, which stood on the south side of it: so that every great street had a canal of water running through it, and every house a fountain, as well as garden. Besides this, there was a rising ground, from whence several rivulets descended, forming jettées and cascades. The inner city or inclosure had four gates, but the walls were defenceless: within it stood the great mosque or temple, and palace where the prince used to reside. As within the outer inclosure there were ploughed lands, fields, hills, and an infinite number of gardens; so, in viewing the city from the top of the fortrefs, one could see nothing but trees, and the roofs of some houses.

Its present state.

THEY are mistaken who ascribe the founding of this city to Alexander, for it existed before his expedition; or to a king of Yamman (Arabia felix), named Tobay; for he only built one of the gates, called that of Kash. It had been the residence of Mohammedan princes, of several races, from the time of the Arabs, who conquered it very early: and, about 140 years after Jenghîz Khân, Timûr Bek, or Tamerlane, made it the seat of his empire. At present it is the seat of one of the three Uzbek Khâns, who reign in Great Bukhâria, the other two residing at Bokhâra and Bâlkh. Its publick structures and market-places are very handsome, being built and paved with very fine stone. It carries on a great trade with Great Tatory, Persia, and India; furnishing Hindustân, in particular, with the best fruits, especially excellent melons. The finest silk-paper in the world is made here; and an academy of sciences helps to render it famous².

The city besieged:

its brave de-

SOLTAN MOHAMMED, to secure this city against the Mungls, had sent thither 110,000 men, under 30 generals: 60,000 were Turks, commanded by officers of great renown: the rest were Taji's (M), men brave enough to face lions or elephants; of which last there were twenty large ones: besides, the inhabitants, joined to those who had retired thither for shelter, were so very numerous, that the city, though so extensive, could scarcely contain them. On the arrival of so powerful a reinforcement, they drew round the town a broad ditch, which they dug till they came to water, and caused the troops to encamp behind it, as a re-trenchment. On Jenghîz Khân's approach, the enemy made a furious sally; but having been driven back to the city, after a bloody action, he went next day, and encamped under the walls. When the engines were ready, he caused several places to be attacked at the same time, to terrify the besieged: but they not only sustained the shock with great resolution, but made repeated sallies, in which they cut off a great many Mungls; who, in a general assault, which was given from morning till night, could not gain one inch of ground. Nor possibly would they have taken the city, if discord had not happened between the principal inhabitants and

(K) After this he fought against the Mungls when they entered Karazm; till, seeing all lost on that side, he retired into Persia: from thence, in a religious disguise, he retired to Syria; and when the Mungls were become masters of Persia, returned thither, and submitted to the reigning prince; who gave him leave to retire to Khojend, where he found but one son living, who had permission from Batû, Khân of Kipchâk, to recover his father's estate. This making those who had possessed it his enemies, they found out the man whom Timûr Mâlek had wounded in the eye; which man one day shot him dead with an arrow, under pretence that he spoke disrespectfully to a prince of the blood, who had expressed some slight of the great actions he had performed.

(M) Taije, according to Fadhlallah, signifies a Turk-mân: but the Persian and Turkish dictionary of Nimetalah says, they were natural-born Persians, who could not speak the Turkish language. La Croix. — The word, we presume, should be Tajik, which is a nickname given by the Turks and Tatars to the natives of any country which they have brought in subjection; and particularly to those who prefer ease and trade to war. They also give that name often to the Persians, by way of malice.

a the commanders of the troops: the former, headed by the Mufti and Kadhi, joined by several lords, who were desirous to save their estates, seized one of the gates, and carried the keys to Jenghîz Khân, imploring mercy for the besieged: but that prince would grant it to none, excepting those of their party; who, on the return of their deputies, to the number of 50,000, put themselves under their protection.

MEAN while the governor Alub Khân had seized those places in the city which were of most difficult access; and, expecting no quarter, resolved to hold out to the last against the Mungls; who, having entered by the gate which was delivered to them, attacked him vigorously in his strong-holds. Alub Khân sustained their assaults for four days, with extraordinary courage: but having, by this time, lost all the posts but that which he in person defended; b he, on the fifth, accompanied by the principal officers, and one thousand chosen horse, on a sudden broke through the Mungl camp, and escaped. The remainder of the garrison, to the number of 30,000, losing all courage, on the governor's retreat, were soon overpowered, and all put to the sword; among whom was the prince of the Kangûli himself, with five or six inferior princes. After this expeditious event the Khân ordered the city to be plundered; and made a present to his generals of 30,000 inhabitants, with their wives and children. The rest were pardoned, and permitted to live in the city as before, paying him a tribute of 300,000 dinârs, or crowns of gold^a.

WHEN Jenghîz Khân was going to besiege Samarkant, he sent a detachment of 30,000 troops to pursue Soltân Mohammed; who, he was informed, was fled, by way of the river Amû, to the country of Termed. These troops were commanded by Hubbe Neviân, Suida Behadr, and Amir Tûker (N), who held the rank of princes: and the orders they received were, "to treat all those cities kindly which should open their gates; but to plunder such as c " resisted, and carry the inhabitants into captivity: to pursue Soltân Mohammed, even to " Dârbend in Shîrwân, and force their way through the territories of all such princes who " should oppose their passage. In short to subdue all the countries bordering on the Caspian " sea, and then to rejoin him in Kipjâk, or Kapchâk; adding, that he did not intend to stay " long in those southern provinces."

THESE three generals departed in June 1220; and, led by a false report, marched towards Bâlk: but hearing no news of the Soltân, Tûker advanced still towards India; and the other d two struck off towards Herat, the capital of Khorassân. The governor Amîn Mâlek, a relation of the Soltân, being in no condition to resist on so sudden an invasion, sent to tell them he was a servant of Jenghîz Khân. Upon this the generals, without making any stay, or committing the least disorder, went forwards towards the city of Zâveh, situate between Herat and Nishâbûr. Tûker, some time after, having returned from the borders of India, arrived in the country of Herat, where he committed some hostilities, not knowing, or pretending not to know, that the governor had submitted to his colleagues. Hereupon the prince Amîn Mâlek sent a messenger to them, to complain of the injury. Mean time some troops, belonging to the city, joining the country people who had taken arms, formed an army so superior to Tûker's, that he was defeated, and killed with an arrow. After which the remainder of his e troops went and joined the other two generals^b.

WHEN Hubbe and Suida came to Zâveh, the inhabitants shut the gates against them; nor would the governor, by any persuasion, supply them with provisions, of which they were in want. This so incensed the Mungls, that they immediately fell to attack the city, with such fury; that, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the besieged, they took it in three days, though not without great loss; which they repaid themselves, by putting to the sword all who fell into their hands, and plundering the houses. The army from hence marched to Nishâbûr, on advice of a spy that the Soltân was there. But Mohammed had left that place some time before, and gone into Persian Irâk, by persuasion of his grandson Amedo'ddîn (O); whose father Rokno'ddîn being prince of that rich and populous province, he might f then be enabled to revenge himself on Jenghîz Khân. But Amedo'ddîn deceived both the king and himself; for Irâk was not by much so powerful a country as Khorassân, which contained the most populous cities, as well as most beautiful and wealthy provinces.

On the approach of the Mungl generals to Nishâbûr, three lords were sent to meet them, and, in the name of the governor, made their submission (P); promising to pay the money demanded, besides tribute, to furnish all sorts of refreshments, and not to assist or succour their enemies. The generals, satisfied with these marks of obedience, continued their pursuit of a Soltân Mohammed; who, from Nishâbûr, went to Bastâm, a very pleasant and strong city of Tabarestân: where he delivered to the Amîr Omar, one of the stewards of his household, ten coffers, sealed with the royal signet, filled with jewels, several of an inestimable value. None in the world, excepting two more then present, knew what was in these coffers, which he ordered Omar to carry forthwith to the strong fortrefs of Ardabân. From Bastâm he proceeded to Irâk, and stopped (Q) at Maradawled Abâd, a town depending on Hamadân, where his son Rokno'ddîn came to meet him with some troops: which, being joined with those the Soltân had levied in the way, made about 20,000 horse.

(P) According to Abûlghazi Khân, the generals summoned four lords, left to command in that place by Soltân Mohammed; and that their answer was, for them to proceed in their pursuit of the Soltân; and that, at their return, they would deliver up the city to them: with which answer the generals were satisfied.

overtaken.

MEAN time the Mungls followed him with so much diligence, that they surprized him at Farzîna, not far from Maradawlet, where they cut to pieces the greater part of his army: b yet both Rokno'ddîn and the Soltân escaped; the first fled to Kermân; and Mohammed, with a small number of officers, got by several bye-ways into the province of Gbilân; and from thence to Estâdâd, the strongest city in all Mazânderân, and most difficult of access. There he might have lain concealed from the parties sent out to get news of him; if a lord of that country, to revenge his uncle's death, had not, with a small party of Mungls, found out the road he had taken. But being near Estâdâd, he learned from some peasants that the Soltân was in a town near the Caspian sea, where he daily assisted at the public prayers; promising a mighty reformation, in case God would deliver him from the present danger, and re-establish him in his throne.

Flies to Abis-
kûn,

BUT while he flattered himself with the vain hopes of good effects from a late repentance, c news was brought him that the Mungls, with the Persian lord at their head, were approaching the town. The Soltân, on this advice, abandons his prayers, to provide for his safety; and had scarce gotten on board the bark which he had provided for the purpose, when the enemy appeared on the shore: and finding they had missed of their prey, endeavoured in vain to reach him with their arrows. The miserable monarch, overwhelmed with affliction, fell ill of a pleurisy, which obliged him to stop at an island called Abiskûn (R), and at length carried him off, maugre all the skill of his physicians. A few days before his death, prince Jalâlo'ddîn, being informed that he was in this island, came secretly thither, with two of his brothers. On his arrival, the Soltân said to him, "Prince, you are the person among all my children who d "are the most able to revenge me on the Mungls; therefore I revoke the act which I formerly "made, at the request of the queen my mother, in favour of my son Kothbo'ddîn." Then he appointed him to be his successor, and commanded the other princes his sons to obey him. At the same time he gave him his sword, and sent him to look after the affairs of state. After this he expired, under the covert of a little tent, which had been set up for him. The first gentleman of his bed-chamber washed his body, and wrapped it in a shirt; having no other linen, to bury it. But some years after Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn had his bones taken up, and carried with great pomp into the fortrefs of Ardabân.

(Q) Abû'lghazi Khân says, that he went for Kazvin, where his son Soltân Rokno'ddîn commanded, with a body of 30,000 men: and that, at his approach, Rokno'ddîn went to meet him, with a detachment of his troops, and conducted him into the city with the greatest marks of respect.

(R) Or Aboskûn: Abû'lghazi Khân calls it Aboskûn Kasîra, instead of Jezîra, which signifies island. It lies not far from Astarabâd, in the south-east corner of the Caspian sea.

Progress of the

rals.

THIS is the account given by La Croix; but Abû'lghazi Khân relates matters with no a small variation. He tells us, that the two Mungl generals, having left Nishâbûr, marched to the city Mazânderân, and having carried it by force, cut the throats of all the inhabitants: that then they proceeded towards Kazvin, and did the like to all towns which resisted, but treated kindly such as submitted: that they passed by the town of Ilân, where the Soltân's mother and youngest children were shut up, without attacking it, because it was very strong by situation, and appeared resolved to defend itself vigorously; but that the town of Rudîn was plundered, and all the inhabitants slain, for offering to resist: that Soltân Mohammed, on the approach of the Mungls to Kazvin, resolved to retire to the town of Karendâr, but by the way

- a way fell among some Mungl troops, and narrowly escaped being made prisoner, having had his horse shot under him: that, some time after, hearing the Mungls were advancing also to Karendâr, he retired into the province of Ghilân: that the general, leaving some troops about Karendâr, pursued the Soltân with the rest, while he went to Istadûra, in Ghilân, having in his way lost his money, and all his equipage: that from Istadûra he embarked on the Kulsum, or Caspian sea, and arrived in the island of Aboskûm: that being thus escaped, the generals returned, and took Karendâr, after a very vigorous resistance; where the Soltâna, wife of Mohammed, and his son Kiyaso'ddîn, fell into their hands: that from thence they went and took Ilân, where they found the mother and children of the Soltân, whom Jenghiz Khân caused to be slain on the spot: lastly, that, on this afflicting piece of news, Soltân Mohammed fell down dead; and, for want of things convenient to bury him honourably, was interred in his clothes^a. In this account of matters, besides other variations, Abû'lghazi Khân has joined transactions together, which La Croix relates to have been done in different expeditions, as the reader will see hereafter.

- THE Mungl generals, who had been in pursuit of him, believing that he had put to sea with design to retire into the country of Karazm, or some neighbouring territory, gave notice of his flight to Jenghiz Khân, then at Samarkant; who thereupon had him searched for all over that kingdom, and in every other place where he judged him likely to be found. After this he sent three of his sons, Fuji, Oktay, and Jagatay, with a numerous army, to attack the capital of Karazm. This is the country called by the ancient Greeks Khorasmia. It has on the west the Caspian sea; on the north Turkestan; on the east Great Bukhâria, from whence it is separated by deserts; and on the south the province of Khorassân, in Persia. There is in it, to the north, a vast lake, then called the lake of Karazm, and at present Arâl Nor, or the lake of eagles. The river Amû, called by the Arabs Jihân, which divided Great Bukhâria from Persia, ran into it; and, after a progress of fifty or sixty leagues to the northwest, parted into two large branches, both which, after a long course between the west and south, discharged themselves into the Caspian sea. Most of the cities and towns of this kingdom were situated on this great river, all built of brick, and some very beautiful, especially on the south side. Those which were farthest up in the country were of the least consideration. The capital city was called Karazm by the natives, Korkanj by the Persians, and Orkanj, or Urghenj, ^{its capital described.} by the Mungls; which name it still retains. It stood on the south side of the most northern of the two branches of the Amû, which about 100 years ago, forsook its antient chanel, and now falls into the lake of eagles. The country of Karazm, whose name extended to all the other provinces which composed the empire of Soltân Mohammed and his predecessors, abounded with learned men, skilled in philosophy and the sciences. Poetry reigned there: and few orientals were more polite than the inhabitants. They applied themselves much to music: or rather were naturally musicians. In short, it became a common saying over the east, with regard to their children, that they discovered something of harmony even in their crying.

- THE Mungl princes had orders to march, without stopping, to the capital of Karazm, and besiege it; that, by taking it, the rest of the cities might be struck with terror, and the country reduced at one blow. They had made vast preparations for this purpose, expecting to meet with a vigorous resistance, as it was the metropolis of the Karazmian empire, and the constant residence of the queen-mother Turkbân Khâtûn, ever since the death of her husband Takash. This princess was daughter of Hankâshi, a Turkish king (A), who dying without issue, his subjects submitted to Soltân Mohammed; who, by that means, extended his empire far among the Turks inhabiting Tartary. She was a woman of superior wit, and wrote finely. For these reasons she had almost an absolute authority in the Soltân's dominions. She took the title of protectress of the faith, and of the world: also that of the queen of women. She protected the weak against the powerful; administered justice impartially; and examined matters with such application, that her judgments were always right. She was very charitable to the poor. But these good qualities were blemished by her cruelty. She loved to shed blood: and when, on the approach of the Mungls, she resolved to quit the kingdom, she put to death twelve children of sovereign princes, whom she kept prisoners; among whom was the son of Togrul, the last of the Seljuks of Irân, whom Takash her husband had before put to death. She afterwards caused Omar Khân to be slain, who conducted her to the castle of Elîk, in Mazânderân. She hated Jalâlo'ddîn, and had even prevailed on her son Mohammed to disinheritor him, in favour of his brother Kotbbo'ddîn, whom she loved: but when she was informed that he had cancelled his will, she took no more care to strengthen Karazm; and the same cause made her resolve to abandon the country, as soon as she heard that the Mungls were advancing towards it.

(A) He was probably Khân of the Kanguli, or Kaukli, who inhabited the eastern parts of Turkestan, towards Kafigâr.

HER departure bred great confusion in the capital. Some lords took on them the government, in behalf of Jalâlo'ddîn: but by the time that prince arrived there, the most considerable persons in the kingdom had formed a conspiracy against him, in favour of Kothbo'ddîn. This made the prince retire from Karazm, with only 300 horse out of 7000, whom he had brought thither: yet with these few he defeated 700 Mungls, who attacked him near Nesâ, in Kborassân; and then took his way to Nisshabûr, in the same province. There Jalâlo'ddîn, who had assumed the name of Soltân, gave orders for raising an army; but hearing the enemies were on their march towards him, after a month's stay, he left that city, in order to avoid them: yet had the ill luck to meet with two parties of them. The first he defeated; the last, which was more numerous, surrounded him: and though he escaped out of their hands, yet they killed two of his brothers, who were with him, and almost all his men. But we shall leave him for a while, to attend the siege of the capital of Karazm^b.

vaded.*

THE Karazmians, surprised at the unexpected approach of the Mungl princes, the factions re-united for their mutual safety, and gave the management of affairs to a lord of that country, and relation of the queen, named Hîmar Takîn (B). As this lord had no news of their march, and believed them still at a great distance, he had given the inhabitants leave to let their cattle graze in the meadows near the town: which gave the van-guard of the Mungls an opportunity, on their arrival, to surprize the greater part of them. The Karazmians, upon this, made a sally with 10,000 men, and coming up with the enemy, who retired leisurely toward a garden belonging to the city, attacked them briskly: but when they were so far engaged as not to be able to get back, the Mungl troops, who were placed in ambush on both sides of that garden, coming out of their concealment, fell upon them in the rear; while the rest charged them in front so vigorously, that scarce one hundred of them escaped the slaughter. After this, the Mungls marched as far as the suburbs of the city, where they put to the sword all they found in arms: and, after plundering, set fire to it. Next day the whole army came before the place, and laid siege to it in form.

tacked.*

As there was no fear of any army coming to relieve the city, they made no intrenchments or lines. When all things were ready for an attack, the princes sent to summon the governor to surrender; and let him know that, if he refused, he was to expect no quarter. This menace having no effect on Hîmar Takîn, the Mungls made a general assault, which was sustained by the besieged with equal bravery. The very women did the duty of soldiers; and not only assisted those who defended the walls, but, mounting on horseback, put themselves among the troops which sallied forth: for the women in those countries can ride and draw the bow, as well as the men. The Mungls, though still repulsed, never failed repeating their assaults, till at length they fell short of stones to supply the engines; and were forced to batter the town with the trunks of mulberry trees, cut in pieces.

fended,*

THE princes, believing this place would be as easy to take as they found others, to save time and labour, neglected to fill up the ditches, which now they saw there was a necessity of doing: but as they were filled with water from the river, this could not be done without diverting the stream, by means of a canal. The siege had now lasted seven months, when they began this work with 3000 men; and had made a considerable progress, when one night the besieged making a sally, cut them almost all to pieces. However, the canal was at length finished; and the river being turned into it, the ditch was soon filled up with earth, straw, and faggots, in spite of all opposition (C). This obstruction being removed, the batteries were redoubled, and several breaches made. Hereupon ensued a general assault, in which the Mungl standards were planted on the walls: but such was the courage of the besieged, that they quickly tore them down again; drove back the assailants; and even repaired their breaches.

*to the last ex-
tremitly.*

THIS ill success bred a misunderstanding between Fuji and Jagatay; each accusing the other with being the cause of the siege lasting so long, through too much care of his own safety. This dissention made the siege go on more heavily than before; and Jenghîz Khân, hearing of it, ordered them to resign the whole command to Oktay. After this, the face of things began to change: although the besieged were not less valorous, yet they had not so good success in their sallies as before. On the other hand, the Mungls, having made new breaches, gained the outworks in a furious assault, and set up their standards on the towers; while the besieged, unable to pluck them down, retired into the city, to the places they had fortified. Many of these were at length taken, and the citadel itself: yet still the governor rejected the proposals a made by Oktay to surrender, because no mention was made of giving liberty to the inhabitants.

THE Mungls, enraged at this refusal, set fire to the houses on every side, which consumed ^{Terrible} great numbers of people, and immense riches. As this was a loss to them, they soon forbore, ^{slaughter.} and applied themselves to attack the several quarters of the city : while the Karazmians had so intrenched themselves, that one quarter succoured another ; and when one was forced, the defenders found shelter in the next. The attacks continued night and day, with extreme fatigue on both sides. At last, the brave Himar Takin was killed by an arrow : yet still the remainder of the citizens held out to the utmost extremity ; and when they saw they could no longer resist, they set fire to the houses which remained, to disappoint their enemies of the plunder. But the Mungls, in revenge, put to the sword all the Karazmians they met with, amounting to 100,000, some say 200,000, persons ; and Oktay had much ado to make the slaughter cease. After this, the rest of the inhabitants were ordered to go out of the town ; and, with their wives and children, were condemned to slavery. Some say, the men amounted to 100,000 : others, that the number of the whole was so great, that, in the distribution which Oktay made of them among his troops, every foldier had twenty-four to his share.

AMONG those who fell a sacrifice on this occasion, was Sheykh Hafreti Kubru, surnamed Najmo'ddin, whose rare example deserves our eulogy. Oktay, who had a great respect for this person, from the report of his piety, sent first to offer a passport for himself and ten ; then for a thousand, of his friends ; but he refused to accept of that bounty, unless all the Mohammedans in the city were permitted to share with him : sending the prince for answer, " that he " was obliged to take a lot with the rest, by ties too strong to be so easily broken". Accordingly he was slain among the thickest of them, after he had defended himself with the utmost bravery. This was true patriotism ! this was love for his countrymen !

THE capital of Karazm was taken and ruined towards the end of the winter 618 : after which, fear seizing the rest of the people, all the other cities, as Kât, Ferâbr, Dargân, or ^{Other cities submit.} Durân, and Zamâkshâr, surrendered without making any resistance. Then leaving troops in the country, to keep it in subjection, Oktay departed, with the remainder of his army, to join his father ^c.

IN the mean time Jenghiz Khân, after staying all the spring about Samarkand, delighted with the country, began to think of pursuing his conquests. He set out from Samarkand about the same time that his three sons marched for Karazm. On his approach, several towns opened their gates to him ; among which was Nakshâb ; where, pleased with the air and soil, he stayed most part of the summer. Then setting forward towards Termed, by way of Kolûga, or ^{Termed de-} iron gate, a passage cut in the rocks, he was some weeks on his march to that city, which is ^{scribed.} the last belonging to Great Bukhâria, towards Tokbârestân. It was situated on the river Amû ; and, being very commodious for trade, had a port much frequented by barks. Soltân Mohammed had conquered it, not long before, from Babrâm Shâh, who was among those princes put to death by the queen-mother, at her leaving Karazm. It was dependant on Kash, or Kesh, although it had a great many places under its jurisdiction. The walls of Termed were cased with bricks ; and it had a castle, defended on one side by the river : so that the inhabitants believed themselves strong enough to amuse the Mungls till the arrival of Soltân Jalâlo'ddin, who had given them hopes of coming to their relief.

JENGHIZ KHAN, being informed of their resolution, shut them up close, by very deep and ^{Cruel massacre.} wide lines, which he ordered to be cast up round the place. For eleven days the besieged defended it, with the utmost bravery : but their walls being by that time battered down, and Jalâlo'ddin not appearing to succour them, the Mungls stormed and took the city ; with a most cruel butchery of all the garrison and inhabitants, excepting some young people reserved for slavery. Some say, all were massacred, excepting one old woman, who offered a great pearl to save her life. Being asked, where the pearl was ? and telling them, she had swallowed it, they ripped her up ; and, finding it, opened the bellies of all the rest whom they had slain, in expectation of finding jewels. The Grand Khân caused the town to be razed, and then went into winter-quarters. Among the towns which had submitted on this side were those of Langberta, Samanda, and Badakshân. The two first, shewing a regret for what they had done, were plundered, and very ill treated, by the ravaging Tatars : but the last city was only stripped of its wealth ; consisting chiefly in hyacinths and rubies, with which they hills in its territory abound. They likewise produce fine azure, good bezoar, and excellent chrystal of the east ^d.

BEFORE the army went into winter-quarters, Jenghiz Khân sent a detachment of 20,000 ^{Affairs of} of his best troops to Hubbe Nevian and Suida Behadr, for the ensuing year. The two gene- ^{Khorassân;} rals were on the northern borders of Khorassân when they received their master's orders : but, not to be idle while the expected supplies were on the road, they divided their troops; Hubbe a marching towards Mazânderân, and Suida directing his course to Helvâs. After they had ravaged those countries, they returned to Khorassân, where Aynanje Khân, one of Soltân Moham- med's officers, with some troops, gave the Mungls much uneasiness. Suida strove to force him to fight; which, at last, he effected; but was defeated. The Mohammedan lord, in the pursuit, meeting, near Nak Shivân, with a brigade of Tatars, who were retiring into that place, fell on, and drove them into the ditch, where they were all drowned. After this, being joined by other disbanded troops, he levied contributions, and with the tax-money of Nisa, provided for his little army: but retired to the mountains, on the arrival of the expected reinforcements, which were commanded by two Nevians, Jaffer and Iko, each at the head of a Toman; who had orders, in the first place, to reduce Nesa, as it was a hindrance to the conquest of Khorassân. b

Nesa taken, and

NESA, or Nisa (D), was situated on the borders of the desert towards Karazm: it had, in times past, served as a frontier between the Turks and Persians. Soltân Moham- med, after taking this city from the children of Nasro'ddîn, its sovereign prince, caused the citadel to be demolished: but afterwards permitted the inhabitants to rebuild it: and, it being a well fortified place, they hoped to hold it out long. When the Mungls had invested the city, they sent to offer very reasonable terms to the governor: but during the treaty some Karazmians imprudently shot at the besiegers; and, having slain Balkûsh, their lieutenant-general, they resolved to revenge his death. They battered the walls with twenty great engines; and in their approaches made their slaves go before, carrying on their backs pieces of wood covered with c raw hides, to avoid the wild-fire of the defendants, who made a vigorous resistance. As they pursued their assaults day and night, after fifteen days siege, they made a breach; which the inhabitants not being able to repair, they, in the night, seized the walls, and became masters of the place. Next day they ordered them, as usual, to turn out into the plain; where, surrounding them, they shot at them with darts and arrows, like beasts in a chase. Thus all were slain, natives, strangers, and peasants, retired thither for safety, to the number of 70,000. Shabâbo'ddîn, one of the Soltân's ministers of state, and his son, who had taken shelter there, with their treasure, were brought in chains before the Nevians; who, having emptied their coffers, ordered their hands to be smitten off.

Kaendar fortress besieged.

THREE days after, they went and besieged the citadel of Kaendar (E). This place was d accounted the strongest in all Khorassân, and was in the road from Nesa to Nishâbûr. It was governed by Mehemed Nisâvi (F), to whom it properly belonged: and hither was retired Nezâmo'ddîn, one of the greatest lords of the country, with all his treasure. This nobleman three days before the arrival of the enemy, talking to the governor about the place, which he deemed impregnable on account of its situation, said to him, we will wait the Tatars coming here: but when he saw they attacked it on the weakest side, was so affrighted, that he desired Nisâvi to let him down with ropes into the plain, and had the good look to escape. The Mungls battered this citadel a long time: but the besieged made so brave a defence, that the general, despairing to take it with the troops he had with him, offered to raise the siege, in lieu of clothes, and other things, which his soldiers stood in need of. This the governor thought e proper to comply with; but the difficulty was to find officers, who would venture to accompany the bearers of the presents; believing, that the enemy were cruel enough to revenge on them the shameful retreat they saw themselves obliged to make. After many had refused the employment, two venerable old men undertook it; but had no sooner discharged their commission, than the Mungls were really so base, says our author, as to imbrue their hands in their blood (G). At last the two Nevians raised the siege, and ravaged the country.

Damegân deserted:

AFTER this, Suida came to meet them, and all three went to join Hubbe Nevian, who was upon another expedition. They marched by the desert, and other roads, to attack Damegân, the capital of Kumas: a considerable city, situated in a vast plain, washed by many streams of rock-water, for their excellency called the waters of Khosraw, or Kosroes; because that king f had them conveyed by fine aqueducts into the town, and would never drink of any other. Finding Damegân quite deserted by the inhabitants, who with their best effects had fled to the woods and mountains, and nothing left to content their avarice, they marched, and sat down before Amol (H); which they took, as also several other towns in the eastern Tabarestân.

(D) Abûlghazi Khân calls it Naysay. It went also by the name of Little Damaskus, for its agreeable situation.

(E) The same, doubtless, with Karandâr, mentioned by Abûlghazi Khân.

(F) Author of the life of Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn, often cited in this history.

(G) We shall not dispute this fact, although Nisâvi was greatly prejudiced against the Mungls, in behalf of his master Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn: but however that be, we may depend upon it, that the place was not taken, as Abûlghazi Khân relates; and in it the Soltân's wife and son, as before has been mentioned.

(H) A city of Mazânderân, near the borders of Ghilân, and about one day's journey from the Caspian sea.

- a HUBBE NEVIAN, in the expedition above-mentioned acquired no less reputation than the surrendered, other generals. He not only reduced all the Western Tabarestân, which is called Mazânderân; but even seized on the queen mother, Turkbân Khâtûn, who had retired thither, with her immense riches. As Jenghiz Khân had spies or correspondents in every part of the Karazmian empire, he learned by one of them, that she was lodged in the fortress of Ilâl (I), and immediately sent a courier to acquaint Hubbe with the news; ordering him to run all hazards to take that place. The general had for three months battered it in vain: when Jenghiz Khân, who was informed how things stood, judging that it might be more easily reduced by famine, ordered him to build a strong wall without his lines, whose gates should be kept shut in the night; and to guard all places strictly, that the besieged might receive no succours.
- b This was done accordingly: and, although the governor had no thoughts of yielding, and pretended that he stood in need of nothing; yet in three weeks more, provisions having intirely for want of failed, and many of the garrison, as well as inhabitants, being already dead, for want of water, water, the queen was forced to capitulate.

THIS want of water passed in the country for a miracle: for although there were neither wells in the town, nor rivers in the neighbourhood, yet it was situate in so rainy a climate, rain falling there every day, that it had never been in want of water before. As therefore it had not rained one drop during the whole siege, the inhabitants concluded it a judgment to punish Turkbân Khâtûn for having unjustly put to death so many kings and princes (K). What confirmed them in their opinion was, that the place was no sooner surrendered, but there fell

- c such abundance of rain that the streets were overflowed.

- HUBBE NEVIAN, knowing the extremities to which Ilâl, was reduced, would not grant Queen mother any thing to the queen more than her life. So soon as the Mungls took possession of the place, seized, they seized her treasure, and treated her as a captive. She was sent to Jenghiz Khân, under a strong guard, with her women, grand-children, and all the lords who had retired with her into the fortress. She sacrificed herself to the hatred she bore Soltân Jalâlo'ddin. Instead of desiring success to his arms, she did nothing but wish all sorts of misfortunes might attend him: and, although she might have safely retired under his protection, some days before the place was besieged; yet, inflexible to all arguments, she protested that the lowest condition, and most rigorous treatment from the Mungls, would be more agreeable to her, than all the marks of friendship she could receive from the son of Ayjeak, her mortal enemy. Such were the sentiments of this implacable grand-mother; and the treatment she met with was such as her malice and bloody disposition deserved: for Jenghiz Khân had her sometimes brought into his presence when at table, and threw her scraps of meat he had eaten of, as if she had been a dog. Her cruelty They put to death her great grand-children, before she arrived at court, and left only the youngest alive to comfort her. Nor did that comfort remain with her long: for one day, as she was combing his head, a person came and snatched him from her arms. This, she said, was the most sensible loss she had till then felt, and her grief was indeed most bitter. The young princesses, her great grand-daughters, were not so unfortunate: for, not only their lives were spared, but they were married to Mungl lords of the first rank. Nay, prince Tusbi (or Juji) himself espoused Khân Soltâna, who had before been married to Ozmân Khân, prince of Samarkant. Such was the fate of this once great queen; who was led, as in triumph, some years after (L), through the same countries where she had governed.

AFTER Hubbe Nevian had left the fortress of Ilâl, he went directly to Ray, or Rey (the Ray taken, ancient Ragau, or Rages), where Suida, and the other two commanders, came to join him from Khorassân; of which they had reduced all the north and west parts, excepting Nishabûr; for the place, according to the capitulations granted them by the two generals, remained quiet, till Soltân Jalâlo'ddin took shelter there.

- THE city of Rey seemed able to make a vigorous defence: but the Mungls took it with a great deal of ease, by means of the dissention, on account of religion, which subsisted among
- f the inhabitants: for, being divided into two factions, one of which followed the doctrines of Abû Hanifah, and the other those of Shâfay (M), the Kâzi of the city, who was of the last party, went with the chief persons of his sect, and offered Hubbe the place, in the name of the Shâfays: who delivered him two gates, by which the Mungls entered. The other party, who had fortified themselves, made some resistance, more out of hatred to the Shâfays, than to the Mungls themselves. But the general forced them to yield, and, induced by the ill opinion which the Kâzi had created in him of the Abû Hanîfa sect, put them almost all to death (N). So that not above one half of the inhabitants of Rey were left alive.

(I) Alâ'ghazi Khân calls it Ilân.

(K) Hence, according to Alâ'ghazi Khân, the inhabitants obliged their governor Nâiro'ddin to go to the Mungl camp, and capitulate for them.

(L) Abû'ghazi Khân writes, that Jenghiz Khân ordered her and all her great grand-children to be slain, as soon as they arrived in his camp.

(M) Two of the four sects who were heads of the orthodox sect among the Mohammedans.

(N) At which, no doubt, their charitable brethren the Shâfays, or Shafays rejoiced.

Kom taken.

HUBBE and Suida remained for some time at Rey, invited by the beauty of that city, which was one of the four most considerable in all Irak; the three others being Hamadân, Kom, and Ispâhân. So soon as the season permitted to take the field, they again parted: Hubbe marched towards Hamadân, and Suida towards Kazvîn. The first being arrived at Kom, which he took in his way, and is twenty leagues distant, summoned the inhabitants to surrender: but although they did not submit to it, yet they made so little resistance, that they seemed intitled to the mercy granted to places which opened their gates. But the deputies of the Shâsfays, bearing an implacable hatred to the Hanifabs, whom they call Rafezi, or heretics, told Hubbe of Kom were very mutinous; adding, it was no wonder, since they followed the doctrines of Abû Hanîfab. In short, they so incensed him against them; that, under pretence one of his orders had not been well observed, he caused the greater part of them to be killed, or carried away slaves.

Hamadân makes peace.

HUBBE a few days after marched for Hamadân, and made great preparations to besiege it: but, when all things were ready to storm the place, he, all of a sudden, clapped up a peace with Majedo'ddîn, who commanded there. The army was the more surprised at this, because the inhabitants had appeared more insolent than others who had not been pardoned, and even committed some outrages against the Mungls. The general's enemies reported, that he had been corrupted; but his friends maintained, that he had only followed the orders of Jenghîz Khân. Hamadân (O) is fifty leagues distant from Kom. It was a great and populous city, and had often been the abode of kings. It had very strong walls, and a good castle, which is now in ruins. Its beauty at present consists in its gardens and fountains; which take their rise from the mountain Alwend, not far distant, and abounding with 1000 springs.

Other cities reduced.

FROM hence Hubbe led his troops to reduce other parts of Irak; and, in a short time, made himself master of Dinewar, or Daynûr, Sâvan, Holwân, Nahawend, and several other cities in that province: by which conquests he acquired much riches. As for Suida Babadr, who was gone to besiege Kazvîn, which is situate between Rey and Abher, on the confines of Ghilân and Mazanderân, he carried it by storm, and put to the sword 50,000 persons in this city, Deylem, and other neighbouring countries. All these expeditions were performed in the year of the Hejrah 618^f.

Hej. 618. A. D. 1221. General hunting,

MEAN while Jenghîz Khân, after the taking of Termed, to keep his soldiers in action during the winter, ordered a great hunting to be performed in the plains of that city. The huntsmen having marked the outward circle, which is called Nerke, the several officers with their troops took their posts round it. Then at the sound of martial instruments, they all set forward at once, moving towards the centre, driving the beast before them, which happened to be within the inclosed space: but it was forbidden to kill or wound any animal, whatever violence it offered them. At night they incamped, with all the order observed in war. Thus they marched for some weeks; when the beasts, finding themselves pressed by the circle contracting, ran for shelter among the mountains and forests; from whence they soon after fled on scent of the hunters, who opened the very burrows with spades, or sent in ferrets, to dislodge the animals. But, the compass of the ground still growing less and less, the beasts, for want of room, began to mix with one another; and, becoming furious, leaping on the weakest, and tore them to pieces. Nor was it without great toil and difficulty that the soldiers could drive them forward with their shouts. At length, when the troops were arrived at the inner circle, called Jerk, which inclosed a small spot of ground where all the animals might be seen together, the drums, timbrels, and other instruments, were ordered to strike up at once: the sound of which joined to the shouts and cries of the hunters, so affrighted them, that they lost all their fierceness; the lions and tigers grew tame as lambs; the bears and wild boars, like the most timorous creatures, seemed dejected and amazed.

at Termed.

THE Grand Khân, attended by his sons and principal officers, first entered the Jerk with his sword and bow, and began the slaughter by striking the fiercest beasts; some of which became furious, and endeavoured to defend their lives. Then retiring to an eminence, where a throne was set for him, he beheld the attack; in which none avoided danger, or gave back, let the event be what it would. When the princes and lords had given sufficient proof of their courage and agility, the young soldiers entered the circle, and made great havock among the poor beasts. At last the Khân's grandsons, attended by several young lords, approaching the throne, intreated him, in a speech, to give those which remained their lives and liberty; which grace he granted, and then sent back his troops to quarters, after the chase had continued four months.

(O) It is the Ematha of the Old Testament, and the Ekkatana of the Greeks; although by most geographers held to be Tauris. Al'Isfeda affirms it to be Ekkatana; and its name bears affinity with Ematha, or Amatha.

- a IN the end of March, Jenghîz Khân broke up his camp; and, passing the Amû, marched in Balk besieged, haste towards Balk[§]; against which he had taken great disgust, for giving shelter to Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn; who from thence infested the Mungls with his troops, while employed in reducing Great Bukhâria. The inhabitants, unwilling to hazard a siege, determined to surrender; and the great lords of the country, who had retired thither, went with the city officers to meet Jenghîz Khân, carrying with them an immense quantity of rich presents. But he rejected their offers; and said, those people, who had so kindly received his enemy, could not have a sincere friendship for him. On this occasion he mentioned the troops they had raised for him, and sums advanced to pay them; with many other instances of their attachment to his interest. Then, reproaching them, said, “ought not you to blush with shame, for having so little love
b “for your natural prince, and so little aversion to the tyrants who have put him in irons? Is it “thus you ought to treat those who, after having stripped Omido'ddîn, your sovereign, of his “kingdoms, have cruelly put him and his son to death?”

MEAN time the Mungl army marched to the city; and the inhabitants, knowing it had been agreed to open the gates, suffered the van-guard to enter, without resistance, ^{and taken.} They were all ordered forthwith to go forth into the plain; where, the young people fit for slaves being set apart, the greater part of the old men were beheaded (P). After which the city was plundered, and the walls demolished. The Mungls were greatly enriched by the spoil of Balk; for it had always been a place of much trade. Moreover, it was full of monuments, of exquisite workmanship, and all things which could serve to adorn so great a city; having been the abode
c of many persons famous in all arts. The public buildings were spacious and regular, the karawânserays or inns, the mosques, and colleges, very magnificent. There were reckoned to be 1200 temples, besides small chapels, and 200 (Q) public baths, for foreign merchants, and other strangers.

BALK is situate eight leagues distant from the river Jihûn, or Amû, and four from the mountains; in a most fertile plain, planted with sugar canes and limon-trees. Its suburbs were <sup>The city descri'ed.</sup> watered by the river Dabak, which falls into the Amû, about twelve leagues from the city; at present one of the three capitals of the Uzbek Tatars inhabiting Great Bukhâria: although Balk properly belongs to Khorassân, the adjoining province of Irân, or Persia at large.

- AFTER Jenghîz Khân had thus reduced Balk, he sent his son Tuli (or Tawlay), with an Talkhân, ^{its} d army of fourscore thousand men, into Persia, to pursue Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn, and another large ^{strength.} detachment towards India; then marched himself to besiege Talkhân; a place extremely strong by its situation, and dependant on Tokhârestân. It was situated towards Marû, in Khorassân, which Tuli was ordered to besiege. The city formerly had been very flourishing: but there remained nothing of it then except the citadel; which being very large, they gave it the title of a city, or fortress. It stood on the top of the mountain Nokrekûb, or the silver mountain, from the mines of that metal which it contained; and was built by a prince of Tokhârestân.

- BESIDES the natural strength of the place, the garrison were provided with all sorts of stores, ^{Besieged, and,} and provisions for a long siege: whereas the Mungls had neither ground nor trenches to shelter them; making use of blinds to ward-off the darts and wild-fire. The besieged killed so great e a number of them, that the Khân repented his having meddled with this place; yet, not able to bear a disappointment, and fearing, through his losses, that he had not troops enough to reduce it; he sent couriers for Tuli to return forthwith, under pretence of the excessive heats. Mean time he let his army rest for some weeks, and then ordered the rocks to be scaled on all sides, by means of grappling-irons, long nails, hooks, ladders, and ropes; in order to oblige the f besieged to divide their forces. The Mungls made several attempts to get up, in which they ^{at length,} were frustrated by the watchful garrison, who killed great numbers of them: yet were they ^{taken.} supported in mounting the ladders with so many engines, that at length a good body of them got together on the top of the mountain. This so astonished the besieged, that, running hastily to repulse them, they imprudently left some posts unguarded; which the Mungls immediately
f seized, and entered the town. The garrison, returning in confusion to drive them out again, were overpowered and put to the sword by their stronger enemies; who, to revenge the death of their companions, and the hardships they had suffered during a seven months siege, exercised all the cruelties imaginable. Thus the fortress was taken without Tuli's assistance, who did not arrive till after its reduction (R). Let us now see what conquests that prince made during his expedition in Khorassân^h.

Marû surrendered.

TULI KHAN, after a long march into Khorassân, having learned that Jalâlo'ddin was gone a from Nishâbûr, according to his father's orders, returned to besiege Marû (S), Shâh Jan, or Marû Shâhî Jebân, which was very powerful, and then governed by Bukha al Mulk, put in by Soltân Mohammed, in place of Mâsar al Mulk, who was turned out on account of his father's disgrace. While Tuli was besieging the city of Khorassân (T), which is near to Marû, Soltân Mohammed let Bukha know, that he would do well not to oppose the Mungls, but get the best terms he could for the city. On these orders the governor abandoned the place, and retired to Wazîr, in Karazm: part of the garrison likewise dispersed themselves in the neighbouring fortresses. Tuli, being informed of all that had passed, sent two general officers with troops to take possession of Marû. At their approach, Shaykh al Islâm, father of Bukha al Molk, met them b with a numerous train, and magnificent presents, and delivered them the keys of the city. The Mungl generals, satisfied with this submission, turned their arms another way. Mean time Bukha Turkman, who had been captain of Soltân Mohammed's guides, and, at the time of the commander of Marû's retreat, had retired into a neighbouring forest, with the Turkman's belonging to the garrison; returned to that city, soon after the departure of the Mungls, followed by Tajiks, Turkmans, and others, who had fled at the enemies approach. These men conferred on him the government of Marû, and obliged the inhabitants to acknowledge him in that quality. About the same time Mâsar, or Mâjer al Molk, who, since his dismissal from that post, had resided in the province of Irâk, being informed that Soltân Mohammed was dead, mounted a swift mule, and made all the haste he could to Marû; where Bukha Turkman refused him admittance: but Mâsar having found means, some days after, to get in by stealth, Bukha, upon c notice of it, immediately assembled the inhabitants, and declared; that, for love of peace and the public good, he was willing to resign the command to their old governor, and live among them as a private man: which proposal was gladly accepted of.

Bukha baffled.

MEAN time the Mungl generals, who marched to reduce Mazânderân, on their approach to the capital of that province, were met by the Bukha al Molk, removed thither from Wazîr; who, having informed them of what had happened at Marû, offered, in case they would let him have some troops, to do his endeavour to reduce the inhabitants to their obedience. On this proposal they gave him 700 horse, with whom he marched towards Marû: but being informed on the road, that Mâsar al Molk had augmented his forces in the city to 80,000 men, he dared not proceed any farther. However, he sent two officers to him with a letter, importing, that, as he d was not in a condition to hold out long against the Mungls, he summoned him to surrender up the city to him, who was sent for that purpose with troops by the generals: but Mâsar, instead of complying with the summons, ordered the two officers to be slain: which news reaching the party commanded by Bukha al Molk, they slew him, and turned back.

Mâsar surrenders.

MASAR was so rejoiced when he heard of Bukha's death, that he gave a splendid entertainment on the occasion to the principal inhabitants of Marû. But his joy did not last long: for, next day, the governor of Amûya (U), a Turkman chief, came to acquaint him, that the Mungls were on their march towards him, by way of that place, with a powerful army. This was Tuli himself; who, having subdued the rest of Khorassân, came to pay a visit to Marû; where he e arrived on the first of Mobarram, in the year 618 (X). The inhabitants tried at first to keep him at a distance, by a vigorous sally; but, having lost above a thousand of their men in an hour's time, they returned, much chagrined. The siege having lasted three weeks, the prince began to be impatient; and, drawing out his whole army, divided it into 200 troops, placing those who were armed with bucklers in the front: but just as he was going to give the assault, Mâsar al Molk desired to capitulate. Thus Abûlghazi Khân: but La Croix, from Mirkbond, relates, that Mejir (the same Mâsar) tired the besiegers with frequent sallies; in one of which he cut in pieces above 1000 of the Grand Khân's best household troops. Tuli, to be revenged for this sensible loss, gave a general assault, which the besieged sustained with a most amazing resolution, and the Mungls were repulsed for twenty-two days successively. But as in this time the defendants were greatly weakened, Mejir, who found he could not hold out long, chose to f submit.

massacred.

THE governor and another lord having gained over their party to approve of this measure, they sent presents to Tuli, and offered him the city. The prince treated those two better than they expected: for he gave them protection for their goods, and 400 of their friends, on condition that they delivered him a list of all the rich people. Tuli, having seized the treasure, and

(X) That is, the 24th of February 1221.

- a all that could be found of any value in the city, ordered all the inhabitants to go forth into the fields: which took up the space of four days, they were so numerous. Then the tradesmen being separated from the rest, the latter were put to the sword; amounting to 120,000 persons, according to the account taken by one of his secretaries. This was the fourth time that Marû had been plundered, and each time above 50 or 60,000 inhabitants were slain. It stood in a sandy plain, which produced salt; and was rendered delightful by three rivers which watered it. It was equally distant from the cities of Nisâbûr, Herât, Balk, and Bokhara, being twelve days journey from each. The government was conferred on Amir Ziyao'ddin, a lord of that country; with orders to search for the inhabitants who might have concealed themselves, and put them in possession of their lands again, to cultivate them: but, after Tuli's departure, he
- b was slain by Barmûz, his lieutenant; and the country fell again into confusion.

AFTER the death of Soltân Mohammed, the army under Hubbe Nevân, and Suida Rohadr, Nisâbûr had subdued all the western parts of Khorassân, by taking a great number of cities; only Nisâbûr was left unmolested, having sworn fidelity to them at the beginning of their expedition, as has been already related: but the inhabitants, when they saw Soltân Jalâlo'ddin's great distress, not only supplied his troops with provisions, but also gave him money to raise forces. For all this was done so secretly that it came not to the knowledge of those generals; yet Jenghîz Khân got information of it by his spies: at which he was so enraged, that he immediately wrote to prince Tuli, to lay aside all his other designs, and go punish that rebellious city. On receipt of these orders, Tuli quitted the country of Marû, and marched to Nisâbûr; whose inhabitants, expecting no mercy, resolved to defend themselves to the last extremity¹.

- c PRINCE Tafar, who commanded the van-guard, having been killed in a sally at the beginning of the siege, Tuli ordered the army to encamp at Tushanian, a town to the east of Nisâbûr, for conveniency of making engines; which being finished, he battered the city with above twelve hundred at once. The defendants behaved like lions: but, after three days siege, a secret passage being discovered, by the falling of a wall, the Mungls entered by that way, and surprised the place; making a terrible slaughter of the inhabitants. The greater part of those who escaped the sword died in caves and vaults, which they had made to save themselves. An infinite number of young people were made slaves of, and the city itself, after being plundered, utterly destroyed to the foundations; walls, and buildings, and all. It is related, that they
- d spent twelve days in counting the dead; and that, including such as were slain in some other places dependent on Nisâbûr, one million seven hundred and forty-seven thousand persons were computed to have lost their lives. A thing which seems incredible, unless we suppose those other places to have been pretty populous; and comprise the city Tûs, twelve leagues to the north, which was taken and destroyed at the same time: but both these places soon after rose with new splendor out of their ruins. To the first was conveyed, by canals, the most excellent water, from the neighbouring mountains, which produce the finest turkoise stones. Tûs, or Tbûs, where the celebrated astronomer Naffro'ddin, surnamed Al Tûsi, was born, became one of the most beautiful as well as famous cities in the Persian empire. Ismael Sîfi, the first of the Shâhs, inclosed it with strong walls, fortified with 300 towers, and called it Mashhad, or the place of
- e martyrdom; on account of Imâm Ridha, or Riza, who was there slain. Afterwards Shâh Abbâs I. to keep the money in his kingdom, which was carried out in foreign pilgrimages, ordered his subjects to pay their devotions at that saint's shrine: and many Persian monarchs have their tombs there.

- WHEN prince Tuli had finished the sieges of these two places, he led his army towards Herât Herât, on a false information, that Soltân Jalâlo'ddin had retired thither. Whereas this prince had taken the road to Bost, in Sejestân; and had no thoughts of going to Herât, which was in the hands of a lord named Mâlek Shams'o'ddin Mohammed, who, in the absence of Amîr Mâlek, the Soltân's uncle, had surprised this city: in which he imitated the greater part of the other governors; who, during the confusion which the empire was in, set up for themselves: so that
- f Jalâlo'ddin was stripped of almost all his provinces by these usurpers. Tuli having arrived in twelve days at Herât, sent and summoned the governor to surrender: but Shams'o'ddin, who had armed 100,000 men, for defence of the place, instead of yielding, caused the envoy to be killed. After this, he made a furious sally on the Moguls, and continued to do the like for seven days successively; with such slaughter on both sides, that the blood streamed like rivers. Tuli lost that time above 1,700 officers, besides private soldiers: but on the eighth day, after a long and obstinate fight, Mâlek Shams'o'ddin was mortally wounded with an arrow; which having sunk the courage of the besieged, they retired in confusion, followed by the Mungls, who entered the city with them. Tuli, who headed them, took off his casque, and called out to the inhabitants to surrender (Y); telling them, he was the son of Jenghiz Khân; that they should be well treated, and pay but half the taxes which they paid to Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn. These proposals, having been liked by the inhabitants, were accepted by them: but the soldiers, rejecting them, were immediately disarmed by prince Tuli's order, and all put to the sword, to the number of 12,000. After this he nominated Mâlek Abû Bekr governor of the city; and, with 60,000 men, set out for Tal'ân, whither his father had recalled him.

The city described.

HERAT (called also Heri and Eri) has always passed for a very strong city, and, at present, serves for a bulwark against the Uzbeks. The country in which it stands, is the Ariz of the ancients; and, according to Mirkbond, the famous Persian historian, who was a native thereof, it was founded by Alexander the Great. It was situated on the river Ileri Rûdb, within two leagues of a mountain, on whose top the worshippers of fire, called by the Persians, Ghebbers and Atteshpereft, perform their religious rites; in a place built out of the ruins of a famous temple, raised by the ancient Magi. The city and country is very populous, the air excellent, and the inhabitants generally honest, as well as courteous. Let us now go see what Jenghiz Khân is doing on his side. After the taking of Talkhân, that prince marched with his army towards Bamîyân, still waiting for news of Jalâlo'ddîn, and the troops he had sent towards India, in quest of him^k.

Jalâlo'ddîn's disguise.

THE Soltân having escaped out of the hands of the second party of Mungls, in his retreat from Nishâbâr, as hath been mentioned before^l, he, with much ado, got safely to the fortress of Kâbera; where, in despair, he would have shut himself up with his troops, and waited the coming of the Mungls, had not the governor convinced him that such a conduct was unbecoming a prince of his merit. This bold remonstrance awakening his courage, he went from thence to Bost, a city in the province of Sejestan, or Sistân, where he made a shift to raise about 20,000 men^m: but, when he had learned the strength of the Mungl army, he knew not what course to take. At length, roused by the extreme danger he saw himself in, he resolved to oppose his enemies at all hazards, and left Bost, with a design, if possible, to get into Gâzna, the capital of Zâblestân, twenty-four days journey distant, before the Mungls could arrive to take it; which design he effected, by the expedition he made on the road. In this city, which had been the metropolis of the Gâzni empire, a lord, named Kerber Mâlek, commanded during the absence of Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn: and although, a little while before, the people, as in other places, divided by the great lords, had thrown off their obedience, yet was that prince received with all the marks of the greatest affection; while he, dissembling his resentment, deferred to a more proper time the punishment of their disloyalty.

Bamîyân besieged.

JENGHIZ KHAN, having gotten information that Jalâlo'ddîn was at Gazna, hastened his march, in order to surprise him; but he was stopped in the way by the garrison of Bamîyân, which he had hoped to take without opposition. These people, who had long expected to be attacked, had ruined all the country for four or five leagues round the city; while the peasants had carried away the stones, and every thing else that might be of use to the besiegers: so that they had extraordinary difficulties to surmount. They had scarce begun to attack the place in form, when couriers arrived with news both of the defeat of his troops by Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn, and the revolt of Herât. This made him redouble his attempts; and, after he had detached forces upon those two expeditions, he caused a mount of earth to be cast up before the city, in a place where he designed to make the fiercest assault. Wooden towers were likewise built, equal in height to the walls, whereon to plant his engines, and covered with raw hides, to prevent the wild-fire of the besieged from sticking to them; on which occasion a great number of horses and cows were every day slaughtered.

Vigorously defended;

MEAN time many of the Mungl engines were beaten down by those from the city; and the garrison making an obstinate resistance, as their walls were exceeding strong, the besiegers at last began to be in want both of stones and wild-fire. This occasioned the assaults to cease, till millstones, flints, and other materials fit for battering, could be procured: and when they were renewed, the besieged made such furious sallies, overthrowing whole squadrons of the enemy, as well as towers, with their engines, that had not Jenghiz Khân been provided with so vast an army, he must have been forced to raise the siege. To increase his chagrin, just as he was returned to his tent, from making a fruitless attack, an express came with an account of the defeat of his general Kûtûkû, by the Soltân. The Khân, enraged, swore to be revenged on Bamîyân: but his fury cost the life of a son of Oktây; who, exposing himself, to please his grandfather, was slain with an arrow. The emperor, who loved him tenderly, because he discovered

(Y) This is Alûighazi Khân's account; but, according to La Croix, the inhabitants, on the loss of their governor, sent to capitulate, and concealed Shams'o'ddîn's death from Tuli; who, supposing him still alive, and considering his bravery, granted them terms.

- a in him all the marks of good conduct, could not forbear mixing his own tears with those of the mother, who appeared almost distracted^a.

JENGHIZ KHAN, by this accident rendered more impatient than ever to reduce the place, ^{taken, and} lavished his treasure to encourage his soldiers; who, night and day continuing the assault, at ^{destroyed.} length ruining the walls in many places, and became masters of Bâmîyân, after the bravest of the officers and soldiers of the garrison had been slain in its defence. The mother of the young prince, who had been killed, entering with the Mungl troops into the city, and more deserving the name of a fiend than a woman, caused the throats of all the inhabitants to be cut, not excepting one. She even gave orders to rip up the bellies of women with child, for fear an infant should be left alive. In short, the cattle and all other creatures were killed, to gratify the rage of this blood thirsty monster. So that, ever since, Bâmîyân, whose buildings were also demolished, has borne the name of Maubâlig, which, in the Mungl language, signifies the unfortunate town. Bâmîyân was situated on a mountain, in the province of Zâblestân, ten days journey from Balk, and eight from Gazna. A strong castle has been since built on its ruins. At the foot of the mountain glides a river, which, having run through another mountain, falls at length into the Amu^b.

- It has been mentioned above, that while Jenghiz Khân was besieging Bâmîyân, two of his ^{The Mungls} generals had been defeated by Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn; we shall here therefore give the particulars of ^{defeated} those engagements. Two or three days after Jalâlo'ddîn had reached Gazna, as before has been related, he learned, that there were Mungl troops in that neighbourhood who besieged the city of Kandabâr, and had orders to watch his motions. At the same time Amîn Mâlek, lord of Herât, who was come out to watch theirs, with 10,000 Turkish horse, being not far off, the Soltân sent to invite him to assist in relieving that fortress. Amîn Mâlek hereupon joins Jalâlo'ddîn with his forces; and, it being resolved to attack the enemy in the dead of the night, the troops marched, and surprised the Mungls, who had already taken the town. They, finding themselves attacked on one side by the succours, and on the other side by the governor of the citadel, suffered themselves to be killed, in a manner, without making any resistance; so that very few escaped the sword of the Karazmians.

- THE Soltân, having repaired Kandabâr, returned to Gazna; where soon after he was ^{by the Soltân,} reinforced by 30,000 men more, brought by three Turkish lords of his father's court, who dwelt in this country in fortified places; and, lead more by the danger which threatened them, than affection for the prince, came to offer him their service. As soon as Jenghiz Khân heard of the slaughter of his troops before Kandabâr, he immediately dispatched the general Kûtûkû (Z), with 80,000 men, against Jalâlo'ddîn; who, on notice of their march, put himself at the head of his army to meet them; and came up with them just beyond a town called Birwân, within a day's journey of Gazna, where they were intrenching themselves. Kûtûkû, perceiving troops, flushed with the late success, advancing towards him with so much vigour, thought it best to defer fighting for a while: but when he saw they intended to attack him in his intrenchments, he marched out to meet them. The Mungl van-guard was at first defeated by Jalâlo'ddîn's, commanded by Amîn Mâlek; but being supported by fresh troops, they, in their turn, routed the Karazmians. The Soltân, on this, advanced immediately at the head of his main body, and attacked the Mungls in the center, where Kûtûkû himself was posted. The shock was terrible, ^{with great} and for some hours the victory doubtful: but at last the Mungls fled in disorder to the mountain ^{slaughter;} tains. A great number were slain, as well as taken prisoners: and, it is said, Jalâlo'ddîn, after reproaching these latter with their cruelties, caused nails to be thrust into their ears, to revenge the miseries which his subjects had so long suffered from the Mungls and Tatars. As soon as a party of Tatars, who were besieging Wâla, a fortress, some days journey from thence, heard of this defeat, they raised the siege, and made off with all expedition^c.

- THIS is the account given by Nissâvi, who wrote the life of Jalâlo'ddîn, and Fadhlallah; ^{joined by} but Abû'lghâzi Khân, from other authors, represents matters in a different manner. Soltân ^{Khân Mâlek;} Khân Mâlek (the same with Amîn Mâlek), governor of Herât, having been attacked, after his submission to Zena and Suday the Mungl generals, by Togazar Kantaret, as before related, on the news that Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn was arrived at Gazna (A) sent to offer that prince his service. At the same time Jenghiz Khân had detached one of his principal officers called Ugar, surnamed Kalsban, or the merry companion, with four other generals, Sbanghi, Kûtûktû Noyân (or Nevîân), Tabajik, and Malkaw, at the head of 30,000 men, to cut off the communication between Gazna, (Z) Abû'lghâzi Khân names him Kûtûktû Noyân.

(A) In the translation of Abû'lghâzi Khân written Gâmilan. Some write Gaznahan, or Gaznin; by which they seem to mean the territory in which it is situated, rather than the city itself.

Sāghil, Kābul, and the rest of the dominions of the Karazm Shāh. As these commanders thought it proper to divide their forces, the better to watch the motions of the enemy, Kūtūktū Noyān, who with his body of troops had advanced towards Herāt, by the way encamped near Soltān Khān Mālek: but that lord in the night marched off, and got safely to Gazna.

Defeat of Kūtūktū Noyān. TABAJIK and Mālkaw, on their side, had advanced with so little noise to the town of Sāghil, that it was very near being surprised by them, for want of keeping a good look-out. The Mungl generals, having missed so fair a hit, besieged the place in form: but while they used their utmost efforts to reduce it, Soltān Jalālo'ddīn, with his reinforcement from Herāt, fell upon them so unexpectedly, that he oblig'd them to fly, after they had lost above 1000 men, and go join Kūtūktū Noyān; whom he likewise pursued, and at length provoked to a battle. He gave the command of the left wing to Soltān Khān Mālek; that of the right to Sefso'ddīn, one of his father's old generals; and, putting himself in the center, charged the Mungls with so much vigour, that, after a very obstinate fight, which lasted from morning till near evening, they were constrained to fly, and leave a great number of their companions dead behind them.

The Noyān's stratagem. KUTUKTU NOYAN made use of a stratagem in this battle, which had like to have given him the victory; for he ordered all the felt caps and cloaks that were in the camp to be stuffed with straw, and ranged behind on the horses and camels of the baggage, as a kind of second line. This affair was so well managed, that the Karazmians, believing it to be a reinforcement sent from the Khān, were seized with fear, and had shamefully fled, if the Soltān, suspecting it a trick of Kūtūktū Noyān, had not taken pains to expose the deceit. Their courage being by this means revived again, they fell on the Mungls with so much impetuosity, that only a very few escaped, besides the three general officers^a.

Diffention among JENGHIZ KHAN, impatient to revenge these disgraces, as soon as Baniyan was reduced, marched his army with so much precipitation, that he hardly gave his soldiers time to refresh themselves. Gazna (then called Daro'l Mālk, or the royal city) being a very strong place, and provided for a long siege, the Khān directed his course thither, expecting to find Jalālo'ddīn there: but that prince had left the city fifteen days before (B), and might have stood his ground against his pursuer, if a vexatious accident had not happened in his army, after the battle of Birwān. When the booty came to be divided, the three Turkish lords pretended, that the most valuable spoils belonged to them, on account of the succours which they had brought. The troops of Amīn Mālek, who were united with the Soltān's, were for having the custom of war followed, and the booty to be equally divided. The quarrel began about a very fine Arabian horse, which one of the three Turkish commanders demanded, and the others refused to yield to him.

Jalālo'ddīn's generals. SOME say, that this dispute arose between Soltān Khān Mālek (otherwise Amīn Mālek) and Sefso'ddīn Mālek; which went so far, that the former gave the latter a lash in the face with his whip: that Sefso'ddīn complained to the Soltān of this insult; but, finding no hopes of obtaining such a reparation as would satisfy him, he quitted that prince in the night, with the troops under his command, who were of the Kankli tribe, and retired into the mountains of Kermān: that, on the other hand, Soltān Khān Mālek returned soon after to Herāt. However this matter was, the desertion of the auxiliary troops proved extremely prejudicial to Jalālo'ddīn's affairs; and the chief reason for his quitting Gazna was, to give his disunited troops time to rejoin him. He did all that was possible to bring the three Turkish commanders to hearken to reason: he wrote and sent to them several times; representing the ruin which must attend their separation, and the advantages which might arise to them all, if they rejoined him.

The Soltān overtaken. THEY at length suffered themselves to be persuaded by the sense of danger, but it was too late: for Jenghiz Khān, who was informed of what was in agitation, sent 60,000 horse to seize the passages, and prevent their joining the Soltān; who finding himself deprived of this powerful aid, retired towards the river Sind, or Indus (C). When he was arrived there, he stopped, in a part where the stream was most rapid, and the place confined, with a view both to take from his soldiers a desire of flying, and prevent the Mungls from bringing up all their army to engage at once. Ever since his departure from Gazna he had been tormented with a cruel colic; yet, at a time when he suffered most, hearing that the enemy's van-guard was arrived at a place called Herder, he quitted his litter, and mounted on horseback: then, marching in the night with his chosen soldiers, surprised the Mungls in their camp; and having cut them almost all to pieces, without losing one man, returned to his camp with considerable booty.

Battle at the Indus. JENGHIZ KHAN, finding by this that he had to do with a vigilant enemy, proceeded with ^a ABU'LGH. p. 123, & seq.

(B) According to Abū'lghazi Khān, the inhabitants of Gazna, having lost their courage, admitted Jenghiz Khān, without any resistance.

(C) Called by Abū'lghazi Khān, Sir Indi; as much as to say, the river Indus.

- a great circumspection. When he came near the Indus he drew out his army in battalia (D): to Jagatay he gave the command of the right wing; the left to Oktay; and put himself in the center, surrounded by 6000 of his guards. On the other side, Jalâlo'ddîn prepared for battle: he first sent the boats on the Indus farther off, reserving only one to carry over the Soltân his mother, the queen his wife, and his children: but unluckily the boat split, when they were going to embark; so that they were forced to remain in the camp. The Soltân took to himself the command of the main body of his army. His left wing, drawn up under shelter of a mountain, which hindered the whole left wing of the Mungls to engage them at one time, was conducted by his chief Wazîr; and his right wing by Amin Mîler. This lord began the fight, and forced the enemy's left wing to give ground; in spite of all the troops which sustained them. The right wing of the Mungls likewise wanting room to extend itself, the Soltân made use of his left as a body of reserve; detaching from thence squadrons to sustain the other troops, which stood in need of them. He also took on part of them with him, when he went at the head of his main body, to charge that of Jenghiz Khân: which he did with so much resolution and vigour, that he not only put it into disorder, but made a broad way to penetrate into the midst of it, to the place where the Khân had at first taken his station: but that prince, having had a horse killed under him, was retired from thence, to give orders for all the troops to engage.

- This disadvantage had like to have lost the Mungls the battle: for the report being spread all over the army, that the Soltân had broken through the main body, the troops were so discouraged, that if the Khân had not immediately rode from place to place to shew himself, they would certainly have fled. In short, what gained him the battle was, the orders which he gave to Bela Nevân to cross the mountain, if practicable, and attack the Soltân's left wing; which the Khân observed had been much weakened by the several detachments. Bela, accordingly, conducted by a guide, marched betwixt rocks and dreadful precipices; and, falling upon that disabled wing behind, soon overcame them.

- The victory is, by one author, attributed to a body of chosen horse, called Peblevans, who, supported by 10,000 fresh men, fell upon Jalâlo'ddîn's right wing, which was at that time victorious, and defeated them; driving them back upon his main body, against which Jenghiz Khân had renewed the charge. The Soltân's troops which were in all but 30,000 fatigued with having fought ten whole hours (E) against more than 300,000 men, were seized with fear, and fled. In this disorder his eldest son was taken prisoner. One part of the troops retired to the rocks, which were on the shore of the Indus, where the enemy's horse could not follow them. Many others, closely pursued by the Mungls, threw themselves into the river, some of whom happily crossed over; while the rest, placing themselves round their prince, continued the fight, through despair.

- MEAN time Jenghiz Khân, desirous to take Jalâlo'ddîn alive, forbore killing him (F); and, to prevent his escape, ranged his forces in form of a bow, of which the river represented the string (G). The Soltân on this occasion, considering that, as he had scarce 7000 men left, if he continued the fight any longer, he should certainly fall into the enemy's hands, began to think of his safety. He knew he had but one course to follow, and that a very dangerous one, which was, to cross the Indus; and yet he resolved to venture it, rather than suffer himself to be taken. But before he put this resolution in practice, he went to embrace and bid adieu to his mother, wives, children, and friends. Jalâlo'ddîn having, with tears in his eyes, broken from those dear objects of his affection, put off his armour and arms, excepting his sword, bow, and quiver: then mounting a fresh horse, he spurred him into the river; the furiousness of whose waves astonished the beast so much, that he went not in but by force: however, being once entered, he performed his duty to admiration, and carried his lord safely over. In gratitude for which service, the Soltân had him kept with care ever after; nor would, for the four or five years following, ride him in any dangerous action.

- WHEN he was in the middle of the river, he stopped to insult Jenghiz Khân (who was come to the water-side to admire his courage), and empty his quiver of arrows against him. Several brave Mungl captains would have thrown themselves into the river to swim after Jalâlo'ddîn; but the Grand Khân would not permit them, telling them, this prince would defeat all their

(D) According to Abû'lghâzi Khân, he went in the night, and posted himself between the river and the Soltân's camp, in order effectually to cut off the passage of it.

(E) Abû'lghâzi Khân says, from sun-rise till noon.

(F) Abû'lghâzi Khân relates, that Jenghiz Khân, before the engagement, ordered Kogur Kaljan, and Kotur Kaljan, to watch Jalâlo'ddîn, and, if possible, take him alive.

(G) According to this account from La Croix, the passage to the river was open: but Abû'lghâzi Khân, who, as hath been observed in a former note, makes the Khân incamp between the Soltân and the river, relates, that the latter, seeing no more of his army left, made a last effort to break thro' the Mungls, and happily gained the river.

attempts. Then, putting his finger on his mouth, and turning towards his children, he said, a “ any son should wish to spring from such a father (H). He who dares defy such dangers as “ this prince has now escaped, may expose himself to a thousand others; and a wife man, who “ has him for his enemy, must be always on his guard.”

family.*

MEHEMED NISSAVI, author of Jalalo'ddin's life, reports, that the Soltân, pierced with the shrieks of his family, who begged him to deliver them from being slaves to the Mungls, commanded them to be all drowned; and that his orders were immediately executed. But other historians, who have given a very full relation of all which passed in that battle, assure us, that Jenghîz Khân, presently after it, having caused to be brought before him the Soltân's wives, and all his children, ordered the males to be killed; among whom was his eldest son, then but eight years of age. After this, he had the treasure, which Jalalo'ddin had thrown b into the river, taken up by divers.

India.*

THIS prince, as soon as he was landed safe in India, got into a tree, to pass the night secure from wild beasts. Next day, as he walked melancholily along the banks, looking to see if any of his people appeared, he perceived a troop of soldiers, with some officers, three of whom proved to be his particular friends. These, at the beginning of the defeat, had found a boat, in which they sailed all night, with much danger, from the rocks, shelves, and violence of the current. Soon after, he saw coming towards him 300 horse, who informed him of 4000 more, saved by swimming over two leagues from thence: the Soltân went to meet them, and promised to provide for their necessities. Mean time Jamâlarrazad, an officer of his household, who was not at the battle, knowing that his master and many of his people were escaped, ventured to load a c very large boat with arms, provisions, money, and stuff to clothe the soldiers, and cross over to him: for which great piece of service Jalalo'ddin made him great steward of his household; and surnamed him Ektiâro'ddin, that is, the chosen, or, the glory of the faith. And from this time things succeeded happily with the Soltân. He fought several battles in Hindûstân, and was at first victorious: he also made conquests and alliances. But at length the Indian princes becoming jealous of his prosperity, they conspired against and obliged him to repass the Indus. Others say, his return to Persia was voluntary, in order to recover what he could of his dominions, in the absence of Jenghîz Khân. But we must leave him at present, to return to the conqueror.

Conquests in Irân, from the battle of the Indus, to Jenghîz Khân's return into Tartary.

subdued.*

Hej. 619.
A. D. 1222.

THE victory at the Indus cost Jenghîz Khân 20,000 men; and since he sat down before a Talkhân, he had lost no fewer than 200,000. Yet he neglected not to send advice of his good success to the governors of provinces, and particularly to Hubbe and Suida: who having now finished the conquest of Persian Irâk, he ordered them to enter Azerbejân, the ancient Media Atropatia, in the spring of the year 619. They being then in winter-quarters at Senoravend, a city of that province, which they had taken by storm, sent immediately for a supply of troops from Khorassân. These troops, soon after their setting out, met with, and defeated, 3 or 4000 Karazmian horse, under Takîn, who fled to Jorjân, in Tabarestân, whither Aynânje Khân before-mentioned, was retired: the Mungl commander pursued; and, meeting them in the beginning of the said year, between that city and Astarabâd, after a sharp dispute, routed them. Takîn was killed; and Aynânje Khân fled to Kayaso'ddin, Soltân Jalalo'ddin's youngest brother, who b possessed Khûjestân, where he died soon after.

Ardebil and Taurus yield.

THE two generals, having received this reinforcement, marched to Ardebil, or Ardevîl, a strong city, and of great trade, within two leagues of the mountain Savelûn; which, after some little resistance, surrendered at discretion. The Mungls killed the greater part of the people; and, after plundering, burnt the city. Since which, it was rebuilt; and is at present one of the finest cities in the Persian empire. From hence they went to Tabriz, or Tauris, the capital of Azerbejân, whose governor, being a man of courage, rejected all their offers. He fatigued them with infinite a finite sallies, and drew them frequently into ambuscade. But at last, being forced to a pitch'd battle, was beaten: yet he escaped to the city, and might have held out a long time, if the inhabitants had not compelled him forthwith to make proposals to the Mungl generals, who readily consented to them; for fear the Georgians, who were esteemed the most valiant people of all Asia, should declare for the inhabitants. After this, being informed, that there were some commotions at Ispáhan, they returned to Irák: but the author of them having been slain by his party, they did not punish the inhabitants.

THE Georgians, expecting to be attacked in their turn by the Mungls, were resolved to prevent them; and, though it was the midst of winter, entered Azerbeján, in quest of the troops, which the two generals had left there: but finding more than they expected, and having been worsted in two rencounters, returned to Teflis, from whence they sent to ask assistance from all their neighbours; but none would lend them any. They, to be revenged, sent strong parties to molest all those who favoured the Mungls. Mean time Hubbe and Suida sent troops to oppose them; and, as soon as the season permitted, marching from Irák, with all their forces entered Georgia: but finding all the passages stopped, and that a few were able to defend them against a great many, did not think fit to attack them. However, on their return to Azerbeján, they took and plundered Marâgha, which, they were informed, had assisted the Georgians. This city was built by the Khalifah Merwân, and was very considerable, both for its trade and fine situation, about fifty miles south of Tauris. Hûlâkû, grandson of Jenghíz Khán, built there a magnificent observatory, in which presided the famous Nasro'ddîn al Tústî, mentioned before.

FROM hence they went to refresh themselves at Ardebíl; where advice arriving of a revolt at Hamâdan, Hubbe marched thither to appease it. The governor Jamâlo'ddîn, seeing himself forsaken by the rest of the seditious, sent the Mungl rich presents, with offers of submission: but the general insisted that he should surrender at discretion. He was going to comply; when a captain, named Fakîbî, put himself at the head of the troops which were in the city, and had the boldness to make a sally: but being repulsed and pursued, a great number of the enemy, entering promiscuously with his soldiers, seized the gates, and became masters of the place. On Hubbe's return, the two generals marched to reduce Salmâs and Kâi, or Koy, in the most western part of Azerbeján; which having taken and plundered, they turned their arms against Nâkshivân, a city of the province of Al Rân, or Arrân, situated between Azerbeján and Armenia. This place was treated like the others; yet with less rigour than Pilkân (or Bilakân): this being a well fortified city, as well as the place of greatest trade in all Arrân, it cost the enemy a great deal of time to take it; and they, in revenge, committed most cruel actions: but Gânjeh, another city (now the capital) of the same province, fared better; for, opening its gates without delay, no damage was done to the inhabitants.

HERE the Mungls being informed that an army of Georgians were advancing to attack them; it was resolved that Hubbe should put himself in ambuscade, with 5000 men, while Suida marched with the gross of the army, as if to give them battle: but that, as soon as the enemy appeared, he should leave his baggage, and retire hastily, to draw them on. This stratagem had the desired effect: so that, at the same time Hubbe came out of his ambuscade, Suida faced about; and the Georgians being charged both before and behind at once, 30,000 of them were cut in pieces. They who escaped spread a report through the country, that the Mungls were coming to besiege Teflis; which threw the inhabitants into the utmost terror. However, the soldiers, knowing the difficulty of the passages, ran to guard them; while the Mungls, disheartened at the many narrow lanes and turnings which they met with, immediately retreated.

IT is time now to go see what Jenghíz Khán was doing in Khorassân. This prince, after the battle with Jalâlo'ddîn, through the severity of the winter, was obliged to take up his quarters on the borders of Hindustân, and repose his fatigued army. When they were a little recovered, he ordered a hunting; but on the approach of spring, he sent out new troops to make new conquests. Fourscore thousand were detached toward Herât (which had revolted), under the command of Ilenku Nevian; and 20,000 under Bela, or Bala, marched towards Multân, in India, to oppose the Soltân, if he appeared on that side. Oktay was sent, with the troops under his conduct, to conquer Gazna; and Jagatay had 60,000 forces given him, in order to shut up the provinces of Send and Kermân against Jalâlo'ddîn. But the Soltân returned into the latter as soon as he heard that Jenghíz Khán was gotten into Mogolîstân; whither that prince prepared to march, upon advice that Sbidaskû, Khán of Tangût, had taken the city of Kampion from his governor, and that the Kitayans were inclined to revolt.

ON this news Jenghíz Khán sent orders to his brother Utakîn, and marched with the troops which remained with him, as far as Kandahâr, which he took. This city is very ancient, and the capital of a province of the same name. It carries on a great trade with the countries of Send, India, and Persia; and some geographers place it in the one, some in the other, of which it is a strong frontier town. Here the Khân waited a long time, expecting to hear news from his armies.

reduced.

SOME time after the reduction of this fortress, Multân, a city of India, was subdued by Bela Nevân; who had orders to conquer Labâr also: but as he was informed there was, in that place, a stronger army than his own, he did not go thither. A Patân prince, named Kobâdia, had sent those forces; thinking he had more reason to provide against the Mungls than against Jalâlo'ddin. For although the Soltân was then in arms on his frontiers, yet he had only a few troops with him: nor had he done any thing, but made a slight irruption into the territories of a prince named Râna, who had insulted him, and whom he had killed.

Slaughter
at Herât.

ILENKU (A) executed the orders he had received concerning Herât with much cruelty. It has been already related, that the people of this country, after they had made peace with Tuli Khân, revolted, on the appearance of Jalâlo'ddin; killed the governor Abûbekr, with those of his party, and set up Mubarezzo'ddin in his room. This happened at the time when 30,000 malecontents joined that prince; which made them believe his affairs would take a prosperous turn. Kûtûktû received immediate orders to chastise them, but his defeat at Birwân prevented him: so that the Khân had been obliged to defer his vengeance till now. Ilenkû had orders to ruin all the country; and it employed him six months to execute his commission (B). The Mungls boasted that they had destroyed in this expedition above 1,600,000 persons; including the 30,000 malecontents, whom the general had orders to fight, and intirely defeated, though with much difficulty.

besieged,

and taken.

OKTAY, whose orders were to punish Gazna, no sooner arrived in that country, than he exercised all sorts of cruelties. Not that this prince was naturally bloody, but he knew his father was so: and that he hated those people to whom he owed the loss of his armies. After he had subdued all the places of least strength, he sat down before the capital Gazna, then called Dâro'l Mulk, or the royal city, because it had been the metropolis of the Gazni Soltâns. This city was provided with all things necessary to sustain a siege; had a strong garrison, with a brave and experienced governor. The inhabitants, expecting no mercy from the Khân, who they knew had sworn their ruin, were resolved to make a desperate defence. They made frequent sallies on the besiegers; several times overthrew their works, and broke above a hundred of their battering-rams. But one night, after an obstinate fight, in which Oktay fought in person, to encourage his soldiers, who began to be daunted, one side of the city-walls fell down; and filling up the ditch, a great number of Mungls easily entered sword in hand. The governor, seeing all lost, at the head of his bravest soldiers, charged among the thickest of his enemies; where he and all his followers were slain. However, Gazna was not entirely ruined; nor did all the inhabitants perish: for after the plundering had lasted four or five hours, Oktay ordered it to cease; and taxed the people who were left alive at a certain rate, to redeem themselves and the city. This prince continued here till the whole province was reduced, and then went to rejoin his father in Tartary.

Jagatay enters Kermân.

Sickly climate.

MEAN time Jagatay having entered Kermân, the ancient Karamania of Persia, took, by degrees, all the cities in that province. The Khân, who had been well informed of the unhealthiness of the country, gave him a particular charge to look after the soldiers. After he had reduced Tîz, one of the best cities, with some other places, which he destroyed, he proceeded to Kelânjer, a country bordering on Hindûstân; where intending to pass the winter, the soldiers, by help of their slaves, built houses, cultivated gardens; and kept flocks of sheep, as if they were to settle there. But when the scorching winds began to blow, to which they were not accustomed, almost all of them fell sick, and a great number died; while the greater part of those who lived became so weak and languid, that they were not fit for service. By this means the country of Fârs, or Pârs, which is the proper Persia; and that part of Khûzestân which belonged to Kayaso'ddin, Soltân Jalâlo'ddin's younger brother, and contained several strong cities, escaped for this time the invasion of the Mungls. Jagatay, by removing his troops from one place to another, by degrees recovered them; and finding the slaves which his soldiers had taken were a burthen to them, ordered the throats of the greater part of them to be cut. Then having committed the care of the conquered countries to one of his lieutenants, he, pursuant to his father's orders, directed his course for Bâlkh, where the general rendezvous was appointed.

The Khân

JENGHIZ KHAN, after taking Kandabâr, as before-mentioned, decamped, and continued to march towards the Jibûn or Amû. He passed the rest of the summer in a delightful

(A) Alû'ghâzi Khân calls him Ilziktey (or Ijiktey) Noyân.

(B) According to Alû'ghâzi Khân, he divided his 80,000 forces into four bodies; and never ceased afa place, to the south of that river; where he informed himself concerning the antiquities of Bâlkâ, and particularly Zeridesht Bebrâm, or Zoroaster, the famous philosopher, who instituted fire-worship. Here he received letters from the Khân of Tangût; promising submission, and to become tributary, provided the Khân would pardon what was past. To prevent his forming any more enterprises, an answer was sent, that his offers were accepted. After this it was resolved to cross the Amû, in order to keep in awe all those who had any inclination to rebel. Then having sent notice to the generals, dispersed through the provinces, to set out immediately and follow him, he proceeded to Bokhâra. There again he had a conversation with the Po't'hâra, learned, about the Mohammedan religion, which they said consisted chiefly in five articles: Hej. 620.

1. The belief of one God, the Creator of all things, who had no equal: 2. In giving the poor one-fortieth part of their yearly income or gains: 3. In praying to the Deity five times every day: 4. In setting apart one month of the year for fasting: 5. In making a pilgrimage to the temple of Mekka, there to worship God. Jenghiz Khân told them he believed the first article, and approved of the three next: but was displeased with the last, saying, the whole world was God's house; and thought it ridiculous to imagine that one place should be fitter than another to adore him in. The Mohammedan doctors were no less offended with his opinion on this point, since it maintained there was no occasion for temples. A. D. 1223.

JENGHIZ KHAN continued at Bokhâra, to pass the winter; and then proceeded to Samar-^{Hubbe and Suida} kant, where he spent most part of the year: and intending to hold a general dyet the next year at Tonkât, sent mandates to the princes, governors, and generals, to repair thither. As Hubbe and Suida had instructions to return by the way of Dârbend, round the Caspian sea, they no sooner received his orders, than they entered Shîrwân, and took Shâmakîya, the capital, which they treated with rigour, for its resistance; and then, changing their measures, spared both the country and the people. This was all done to obtain of the king a passage by Dârbend: but that prince, fearing their design was to seize that fortress, and drive him out of his kingdom, denied their request, under various pretences; till at length the generals, finding they made use of intreaties to no purpose, proceeded to threats: which procured a grant to their demands, with officers to conduct them.

THE Mungl generals, in viewing Dârbend, admired at its natural as well as artificial ^{pass through} strength; and confessed it was not to be forced. There is, between the sea and the mountains, a space, about a quarter of a league wide, which is shut in by two walls, built of gravel and shells pounded together; a composition harder than any stone, and six foot thick. They are founded on the rock, and reach from the sea to the mountain; so that all passengers were obliged to pass through by the iron gates (C), which were in these walls. The space between them made a third part of the city, and is called Shâbr-yânnân, or the city of the Greeks, because built by Alexander the Great: another part is at the foot of the mountain: and the third on its declivity, near the top. The middle part is best peopled; and all three near two miles and a quarter in length, though not very broad. There is a kind of port, shut in by a chain, fastened to two forts, one on each side; and the whole is defended by a castle on the top of the mountain: but the trade is very inconsiderable^d.

THE orientals say, that, since Alexander led his army through Dârbend, none but that of Jenghiz Khân ever passed this way. The Alani, at present called the Tatars of Dâghestân, ^{Defeat the Dâghestâns.} were extremely surprised at the unexpected appearance of the Mungls; and, fearing they had some design on their liberty, spoiled the roads, and destroyed the provisions every-where. The generals, provoked, took and ruined their chief city Tarku. After this they surprised Terki, the capital of the Cherkassians, who were joined with them, as well as the Kalmûk Tatars (D), bordering on the Wolga and Caspian sea. However, foreseeing that, if these three nations raised all their forces, they should not be able to withstand them, the Mungl generals sent messengers to assure the Kalmûk tribes, that they were of the same nation with themselves; that they asked nothing, but to return to their own country; and desired them to be arbitrators of the war. The Kalmûks, moved by these reasons, and more perhaps by presents, recalled their troops: so that the Alani and Cherkassians, seeing themselves deprived of their assistance, soon lost courage, and gave way to their enemies.

THE generals, having crossed the Wolga, by favour of the Kalmûks, entered into Kipchâk, ^{Enter Kipjâk:} or Kapshâk: but being obliged to pass the winter there, as they arrived late in the year, their long stay gave rise to feuds between them and their hosts. Hereupon the Mungls fortified their camp, and sent to Tusht Khân, who was not far off, for assistance. That prince detached the greater part of his troops, who, having joined the others, in spite of the enemy, formed a con-considerable army ; which, without much trouble, constrained those people to submit. Mean a time Tuski, being obliged to repair to court, left Hubbe and Suida to command in Kipchik during his absence ; with orders to attack the Nogays, who had offended him, and were the only people unsubdued in Kipchik : which that prince had reduced, having pushed his conquests as far as the borders of Russia. By means of the frozen rivers, the Mungls had an early passage to Astrakhân, called Haji Tarkan by the Mohammedans, situate in an island of the Volga, near the Caspian sea, which they subdued. The war lasted six months : at the end of which the Nogays acknowledged Tuski Khân for their sovereign, and Jenghiz Khân for their Grand Khân. The generals continued in this country till Tuski returned from the dyet, in autumn 1224 ; and then left it with the troops they had brought thither.

If Jenghiz Khân was severe to those who offended him, he was kind and bountiful to such b as did him any service, or were willing to oblige him. When he left Samarkant to go for Tonkat, he freed the people of that province for several years from paying the usual tribute, because their behaviour had pleased him : and to give the lords some particular marks of his affection, he remitted to them, for their lives, the taxes due from the nobility to their prince.
This generous proceeding caused much joy in Samarkant : but it was damped with seeing the queen Turkhân Khâtûn, followed by her ladies, and they by all the great officers of Soltân Mohammed, who had been taken, led as in triumph before the Grand Khân's army ; who was going to pass through those countries where she was still beloved. After them the Soltân's throne and crown were borne in state.

THE Grand Khân, having crossed over the river Sibûn, or Sir, arrived at Tonkat the begin- c ning of the year 601 : which city he had made choice of to hold the dyet in, because it was agreeably situated, and was able to furnish all things necessary for so numerous an assembly.
The princes and generals being all returned from their respective expeditions, Jenghiz Khân, with caresses, received his sons, who kneeled down, kissed his hand, and made him presents, which were very considerable : but those of Tuski, or Fuji, were by far the best ; for, besides other rare things, there were 100,000 horses, white, dappled-greys, bays, black, and spotted, of each sort an equal number. In return, the Grand Khân opened his treasures, and loaded them with gifts. After this he gave public feasts for a whole month : but the most sumptuous banquet was on their return from a general hunting, in which several thousand beasts of all kinds had been slain : the falconers furnished variety of birds. Their liquors, besides balpe- d rinj, or metheglin, griut, or beer, and kammez, or kimis, were excellent wines from the southern countries ; and sherbets, which they had learned to make from the Persians.

WHEN this great feast was ended, preparations were made for holding the dyet in the plain of Tonkat : which, though seven leagues in length, could scarcely contain all the tents and attendants of the great personages ; who, besides the governors, came from the most distant provinces of Kitay, Mogulistân, Karakitay, Turân, and Irân. The greater part of them also had brought thither their moveable houses. When the Khân's quarters were marked out, which took up near two leagues in compass ; and the streets, squares, and markets were appointed, they pitched the tents for his household. That set up for the dyet to sit in, would contain at least 2000 persons ; and, to distinguish it from the rest, it was covered with white. e
It had but two gates, one named the imperial, for the Khân alone to enter at ; the other called the public gate ; which last alone had guards, and that only for grandeur. A magnificent throne was erected for the emperor : nor did they forget to place on an eminence the black felt carpet, on which that prince was proclaimed Grand Khân : which emblem of the poor estate of the Mungls at that time, was held in great veneration by them, so long as their empire lasted.

ALTHOUGH the luxury of the princes and chief lords of the Mungls was not come to the height which it arrived at after Jenghiz Khân's death ; yet there appeared a great deal of magnificence in their dress, which resembled the Turkish, and in their equipages, especially their f saddles, and other horse-furniture, which were set with precious stones and gold. On the top of most tents were placed streamers of the richest silks, of divers colours ; which made a charming shew. Although the affairs which were to settle in so vast an empire as that of the Mungls was already grown to, were very many ; yet Jagatay, the keeper of Jenghiz Khân's laws, had put them in so good a method, that all things were regulated by them without any trouble. From hence the Khân, who loved to speak in public, took an occasion to make a speech in praise of those laws, to which he imputed all his victories and conquests ; recounting them very minutely, one after the other. Then, as a farther proof of his greatness, he ordered all the ambassadors, who had followed the court, as well as all the envoys and deputies from the countries he had subdued, to be called in ; and having given them audience at the foot of the throne, dismissed the assembly.

a AFTER this, Tushî Khân, among the rest, took leave of his father, in order to return to Tashî returns Kipchâk; the grant of which kingdom the Khân confirmed to him. On his arrival there, the two generals, Hubbe and Suida, put their troops into his hands, and returned to court; where they were received with honour; and allowed an hour every day, while Jenghiz Khân was on the road homewards, to recount to him the rarities they had seen in the countries which they had traversed in their last expedition; leaving his army to follow at leisure ^f.

HAVING finished the history of Jenghiz Khân's expedition in the west of Asia, from the writers of those countries, we shall now lay before our readers what has been transmitted to us concerning it, from the Chinese historians.

b THE people of the Si-yu having massacred certain persons sent by Jenghiz Khân; this prince ^{Bukhâria} was so enraged at it, that, after subduing the countries in the neighbourhood of Kâshgar, he ^{invaded} went and besieged Wo-ta-la (or Otrâr). In the third month of the year 1220 he took Pu-wa; in the fifth, Sun-ke-san (E); whose king, called Cha-la-ting (F) (or Jalalo'ddîn), quitted the city on the Khân's approach. Pi-tû, son of Yelu Lyew-ko (king of Lyau tong), though dangerously wounded, seeing Chu chi (or Fuji), an intrepid prince, engaged almost singly against a troop of the enemy, ran to his assistance; and, though quite surrounded, they broke through and escaped (G). Prince Yelu Kobay, a relation of Pi-tû (for there were many Kitân in the Mungl army), was made governor of the place. The Wbey-hû (H) had lined the banks of the river Gan-mû (I) with their best troops, covered with no fewer than ten intrenchments; they likewise covered the river with barks. But the general Ko-pau-yu burnt them with c shooting fiery darts; whose flame and smoke putting the Wbey-hû in disorder, the Mungls attacked their intrenchments on every side, and forced them (K).

IN 1221, the Mungl year of the serpent (L), the Khân subdued the cities of Po-ha-eul, or Conquest Bokhâra, and Sye-mi-tse-kan. Chûchi took Yan-ki-kan and Pa-eul-ching. During the summer ^{there} heats the Khân resided at the Iron Gate (M), a fortress to the westward of Sa-ma eul-kan, or Samarkant. There he received two famous embassies from the emperors of the Song and the Kin (then reigning in Ma-ji and Kitay), who made proposals of peace; but, being resolved to destroy those powers, they were not accepted. In autumn, Pan-lo-ki (N) (or Balk) was taken. Jenghiz Khân having ordered his general Porchi to instruct Jagatay, his second son, in the art of war, named that prince governor of great part of his eastern conquests. Fuji, d Jagatay, and Oktay, in the year 1221, took Yu-long and Kye-she (O). Toley, formed under A. D. 1221, the Khân himself, reduced Ma-lu, Sha-ki-ko, Ma-lu Si-la-tse (P), and other places. This year the Khân declared Ho-lin (or Karakorum) the metropolis of his dominions in Tatary; that is, the place where the general assembly of the princes, and chiefs of tribes, was to be held.

IN 1222, the emperor, resolving to besiege Ta-li-han (or Talkân), gave a great body of ^{and in Iran} troops to Toley (or Tuli), whom Idikût, king of the Igûrs, desired to accompany with 10,000 of his troops. Toley, who liked the Igûrs, was charmed to have their prince in his army, both because he had excellent officers, and was a great commander; having given many proofs of his valour and conduct, in conjunction with Chepe, against the Wbey-hû. These two princes e first took Thîs, or Tîs, Nye-cha-u-eul, or Nishâbûr. Afterwards they acquired a great deal of

(E) There is no determining, with any certainty, either what places these were, or most of the rest which follow; only Sun-ke-san is supposed, by Gaubil, to be Khejend; and the rather, because in a catalogue, or summary of the history of the Lyau, it is called Ho-chang or Ko-chang: but then the particulars, mentioned in the text, do not agree with those before related from the western historians of Asia.

(F) He is called also, So-tan, or Su-on-tan, and Ko-fey-cha-que Su-on-tan, that is, the Soltân of the kingdom of Ko-fey-cha; and thus the father, Mohammed Karazm Shâh, is confounded with his son. Ko-fey cha sounds like Kapchâk, or Kaschâk, especially as que, or ke, comes after it; although that seems to be the Chinese word for kingdom, and Ki-cha (or Kin-cha) is the term commonly used for Kaschâk, or Kipchâk.

(G) This seems to relate to the battle of Karakû, between Fuji and Soltân Mohammed. See before, p. 295.

(H) These Wbey-hû, or Whey he, as they are also called, seem to be Mohammedan Turks; and so named to distinguish them from the Deist Turks, who are, by the Chinese, called Tu-que, or Tu-ke. They extended themselves along the borders of Little Bukhâria, and were settled in many parts of it.

(I) This seems to be the Amû, or Jihûn, by the sound; but should rather be the Sihân, or Sîr (on which Kho-jend is situated), by the scene of action.

(K) There is no mention thereof in our account of this siege from the western historians; nor of Timûr Mâlek's brave defence in the Chinese history: yet this may be designed for a relation of it.

(L) This must be a mistake, for 1220 was the year of the serpent.

(M) There is a place in this country called Kolûga, or the Iron Gate: but the western historians do not say the Khân spent the summer there. Besides, Kolûga lies to the south or south-east of Samarkant.

(N) Pan-lo-ki, and Termi, or Termed, we are told, were taken by Jenghiz Khân in person.

(O) Those three princes, in 1221, made the expedition into Karazm; but there is no affinity between those names and Karazm, or any cities they conquered there.

(P) Ma-lu, is, doubtless, Maru, in Khorassân; of which name there are two places, as hath been observed before, p. 312, note S.

plunder in the kingdom of Mu-lay (Q). Then crossing the river Shû shû-dan, and taking the road of Ye-li (R), arrived at Talkbân, which by their assistance was taken and destroyed. Jenghîz Khân, being informed that Jalâlo'ddîn, king of the west, had joined Mye-li, marched at the head of his troops, and defeated the two princes; of whom the last was taken. But touching this event the Chinese authors differ; some say, Jalâlo'ddîn fled first to Ha-la-be (S) (or Herat), and then to Han-yen: and that, being beaten at both cities, he retired into the sea (T). Others, more rightly, affirm Mye-li to be king of the Mohammedans; and that, being hotly pursued by the Mungls, he entered the sea and died. All agree that he abandoned his money and jewels, which fell into their hands^g.

Death of Kaizm Shâh.

Kin-cha invaded. THE king of Kin-cha (U) having not only spoken disrespectfully of the emperor, but often given shelter to his enemies; the general Suputay asked leave, in 1223, to make incursions into his country. To him were joined Chepe and Kosmeli. They marched along the Tenkîz Nor (X), and made roads over mountains which seemed inaccessible. They ruined the cities of Ku-eûl, Te-she, Wansha, He-lin, and others; passing the O-li-ki (or Volga), in several battles, defeated the people of Kîr-she, A-sû (Y), and the Wo-lo-tse (or Russians), whose chief was named Mi-chi se-la. This lord was taken, and, at length, beheaded; the country of Kin-cha ravaged; and Ho-han Ho-to-se, prince of the Kangli (Z), routed near the city Po-tse-pa-li. At his return from this expedition, Chepe (A) died in great reputation^h.

Mungl slaugh-
ters.

THE Chinese history of the Mungls remarks, on occasion of their invasion of this country of Kin-cha, that, since the time they first issued out of their sandy deserts, they did nothing but plunder, kill, burn, and destroy kingdoms. It accuses them with all sorts of crimes, the greatest of which was that of extirpating royal families, root and branch; so that both men and spirits (says the history) burst with vexation, and called for vengeanceⁱ. Other Chinese authors relate, that, in the first fourteen years of the Mungl empire, there were slain 1847 myriads (or eighteen millions four hundred and seventy thousand people), by the founder Jenghîz Khân^k.

WHILE Jenghîz Khân passed the hot season at Pa-lu-van, whither his sons and generals repaired to him, they agreed on a form of government for the western conquests. And here it may be observed, that the emperor, besides the officers of war, first appointed Ta-lu-wha (or Tagûrsi), that is Mandarins who had seals, and determined civil matters.

Conquests in India.

IN 1224 the Khân marched to a great kingdom in the east, called Hin-tû, Intû, or Sin-tû (B). Here coming to a narrow pass, called the Iron Gate, fortified by nature and art, it is said that several Mungls saw a monster resembling a stag, with green hair, a horn in his forehead, and the tail of a horse, who told them, that their master must turn back! Jenghîz Khân, surprised at this relation, asked his prime minister Yelu-chu tsay about it (C); who informed him, that the animal was named Kyo-twan; that he understood four languages, and, possibly, did not love slaughter. Hence he took occasion to exhort the Khân to return, and destroy no more people.

AFTER this, the emperor caused several Indian cities to be plundered; but finding his great officers weary of a war so far from home (D), resolved to take the road to Tatary. Several officers out of the west removed with their families, to settle in Kitay. Jagatay (one of the intrepids) his generalissimo. Chuchi (or Fuji) was sent into Kincha, where he soon after died, leaving his son Pa-tû (or Ba-tû), a young prince of great hopes, for his successor^l.

Although the western historians mention Rudin, and other places, which belonged to these assassins, yet they do not speak of the assassins themselves.

(R) Ye-li seems to be Eri, Heri, or Herat, as it is variously written by authors.

(S) Or A-la-be; the Chinese geography says, this is Herat: but Herat seems rather to be meant by Ye-li, before-mentioned, which Tuli took in his way back to Talkbân; nor is it in the way to the Caspian sea.

(T) This is to be understood of the Caspian sea.

(U) Before called Ki-cha, which is Kipchâk, and fell to Fuji's share.

(X) So the Mungls call the Caspian sea. Nor, with them, signifies sea, or great lake; the Chinese pronounce it Tyen-ki-tse.

(Y) This country, which furnished the Mungls with good officers, was not far from the Caspian sea.

(C) This shews the Chinese historians had but an obscure account of the Khân's expedition to the Indus against Jalâlo'ddîn, whom they do not mention on this occasion.

(D) Several Chinese books say, that an army of Mungls was sent to Arabia, and took Me-te-na, or Me-dina.

- ^a THIS is the Chinese account of Jenghîz Khan's western expedition: which our readers may see is very difficult to reconcile with that given by the historians of the west of Asia, as it tallies neither with respect to the order of the conquests, their dates, nor the names of places; not to mention its scantiness, and other imperfections.

C H A P. VI.

Conquest of the kingdom of Hya, and progress in that of Kitay, till the death of Jenghîz Khân.

- ^b SOON after the dyet of Tonkat was dissolved, Jenghîz Khân set out with all his court (A); Affairs of obliging the captive queen to attend him continually, mounted on a chariot, and loaded Lyau-tong, with irons, as the proud monument of his victories in the west^a. But while the conqueror is on his journey to the east, let us return thither, and see what was doing during the time he was absent from his own dominions. The emperor had left the government of them all to his brother Wa-che (B), who managed affairs with great prudence and dignity. In 1220 the princess Tyau-li repaired to the regent's court, to notify the death of her husband Lyew-ko, king of Lyau-tong. Wa-che received her with magnificence, and sent her back, with troops, to govern in that country till the return of the Khân; which trust she discharged with great applause.
- ^c On the other hand, Mûbûli, his lieutenant-general in China, acquired much reputation in and of Kitay. the war which he maintained against both the emperor of the Kin, and the king of Hya. In 1218, Chang-yau, a general of the army, gathered a large body of troops to revenge the death of another general, his friend, murdered by an officer who was his enemy. Coming to Tse-kin-quan, a famous fortress in the mountains of Pe-che-li, he was attacked by Mingan, and fought bravely; but his horse falling, he was taken: and, being brought before the victor, refused to kneel to him; saying, As he was a general himself, he would rather die first. Mingan, admiring his greatness of soul, dismissed him with honour, and treated the other prisoner-officers well; yet, at the same time, ordered Chang-yau's father and mother to be put to death. The son, hearing this, after debating the matter with himself, to save their lives, offered to enter in the Mungl troops; and few officers were his equals, or did the Khân more service.
- ^d THREE months after, Mûbûli, accompanied by his son Pûlû, or Polû, recovered the places Cities recovered in Shan-si, which the Kin had taken back, and fortified. Tay-ywen-fu, the capital, sustained three assaults; but the officers, perceiving that they could neither defend the city, nor make a sally and cut their way through the Mungls, killed themselves. The officers of other places followed their example, rather than fall into the hands of Mûbûli's troops. The emperor of the Song (C), (or southern China), who had already declared war against the Tatars of Nyu-che, or the Kin, refused to make peace with them, and, by edict, exhorted his subjects to drive them out of China. Hereupon the Kin emperor sent his son and heir against the Song; which was carried on with various success.
- ^e In the beginning of the year 1219, Chu-yu Kau-ki, minister of the Kin, built a little city Chang-yau's within the inclosure of Kay-fong-fû, in Ho-nan, and fortified it very strongly. In April, exploits. Chang-yau, having been nominated to the command of a body of troops by Mûbûli, took several cities in the district of Pau-ting Fu; and then went to attack Kya-gu, the murderer of his friend, who was intrenched on a mountain: but not being able to force his works, he cut off his water; so that the other was obliged to surrender. Chang-yau tore out his heart, and sacrificed it to the manes of his friend. Afterwards, retiring with his people to Man-ching, a little unfortified city to the north-west of Pau-ting Fu, the Kin general, named U-tsyen, came and besieged him: but Chang-yau, after ordering all the useless men to mount the walls, sallied with the bravest of his soldiers, and cut his way, with great slaughter, through a his enemies. Having escaped this danger, he found himself surrounded by a body of reserve. At the first onset two of his teeth happened to be knocked out with an arrow: but becoming rather more furious, although he had lost almost all his men, he broke through them; and, with the few soldiers who were left him, plundered four little cities which were in his road. After this, receiving some reinforcements, he acquired fame by the conquests which he made in the districts of Cbing-ting Fû, and Pau-ting-Fû, in Pe-cheli.

Korea made tributary.

THIS same year, the Mungls, by their arms, made Korea (D) tributary; and, at the end of it, the Kin emperor put to death his prime minister Kau-ki, who was accused of being, by his bad advice, the cause of all the evils which the empire suffered. In August 1220, Mûbûli, arriving at Man-ching, near Pau-ting Fû, sent a party to the pass of Tau-ma-quan, a fortress b in the mountains. These having beaten a detachment of the Kin, the governor of Cbing-ting Fû submitted, and delivered that important place to Mûbûli; who ordered his army to set at liberty all the prisoners they had made, forbidding slaughter and plunder under the severest penalties ^b.

Conquests in Shan-tong,

THE Kin, after the death of Kau-ki, took proper measures for defending their dominions. He was succeeded by Su-ting, who had both experience and skill in military affairs. This minister had found means to set on foot an army of 200,000 men in Shan-tong; with which he frustrated the designs both of the Chinese emperor, and the king of Hya, in Shen-si, who were forced to raise the siege of Kong-chang Fû. The army, which the Kin had in Shan-tong, being encamped at Whang-ling-kan, the general sent 20,000 foot to attack Mûbûli, c who lay near Tsi-nan Fû, the capital of that province, which he had taken. The Mungl general, having had notice hereof, went to meet this detachment, fought, and defeated it. Afterwards he attacked the enemy's army drawn up on the river side, making his cavalry dismount; and, after a furious battle at close fight, routed them; an infinite number being drowned in the flight.

Shan-si, and Shen-si.

MUHULI, after this victory, made several conquests, and sat down before Tong-chang Fû; but perceiving it would hold out too long, raised the siege, and left troops to block it up. In May 1221, the garrison, falling in want of provisions attempted to withdraw; but the officer who commanded the blockade intirely defeated them, killing seven thousand, and then took possession of the city. Mûbûli, from Tong-chang Fû, marched to Tay-tong Fû, d in Shan-si; then, passing the Whang-bo, forty leagues west of that city, entered the country of Ortûs, and spread terror through the kingdom of Hya: so that its king saw the best course he had to take, was to do whatever the Mungl general would have him. He committed no hostilities this year against Hya, but attacked the Kin. He blocked up Tan-gan, a city of Shen-si; but found it too well fortified and provided to be quickly taken. He slew more than 7000 of the enemy: subdued Kya-chew, which he fortified, and some other places. His design was to seize the posts, which might facilitate the taking of Tong-quan, in order to go and besiege Kay-fong Fû.

Mûbûli's death,

IN 1222 Mûbûli made many conquests in the district of Ping-yang Fû; and the year following, attacked Fong-tsyang Fû in Shen-si. The Mungl general, after this, repassed the Whang-bo; and, having driven the Kin out of several posts in Shan-si, as well as recovered Pû-chew (a city a league and a half east of that river, which the enemy retook the year before), he set out upon another expedition; but fell sick at When-bi-hyen: and perceiving himself near his end, sent for his brother Tay-sun, and earnestly recommended to him the taking of Pyen-king (E), as a matter of great importance; being much grieved that he had not done it himself. After these words, he expired, aged fifty-four years; forty of which he had served in the army with success.

MUHULI was considered by all the Mungls as the first captain of their empire; and Jenghiz Khân had an entire confidence in him. The great dignity to which he was advanced did not lessen his military ardor; and in all the grand enterprises he underwent as much fatigue as the meanest soldier. The Khân, before he was proclaimed emperor, retreating to his camp by night, after a defeat; and, not able to find it, for the snow which had fallen, being much fatigued, lay down upon some straw to sleep: hereupon Porchi and Mûbûli took a covering, and held it over him all night in the open air. This generous action gained them much reputation, and rendered their families in great esteem among the Mungl princes.

IN September 1224, Sun, the emperor of the Kin, died, and was succeeded by his son Shew-su; who the next month made peace with the Hya.

(D) Called by the Tatars, Solgho; and by the Chinese, Kau-li and Chau-tsyen.

(E) A city seventeen leagues south-south-west of Ping-yang Fû.

a In the beginning of the year 1225, the emperor Jenghiz Khân, having passed through Tartary (F), arrived at the river Tula, after near seven years absence in the west; and it is easy to judge what impresson his return made in the minds of the neighbouring powers, whether friends or enemies. Tyau-li, queen of Lyau-tong, came to meet that monarch, with the princes her nephews. That lady, who had much wit, fell on her knees to acknowledge Jenghiz Khân, and make him compliments on his great conquests. The emperor, in his turn, consoled her on the death of the king, her spouse; praising the manner in which she governed her kingdom, and promised his protection to her whole family. Tyau-li, after returning thanks, prayed him to nominate Pi-tu king of Lyau-tong. The Khân could not help admiring the justice and prudence of this lady: for Pi-tu was son of Lycw-ko, by another b venter, but his mother was dead; and Tyau-li had several children by the same king. As Sben-ko, the eldest, had all the qualifications proper for governing, the emperor was for having them reign in conjunction; but the queen, persisting in her request for Pi-tu, the monarch nominated him; and had the goodness to relate to her the many brave actions he had done in the west. The emperor kept Sben-ko at his court; and ordered a great lord to conduct the queen and the new king into Lyau-tong c.

LI-TE, king of Hya, had given shelter to two great enemies of the Mungls, of which the Khân loudly complained: but that prince, far from making satisfaction, took those obnoxious persons into his service. At this new provocation Jenghiz Khân marched in person; and, in February 1226, took Yetsina (G). After this, the Mungls forced all the fortresses, which were very numerous, between that city, Ning-hya, Kya-yu-quan (H), and Kan-chew (I). Sû-chew (K), Kan-chew, and Si-lyang Fû (L), were also taken. The king of Hya died in July, of grief, to see his dominions become a prey to the Mungls. In November the Khân took Ling-chew, to the south of Ning-hya; and then encamped thirty or forty leagues to the north of the former.

OKTAY, his third son, accompanied by general Chaban, went into Ho-nan, and laid siege to Kay-fong Fû, capital of that province, and then the residence of the Kin emperor: but they were obliged to raise it. However, in 1227, marching into Sben-si, they took most of the fortresses that were in the districts of the metropolis Si-ngan Fû; then advanced towards the places and forts which the Kin had in the departments of Fong-isyang Fû and Han-chong Fû. d Oktay having gone into Tartary, and left the command to Chaban, the Kin, who concluded his designs were to re-enter Ho-nan, offered new proposals of peace to Jenghiz Khân; which being rejected, they made a last effort. They resolved to think of nothing now but how to defend themselves the best they could in Ho-nan: they fortified the passages of the Whang-ho, and the principal cities: they furnished Tong-quan with a great number of troops; and set on foot an army of 200,000 chosen men, commanded by the best officers they had.

JENGHIZ KHAN, having in the spring left an army to besiege Ning-hya (then called Hya-and in Hya: chew), capital of the kingdom of Hya, sent a great body of troops, who seized the countries of Koko Nor (M), Qua-chew, and Sha-chew (N). The Khân, at the head of another body, made himself master of Ho-chew (O) and Si-ning (P): then, after cutting in pieces an army e of 30,000 men, he went and besieged Lin-tau Fû, which belonged to the Kin. This city he took, with several others; and then, proud of so much success, went to pass the summer heats on the mountain Lu-pan (Q) in Sben-si.

(F) The historians of the west of Asia say, that, after leaving Tonkât, he passed through Turkestan, and the kingdom of the Naymans; then entered into Karakitay; and some months after went to Karakorum, the seat of his empire; but give us no particulars of his journey, more than the Chinese authors.

(G) Yetsina, or Azina, Eychina, Echina, or Ejina, was a considerable city of the kingdom of Hya; the same Marco Polo calls Ezina. The Chinese geography places it to the north of Kan-chew, and north-east of Sû-chew, 120 leagues from the former; but that distance (says Gaubil) must be too great. It is at present destroyed: it stood on a river of the same name, called also Echina, which runs by Sû-chew, and a branch of it by Kan-chew.

(H) A fort at the west end and gate of the great wall of China.

historians; from whom La Croix composed his history of Jenghiz Khân.

(K) Or So-chew, is the Suchure, or Suk-kir, of M. Polo, according to Gaubil.

(M) The true pronounciation is Hûbû Nor, or the lake Hûbû. These countries are, at present, possessed by the Eluth Mungls, or Kalmûks.

(N) Near Qua-chew, to the west of it. It is the Sachion of M. Polo, about 120 miles north-west of Khya-yu-quan, and in lat. 40° 20' long. 20° 40' west of Pe-king.

(O) A city in Sben-si, fourteen or fifteen leagues to the north-west of Lin-tau-fû.

(P) First, Si-ning-wey, now Si-ning-chew; a city in Sben-si, to the south of Kan-chew, and near the country of Koko Nor.

Ning-hya,

The kingdom
destroyed.

Ning-hya, surrendered at discretion, in June, and set out for Lu-pan (R), to humble himself a before the Mungl emperor: but he had no sooner left the city than he was slain. The place was intirely plundered, and a cruel slaughter made of the inhabitants, the plains being covered with dead bodies: they who escaped the sword, fled to the mountains, woods, and caves^d.

THIS is the account given in the Chinese history of the destruction of Hya, called Tangût by the more western writers; who, doubtless for want of good information, relate this great event with different circumstances; as may appear from the history of the Hya, to which we refer our readers^e. However, they add some other matters, which claim a place here.

Jurjeh Turks
submit.

After the defeat given to the army of Shidasku, king of Tangût, Jenghîz Khân marched against the Turks of Jurjeh, who had assisted him: but as they submitted to pay a yearly tribute, and receive garrisons into their towns, and also to furnish the victor with some troops, the emperor proceeded no further. There he received news from Bâghdâd of the Khalîfah's death: on which advice he ordered new levies to be raised, and, in the interim, secured himself, not only of the countries dependent on Tangût, as Ergbinul, Sinqui, and Egrikaya; but also of the neighbouring territories, and particularly of the city of Sikion, distant from Pe-king but fourscore days journey: which otherwise might have given him great uneasiness when he was entered into the Southern China.

Tushti.

AFTER this good success, he passed the winter in this fruitful country of Tangût; removing his camp from time to time, chiefly towards the borders of Turkestan. But, while his court was filled with joy, news came from Kipjak of the death of his eldest son Tushti (or Juji); which, by degrees, threw the Khân into a deep melancholy, and hindered him from relishing any diversions. Things even became so indifferent to him, that he appeared scarcely at all affected with the news they brought him of a great victory, gained by his lieutenant in the west, over Jalâlo'ddîn. This Soltân, as soon as he was informed that the emperor was at a distance from Persia, returned from India into Makrân, with some troops. From thence he went to Shîrâs, and afterwards to Ispâban; into which his friends introduced him secretly, and there augmented his little army. From thence he proceeded to Bâghdâd: but not being well received, he beat the troops which the Khalîfah had sent against him, and retook Tauris.

AFTER this he marched against the Georgians with 30,000 men: and, at his return to Azerbejân, advanced against the Mungls; who, having passed the river Amû, in the beginning of the year 623, came to meet him with more numerous forces. Both armies coming to a battle, Jalâlo'ddîn's was defeated; and this was the victory of which Jenghîz Khân had received advice.

lo'ddîn,

THE Mungls, on this advantage against the Soltân, made themselves masters of Tauris; while that prince, rallying his forces, harrassed his enemies, and had sometimes the better of them. He afterwards laid siege to Aklât (S), the capital of Armenia; whither the Khalîfah sent an ambassador to him with presents. From thence he passed into Anatolia, to oblige the Seljuk Turks, who possessed that country, to render him the same respect they had done his father: but he was there defeated by Alao'ddîn Kaykobâd, Soltân of Koniyab (or Iconium), in conjunction with the other princes of Rûm; who yet did not pursue him after the battle, because they were willing that he should keep the Mungls in play. He accordingly gave them no small diversion; but, at last, they came upon him by surprise; and having intirely routed his forces, plundered his camp. After this misfortune he fled to Mabân, in the confines of Azerbejân, where he lived a whole winter, without being known: but being at last discovered, he retired into Kûrdestân; where he was killed, four years after Jenghîz Khân's death, by a native of that country, in the house of one of his friends, where he had taken refuge.

So soon as the spring of the year 1226 was come, and the emperor's troops were arrived at the place of rendezvous, in order to enter Manji, or the Southern China; an officer repaired thither, sent by Shidasku, to acquaint the Khân, that, in case he would forget what was past, his master would in person wait on him. Shidasku made this step, for fear the Mungls should attack his fort of Arbaka, to which had retired after his defeat. The envoy, however, was well received at the court of Jenghîz Khân, who, in an audience, said to him: "You may assure your master, that I will no more think of what is past between him and me; and that I will grant him my protection (+)." Yet the last order he gave before he died was, that Shidasku, as soon as he came to court, should be put to death; which order

(R) One history says the Khân was at Tsing-cha-i, dependent on Kong-chang Fû, when Ning-hya was taken.

(S) A city near the lake of Vân, on the north side, often mentioned before; called also Eklât, and Kalât.

a was accordingly executed on him, his children, and his attendants, on their arrival there eight days after ^f, as will be set forth in its place ^g. Let us now return to the Chinese historians.

JENGHIZ Khân, having thus put an end to the kingdom of Hya, after it had continued ^{for 200 years} near 200 years under its own princes, intended also to complete the conquest of the empire of the Kin. But the beginning of the year 1227, he fell sick, on the mountain before-mentioned; and, finding death approach, on the 18th of August (T), sent for the generals of the army, and declared prince Toley, his fourth son, regent of the empire, till the arrival of his brother Oktaï, whom he nominated for his heir and successor. Then, recommending union among them, he said, with regard to the war against the Kin: that, as the best of their troops guarded Tong-quan, and they were also masters of the mountains to the south, it would therefore be difficult to attack and vanquish them, without the assistance of the Song (or Chinese); who, being their mortal enemies, he advised his officers to demand a passage through their territories, in order to attack the Kin: that, entering by the cities Tong and Teng (U), they should march directly and besiege Ta-lyang Fû (X): that this would oblige the Kin to call their troops from Tong-quan; and that, as they would be fatigued by the length of the journey, they might be attacked with advantage. Having spoken these words, he died, aged sixty-six (Y), after a reign of twenty-two years; and was buried by Toley in the cave of Ki-nyen (Z), a mountain to the north of the great Kobi, or sandy desert, in Tartary ^{and death}.

c THE historians of the west of Asia give a somewhat different account of his death and sepulchre. According to them, the physicians ascribed his sickness to the bad air of the marshy countries, where he had for a long time resided; and to the grief which the death of his son Tushî had occasioned.

His illness having seized him near a forest in the road to Ching, the camp was ordered to remain there; and Jenghiz Khân, judging, by the pains he felt, that his life was in danger, notwithstanding all the care taken by his physicians and astrologers, resolved to dispose of his dominions, and name a successor. To this purpose he ordered his sons, and their children, with the other princes of the blood, to come into his presence: then, raising himself upright, with that majestic look which had always gained him both awe and respect, d told them, he found himself departing; and added, "I leave you the greatest empire in the world: but, if you will preserve it, be always united; for if discord steals in amongst you, be assured that you will be all ruined." After this, he asked those who stood by, Whether it was not proper that he should make choice of a prince who was capable to govern so many kingdoms after him? Hereupon his sons and grandsons fell on their knees, and said; "You are our father and our emperor, and we are your slaves; it is for us to bow down our heads when you honour us with your commands, and to execute them."

The princes then rising from the ground, he named prince Oktaï for his successor, and declared him the Khân of Khâns, by the title of Khân; which he gave him, and which his successors have retained (A). They all bowed the knee a second time, and cried, "What e the great Jenghiz Khân ordains is just; we will all obey him; and if he pleases to command us even to kiss the rod, with which we have merited to be chastised, we will do it without disputing it." The emperor gave to Jagatay, Mawara'nabr (or Great Bukharia), and several other countries, by a written instrument, to prevent any difference that might arise between him and the rest of his heirs; and the dominions so granted took the name of Ulûs Chagatay, that is, the country of Chagatay. He also commanded Karashar Nevân to accompany this prince into his new dominions, and pursue Jalâlo'ddin, in case he ventured to invade them. The last order Jenghiz Khân gave was concerning Shidasku ^{Oktaï nominated}.

(T) One history puts his death seven days later, at a place called Sali-chwen; the Chinese word Chwen, denoting the Sali to have been a place full of fountains, lakes, and hills.

(U) Tong-chew and Teng-hyen, cities of Ho-nan, depending on Nan-yang Fû, and bordering on the province of Hu-quang; by which, and Shen-fû, he counselled them to enter Ho-nan. Gaubil.

(X) At present Kay-fong Fû, capital of Ho-nan.

(Y) All the Chinese histories agree as to the years of this Khân's age and reign. Akûlghazi Khân says, he lived sixty-five years, and reigned twenty-five in quality of Khân: La Croix agrees with him as to the years of his reign, but assigns seventy-three for those of his age.

(Z) The Chinese history of the Mungls says, that this cave was the usual burying place of Jenghiz Khân's successors. Several Mungl lords, of his posterity, at Pe-king, affirmed the place of his burial to be on the mountain called Han. Lat. 47° 54' long. 9° 3' west of Pe-king.

(A) Some authors say, there was no change made in the title of Khân; and possibly not: for Gaubil says Kohân, or Kahân, is the Mungl word which answers to that of Hân (or Khân). See Souciot, Observ. Math. &c. p. 188.

His burial:

It was no difficult matter to conceal his death; because when any great person among the Mungls is sick, some signal is put a-top of the house, to give notice that none should visit him; and centinels are placed at a good distance from their lodgings, to hinder any from approaching, but those who are sent for (B). After this execution, Jenghîz Khân's death was published, which threw all the court into extreme sorrow (C). His body was interred with great magnificence, in a place which he had chosen for the purpose: it was under a very beautiful tree, where, in his return from the chace, a few days before he fell sick, he had rested himself with much satisfaction. A very noble monument was afterwards erected over his grave: and the people, who came to visit the tomb, planted other trees round it, in such delicate order, as rendered it in time one of the finest sepulchres in the world (D). Historians make no mention of men being slain at the grave of this monarch; nor is this barbarous custom countenanced by any law: yet it is certain that this inhumanity was exercised at the funerals of the emperors who succeeded him. The attendants, who accompanied the funeral pomp, put to death those whom they met in the way, in a persuasion (E) that they were predestinated to die at that time: and even cut the throats of the finest horses.

JENGHIZ KHAN, besides all the virtues requisite in great conquerors, had a genius fit for forming grand enterprizes, a consummate wisdom and prudence to carry them on; a natural eloquence of speech to persuade; a patience proof against all difficulties, and able to surmount all obstacles. His temperance was admirable, and his understanding large, with a penetrating judgment, which made him always choose the best of whatever was proposed in an instant: yet it must be confessed, says our author, that he was cruel and bloody, and treated his enemies with too much rigour¹. The great genius of this prince appears in some measure from the discipline which he established among his troops; whereof we have already given an account².

When he was about taking the field, every one of his subjects knew how much he was to furnish towards the equipage of the army. He punished vice and crimes with as much rigour as he rewarded virtue and commendable actions. He was not satisfied to choose strong men for the wars, it was necessary also that they should discover some parts; and out of the bravest of those, he made his officers. He usually appointed the best footmen among the captives to take care of the horses; and employed the dullest to look after the sheep. So many good regulations gave him an easy conquest over the neighbouring countries, where there was not the like disposition. He was likewise accustomed, once a year, to assemble all his officers, as well civil as military, and examine whether they had the capacity requisite for the well discharge of their employments; never failing to bestow large praises where they were due³.

JENGHIZ KHAN, with regard to his religion, was a deist; as hath been already observed. The first time he entered China, he gave orders to exclude the Bonzas from being any way concerned in either the army or the court: for he was inclined to destroy them; because, says the Chinese history of this prince, it was difficult to say exactly in what his religion (F) consisted.

his wives,

JENGHIZ KHAN had a great number of wives (G); many of whom bore the title of empress. All these wives were distinguished by their palaces: and these palaces, called Ordû, or Ortû, were to the number of four. The first and most considerable of the empresses was Hyu-chen, daughter of Te-in, lord of the Honkirat (or Kongorat) tribe: whose sons, Oktay and Toley, were therefore preferred to the rest. The Khân excluded the princes of the family, born of Chinese women, from inheriting the crown⁴.

THIS is all that has been transmitted to us from the Chinese history concerning the wives of Jenghîz Khân. The more western historians mention five, who were esteemed above all the rest. The first, Guzi Suren (H), daughter of the Khân of the Naymans, who was his first wife. The second, Purta Kujin (I), daughter of the Khân of Kongorat, the same with Hyu-chen, before-

(B) Abûlghazi Khân says, that the sons of Jenghîz Khân, pursuant to his order, kept his death concealed; and, having assembled a great army, went and besieged Tangut; which falling into their hands, after a very obstinate resistance, they put to death Shidasku, with a good number of his soldiers, and carried the rest into slavery.

(C) His sons spent three months in mourning, according to Abûlghazi Khân; and La Croix says, that the news of his death being spread all over the empire, the court was filled with Khâns, and great lords, both tributary and allied, who came to comfort the afflicted princes; and that this resort of sovereigns lasted at least six months.

(D) According to Abûlghazi Khân, this place was called Burkhân Kaldin; and that all his descendants, who died in those provinces, have been interred there.

(E) Rather under a pretence; for it does not appear that the Mungls believed predestination.

(F) From hence the author of that history seems to have been of the sect of Fo: for the religion of Jenghîz Khân seems not to have differed from that of Konfusius, with respect to the Deity.

(G) Fadhlallah says, he had near 500, besides concubines. La Croix.

(H) In Abûlghazi Khân's history she is called Kariz, or Kariju, and ranked as his third wife. He makes her also the widow of Tayyau, Khân of the Naymans.

(I) Or Borta Kuin, as in Abûlghazi Khân, who ranks her as the first wife.

mentioned. The third, Obâljîn, or Ovisulujîn, daughter of Vang Khân, king of the Kara-its.

- a The fourth, Kubku Khatun (K), daughter of the emperor of Kitay: and the fifth, Kulan Khatun (L), daughter of Dairafon, a Mungl Khân, of the Merkit tribe: which lady was an extraordinary beautyⁿ.

JENGHIZ KHAN had a great number of children; but the Chinese history mentions only six and children sons and three daughters. Chuchi (Fuji, or Tusbi), the eldest son, was a great captain; active, full of fire, and delighting in war. Chagatay (or Jagatay, and Zagatay) was universally beloved for his wisdom and affability. Ogotay (Ugoday, or Oktay) was endowed with much prudence and greatness of soul; was courageous, and loved justice. Tolcy (or Tuli) was His favourite beloved by his father, and generally esteemed by the Mungls. Of Uluche and Kolye-kyen, the sons:
b two last (M), nothing remarkable occurs. The three princesses were married to Idikât, Khân of the Igûrs, Poyabo, and Po-tu, as hath been already observed: and the heirs of the three sons-in-law of the Khân usually married the daughters of the Mungl emperors^o.

THE western Asiatic historians ascribe the first four sons of Jenghîz Khân to Purta Kujin (or Hyu-chen); whereas the Chinese history makes her the mother of only two of them. These four alone seem to have been vested with power and command; the rest, who are scarcely mentioned, though all princes of the blood alike, had only some petty governments or lordships conferred on them. Tusbi, or Fuji, Khân, was master huntsman of the empire (N), the their employ- most considerable post in it; as hunting was the prime exercise among the Mungls. He chose ments.
c Zagatay, or Jagatay, to be chief judge, and gave him the title of director of the Yassa, or laws; which were put into writing. Oktay, from his wisdom and prudence, was deemed worthy of the post of chief counsellor (O); nor did his father undertake any thing of moment without consulting him. All military affairs were committed to Tuli's (or Taulay's) care; the generals depended on, and received the Grand Khân's orders, from him^p.

BEFORE we conclude the reign of this conqueror, it is incumbent on us to perform our pro- Larus of Jen- mise^q, to insert the Yassa, or laws, above-mentioned; which were made by him, and esta- ghîz Khân; blished in a dyet held for that purpose, at Karakorum, in the year 1205: they are in substance as follow.

- d “ 1. To believe, that there is but one God, the Creator of heaven and earth; who alone gives life and death, riches and poverty; who grants and denies whatsoever he pleases; and who has over all things an absolute power.”

TEMUJIN seems to have published this law (P) merely to shew his belief of the Deity; for, far from ordaining any punishment or persecution against those who were of other religions, he forbade molesting any person on account of his faith; leaving every body at liberty to profess that which he liked best, on condition that he believed there was but one God: for even some of his own children and princes of the blood were Christians, Jews, and Mohammedans.

“ 2. THAT the heads of sects, the religious, the criers of the temples, and those who wash the dead, should, as well as physicians, be exempted from all public offices.

- e “ 3. THAT none whatsoever should, under pain of death, presume to cause himself to be as to polity proclaimed Grand Khân, without having first been duly elected by the Khâns, commanders, and other Mogul lords, lawfully assembled in a general dyet.

“ 4. THAT no heads of tribes should use any titles of honour, which they affected to have, in imitation of the Mohammedans; or that any should give to his successor any title but that of Khân, with two a's. He desired also, that, for the future, all his subjects should style him simply Khân.” This was ever after observed by all who spoke to him: but in writing to him, they always added some other of his titles, as most powerful, invincible, &c.

“ 5. THAT peace should never be made with any king, prince, or people, till they were intirely subdued.

(K) Abû'lghâzi Khân names her Kizu, or Kiju, and places her the second.

(L) Abû'lghâzi Khân, besides the three before-mentioned, names Milu and Singan for the fourth and fifth: which two last were, he says, descended from a Tatar family, and two sisters; the second of whom he married after the death of the first.

(M) According to Abû'lghâzi Khân, the Mungl emperor, besides his four sons by Purta Kujin, had five others by the rest of his wives; but he mentions not their names.

(N) Abû'lghâzi Khân says, he governed the œconomy of his father's court.

(O) According to the same author, Oktay had the management of the treasury, and received the accounts of the governors of provinces.

(P) Although this law had been long observed by the Tatars in its purity, and is at this day by many of them; yet superstition by degrees introduced idolatry, by a distinction between a celestial and a terrestrial God; which was pretended not to be contrary to their law-giver's intention. The terrestrial god was placed in their houses, in form of an image, and covered with felt, and named Natigay; accompanied with others, which they said were the images of his wife and children. La Croix.

and warfare,

“ 6. THAT the troops should always be divided into tens, hundreds, thousands, and ten “ thousands; as very commodious for the speedy raising of forces, and making detachments.

“ 7. THAT the soldiers, when going to take the field, should receive their arms from the “ officers, and return them at the end of the campaign: that they should keep their arms “ clean, and in good condition, and shew them to their commanders when preparing to give “ battle.

“ 8. THAT none, on pain of death, presumed to pillage the enemy, before the general “ grants leave: but that the meanest soldier should have the same advantage as the officer;
“ and remain master of all the booty he was found possessed of, on condition he paid to the “ Khân's receiver the duties or share specified by the laws.

game and meats,

“ 9. THAT from the month which, with us, is March to October, no person should take “ stags, deer, roebucks, hares, wild asses, nor certain birds; to the end that the court and “ soldiers might find sufficient game during the winter, in the huntings they were obliged to “ make.” As Temijîn was sensible, continual exercise was necessary to keep soldiers in good order, he appointed hunting, as most proper for that purpose.

“ 10. THAT in killing beasts none should cut the throat; but, tying the legs, rip up the “ belly, and pluck out the heart.

“ 11. THAT the blood and entrails of beasts might be eaten.” Before this the Moguls were forbidden to eat them: but as Temijîn was returning one time from an expedition, wherein provisions fell short, the soldiers met with a great quantity of entrails, left by people, who had newly killed beasts taken in hunting; and, being pressed by hunger, eat them, the Khân himself partaking; who, considering how useful this food might be to his troops on the like occasions, took off the prohibition, by a law.

12. THE privileges and immunities granted to Tarkâns were regulated in the manner already related.

industry and honesty,

“ 13. To banish idleness out of his dominions, he obliged all his subjects to serve the public
“ in some kind or other. They who went not to the wars, were to work so many days, at “ certain seasons, on the public structures; or do some other work for the state; and one day “ in the week was to be employed particularly in the service of the Khân.

“ 14. THE law against thieving was, that he who stole an ox, or any thing of equal price, “ should be punished with death, and their bodies cut asunder, in the middle, with an han“ ger: that those who were guilty of lesser thefts should receive seven, seventeen, twenty-seven, “ thirty-seven, and so on to seven hundred blows, with a cudgel, in proportion to the value “ of the thing stolen.” But this punishment might be bought off, by paying nine times the value. The exactness with which this law was observed secured all the Grand Khân's subjects from being robbed.

servants and slaves,

“ 15. THEY were forbidden to use for servants any of their own nation: to the end they might “ addict themselves to war, and be obliged to take care of the captives they should make, “ whom they were to preserve for their own service.

“ 16. IT was forbidden, on pain of death, to all Moguls and Tatars, to give meat or drink, “ or to lodge or clothe, another person's slave, without permission from his master. All per“ sons who should meet with a fugitive slave, were likewise obliged, under the same penalty, “ to seize and bring him back to his master.”

marriage,

17. By the law concerning marriages it was ordained, “ That the man should buy his wife;
“ and not marry with any maid to whom he was a-kin, in the first or second degree: but
“ in all other degrees it was permitted; so that a man might marry two own sisters. Poly“ gamy was permitted, and the free use of their women slaves.” This at last occasioned that great liberty which every man took, to have as many wives and slaves as he could maintain.

adultery,

“ 18. Adulterers were condemned to death; and a man was permitted to kill them when “ surprised in the act.” According to Marco Polo, the inhabitants of Kaindu murmured against this law; because it was a custom with them to offer their wives and daughters to their friends when they came to see them, in token of respect and affection. They presented several petitions to Temijîn; intreating, that they might not be deprived of this privilege. The prince, yielding to their importunities, left them to their shame, and granted what they desired:
but, at the same time, declared, that he looked on those people as infamous.

posthumous contracts,

“ 19. To cultivate amity among his subjects, he extended the ties of relationship very far.
“ He permitted two families to unite, although they had no children living; by writing a con“ tract between the son of one and daughter of the other, though both dead, and performing “ the ceremony in their names (Q). After this they were reputed married, and the families “ became truly allied, as if they had been really married.

* LA CROIX, p. 80, & seq.

“ 20. IT

(Q.) This custom is still in use among the Tatars; ing the figures of the pretended married couple, and but mixed with superstitious circumstances. After draw- some animals, on the contract, they throw it into the fire;

a “ 20. IT was forbidden, under severe penalty, for any persons to wash themselves, or even “ their clothes, in running waters, during the time it thundered.” Thunder, in antient Mogu-^{fear of thun-} listan, and the neighbouring countries, was so dreaded by the people, because it often did them ^{der.} mischief, that, as soon as the noise of it was heard, they threw themselves desperately into rivers and lakes, and were often drowned. Temûjîn, finding that he lost many of his best soldiers by this extraordinary fear, made this law, by which they were made to believe, that, by disturbing the waters, they caused exhalations which occasioned the thunder; and that it would not do them half so much harm, if they withdrew from any water. All observe this law still, excepting the Mohammedan Tatars, who look upon it as a superstitious custom, which contradicts one of the principal injunctions of their religion, which is to wash in any water; and with-b out which washing they cannot be saved.

“ 21. SPIES, false witnesses, sodomites, and forcerers (R), were condemned to be put to “ death.

“ 22. HE published most severe ordinances against governors who failed of doing their Checks on gov-
 “ duty: but principally those who commanded in far distant parts. If their conduct was blame- ^{vernors.} “ able, they were punished with death; and if their fault was but slight, they were obliged “ to repair in person, to justify themselves, before the Grand Khân.” Which must have been extraordinary checks.

MANY other laws were published, which are not specified in the authors before us (S): but The Yassa ⁷⁸⁷
 these, which were doubtless the principal, remained in full vigour during the reign of Temûjîn, ^{verenced.}
 c and his successors. Timûr Beg, or Tamerlan, himself, who was born 111 years after this prince, caused them to be observed through all his empire; and the Krim Tatars, as well as others, to this day, religiously keep them. Marakeshi affirms, that they were all the contrivance of the Grand Khân himself: but others say, they were only copied from those which the orientals heretofore ascribed to Turk, the son of Japhet, the great ancestor of all the inhabitants of Tatary.

* LA CROIX, p. 84, & seq.

fire; being persuaded, that all this is carried by the smoke to their children, who thereupon marry in the other world. La Croix.

(R) Yet there were forcerers in the time of Jenghîz Khân, and his immediate successors (if we may believe the missionaries and other writers) as well as now.

(S) La Croix says, in the authors which he had transflated: but he can hardly mean oriental writers only; since, in this account of the Yassa, he has made use also of Europeans, without well distinguishing one sort from the other. There is a collection of laws in the Levant, intituled, Yassa Jenghîz Khâni: but La Croix had not seen it.

BOOK V.

The history of Jenghîz Khân's successors in Mogulestân, or the country of the Moguls.

CHAP. I.

The reign of Oktay Khân, second emperor of the Mungls.

A. D. 1228.
2d Khân, Oktay.

AS soon as Jenghîz Khân was dead, Toley, or Tuli, who was regent in Oktay's absence, sent officers to notify the same to the princes of his house, and generals of the army. Mean while the war against the Kin was carried on with more vigour than ever: Ho-chew (A), in Shen-si, had held out a long time, animated by the bravery of Chin-in, the governor, who at length, finding the city ready to be forced by the enemy, advised his wife to provide for her safety: that lady answered resolutely, that, as she had shared with him the honours and pleasures of life, she would die with him, and immediately took poison. Her two sons, and daughter-in-law, followed her example. Chin-in, after causing them to be interred, slew himself, and the city was taken. The Kin, commanded by a prince of the blood, defeated the Mungls, and killed 8000 of them in the beginning of the year 1228.

He is acknowledged,

A. D. 1229.

THE regent, after he had buried his father, went to meet Oktay. However, the grandees and generals not knowing but Toley intended to make himself emperor, dared not give that title to his brother. After waiting at the river Kerlon till the arrival of Jagatay (B), the princes of the imperial house unanimously agreed to adhere to Jenghîz Khân's will; and, by the advice of Yelu Chu-tsai, a general assembly of the great lords and princes was appointed to meet at Karakorum (C), on the 22d of August 1229. That day being come, Jagatay and Toley, attended by the princes of their house, the chiefs of tribes, and generals of the army, went, and kneeling before Oktay's tent, with a loud voice wished a long and happy reign to prince Oktay; a ceremony never used before on the same occasion by the Mungls. The new emperor made Yelu Chû-tsai his prime minister, and imparted every thing to his brother Toley; those two princes having had an intire affection for each other^a.

THE western historians of Asia, on the subject of Oktay's succession, say: that, in 627, two years after Jenghîz Khân's death, his sons Jagatay Khân and Taulay Khân, with the children of his son Fuji, being assembled in presence of all the great officers of the Mogul empire, Belgatay Noyân, and Iljiktey Noyân, two of the principal court lords, caused the last dispositions of the late emperor to be publicly read; and, pursuant to the tenor of them, required Ugaday (or Oktay) Khân to accept of the sovereignty: but he declined it; saying, that, as he had a paternal uncle and two brothers living, he would rather that one of them would take that trust upon him (D). But after the assembly had spun out forty days, without being able to unfix

(A) This city was called Si Ho-chew or Ho-chew of the west, to distinguish it from the other cities of that name. At present it is called Min-chew, being a considerable fortress, twenty leagues south of Lín tau Fû. Gaubil.

(B) One history says that Oktay would have given up the empire to Jagatay, but that he would not accept of it. Gaub.

(C) By the Chinese called Ho-lin. Gaubil informs us in this place, that there was a dissertation at the end of his history of the Ming emperors, to prove that Ho-lin is the same with Karakorum, the capital of Jenghîz Khân's empire: but no such thing has been published.

(D) According to La Croix, p. 383. Oktay protested he would not act as sovereign, till the dyer ordained by the law had been held: and they had examined whether he was capable of reigning.

a the resolution of Ugaday Khân; his brothers, determined to comply with their father's will at any rate, laid hold of him by the arms, and placed him, in some measure whether he would or not, in the imperial throne. The new Khân, having been obliged, in this manner, to submit to the officious zeal of his brothers, and all the grandees of state, gave a great feast to the whole assembly, and distributed magnificent presents to those who were at it. After this, he applied himself effectually to remedy all the irregularities which had crept into the government during the two years (E) interregnum^b.

WHEN Sherw-su, the emperor of the Kin (who reigned in Kitay), understood that Oktay was seated on the throne of the Mungls, he sent envoys into Tartary, who, under pretence of complimenting him on his advancement, proposed conditions of peace: while Oktay, resolving b to continue the war, would not hearken to them; and ordered his great general Chela-wen (F) to invest King-yang-fu, in Shen-si. But this place being well fortified, and furnished with provisions, that general did not think fit, in the depth of winter, to lose his time before it.

THE Chinese history assures us, that, when Oktay ascended the throne, the Mungls had neither fixed laws nor customs for government (G). The officers appointed to rule the several countries, put people to death at pleasure, and often massacred whole families. Hereupon Yelu Chü-tsai drew up laws, which the emperor caused to be rigorously observed.

THIS prince resolved to inform himself concerning the countries which were subject to him in Tartary, China, and the west: and this year they began to settle the quantity of silk, money, and grain, which the Chinese families, or the inhabitants of Kitay under his obedience, were to pay annually. They likewise ascertained the number of horses, oxen, and sheep, which the Mungls were to be taxed at: and the males above fifteen years of age were numbered in the western parts of the empire, in order to determine what they ought to pay: for which purpose Oktay sent a Chinese, well versed in business, to examine into the state of those conquered countries. This prince, from the first, gained the love of his Chinese subjects, by giving to Shen-tyen-che, and Lyerw-he-ma, the command of the Chinese troops in Pe-che-li and Shan-tong. These two lords, with Yen-she, were declared generals of the army. They had distinguished themselves under Mübilü; and their troops yielded in nothing to those of the Mungls.

AMONG the officers of the tribe of Que-lye (or Kara-it), whose lord was brother of Toley (or Prime minister), Vang Khân, prince of those people (H), was Chin-hay, a lord recommendable for his valour, integrity, and wisdom. He drank with Jenghiz Khân the water of the river Pan-chuni; was d in all his battles with the confederate Tatar princes; and followed him in his expeditions, both into Kitay and the west of Asia, where he acquired great reputation. Oktay chose this illustrious person not only to be one of his generals, but also as minister of state, in conjunction with Yelu Chü-tsai.

AT this time the country of Kin-cha (or Kipjak), with others to the north, north-east, and north-west, of the Caspian sea, were governed by Patü (or Batü), eldest son of Chuchi (or Fuji); and Jagatay held a great part of the western conquests: while other princes of the imperial family ruled over the great regions of Tartary, and elsewhere. But all these princes depended on Oktay; and the several generals, governors, commissioners, and others, who e served under them in their respective departments, were recalled, turned out, or changed, at the pleasure of the emperor^c. This distribution is pretty conformable to what the western historians relate: they say, that Jenghiz Khân, in his life-time, divided his dominions among his children; and that, after his death, they remained in the same situation: that Kapshák (or Kipjak), remained to Batü: that Jagatay had for his share Great Bukharia, with Karazm and Turkestan: that Tuli had Khorassan, Persia, and India: and that all the rest fell to Oktay; namely, Mogulistan, Katay (or Kitay), and the other countries eastward to the Tartarian sea^d.

IN the same year, the kings of Mu-lay (I) and Industan came in person to Karakorum, to

(E) La Croix says, the public affairs did not suffer during this interregnum; Jagatay, the guardian and expounder of the laws, made them to be observed with so great exactness.

(F) He was of the Chalar, or Jalayr, tribe, and one of the four intrepids, mentioned before, p. 272.

(G) If Jenghiz Khan had enacted laws with that solemnity which is mentioned by the western Asiatic writers, how is it possible the Chinese historians could be ignorant of it, especially as the Mungls themselves must have had a hand in composing them? Or do the writers suppose they had no laws because they had not the Chinese? Or lastly, do they mean that the Mungls had no particular set of political laws, distinct from the Yassa of Jenghiz Khân.

(H) He succeeded his brother as prince of the Kara-its, having joined Jenghiz Khân's party, when he found his brother Toley had undertaken to destroy that conqueror's family, and gave his daughter in marriage to his fourth son Toley, or Tuli. His name was Akimpü, as is mentioned hereafter.

(I) Mu-lay is the kingdom where Toley made great ravages while his father besieged Talkhân. Gauhil.—It seems to mean the country of the Molabedab (called also Ismaelians and assassins), in Mazanderan and Kubestân.

make their court to Oktay. The lord also of the country and city of Issepalano (K) came to a submit himself.

State of the customs.

JENGHIZ KHAN, after his return from the west (L) finding himself without a provision either of rice or silks, several of the great lords would persuade him, that the conquered lands in Kitay could be of no use, unless the inhabitants were all destroyed; but that, in case those useless people were once out of the way, their country might be turned into pastures, which would prove of vast advantage. This furnished Yelu Chû-tsay with a proper occasion to let the Mungls see the knowledge he was master of. He explained to Jenghîz Khân the method which ought to be taken to render the conquest of China useful. Although, said this minister, we have only a small part of that empire, yet if things be well ordered, the cultivated lands, the salt, the iron, the profit of the rivers, and other commodities, might produce to the emperor fifty van of lyang (M), or Taëls, forty van of tan in rice, and 800,000 pieces of silk; all which might be done without incommoding the people.

Regulations
purposed;

JENGHIZ KHAN was surprised at this discourse of Yelu Chû-tsay; and thenceforth understood that a conqueror ought to think of something else than to render himself famous by the massacre of enemies: that indeed he should have warriors to fight; but that there was need of magistrates to govern, peasants to till the ground, merchants to carry on trade, officers to take care of the revenue of the empire, and likewise men of learning. Prince Oktay, who had relished the discourse of that sage minister still better than his father, as soon as he became emperor, committed to his care the management of the taxes. Yelu divided Pe-che-li, Sban-tong, Sban-si, and Lyau-tong, into ten departments, each of which had a custom-house in the principal city: the other cities were made subordinate to that, and magistrates appointed to govern the people.

and established.
A. D. 1230.

OKTAY took pleasure in acquainting himself with the rules of good government: he was desirous also to know the ancient history of China; and even that of Kong-fu-tse, or Konfusius, and Che-w-kong. The minister gratified his prince in all he sought for; and his regulations, with regard to the customs, were published. They began to put them in execution the beginning of the next year. 400 pounds of salt yielded 40 lyang: they took a tenth out of wine, silk, rice, and corn, for the emperor; and one thirtieth part for lesser wares. After these orders were issued, Oktay went with his brother Toley to make a great hunting on the river Orkhon; and in summer they removed to the river Tamir.

Capital of Shen-si,

THE KHÂN had already commanded Kin-tau (now Si-gân Fû), the capital of Sben-si, to be attacked; and that great city was at length taken. In July, he, with his brother Toley, marched southward, with a formidable army, resolving to destroy the dynasty of the Kin. The Mungls entered Sben-si, and destroyed no fewer than sixty important posts: but were baffled before Tong-quan. Hereupon the army divided into two bodies: Oktay, with one of them, repassed the Whang-ho, to go into Sban-si (N); while Toley, accompanied by prince Mongko (or Mangû), his eldest son, prince Kew-wben-pû-wha, third son of Pye-li Kitay (O), Jenghîz Khân's fourth brother, and other princes, went to invest Fong-tsyang Fû, in Sben-si. Lyew-he-ma, already mentioned, and Ko-te-hay, son of the general Ko-pau-yu, were in this detachment: but Gan-char was the principal commander under Toley, and the general who distinguished himself most. As Toley attacked the place vigorously, the army which was at Tong-quan undertook to succour it: but that prince rendered all their attempts fruitless; and having defeated the Kin in a battle which continued the whole day (P), the city was taken in April 1231.

New measures
taken.

ONE of the Kin officers, who had surrendered to the Mungls, waited on Toley, and convinced him that he lost time, as well as men, in attacking the enemy by Tong-quan and the Whang-ho. He assured him, that the proper way was to pass through the country of Han-chong Fû, in Sben-si; and then he might, in less than a month, enter Ho-nan, by the cities of

p. 63, note (1), says, the Whang-ho is the Karamoran of Polo.

(O) This is not a proper name, but a title, signifying the regulo, or prince, of Kitay. Pye-li, or Pey-li, is a regulo of the third order or degree.

(P) To this place may be referred what we meet with in Abûlghazi Khân, who tells us, that Oktay, after his expedition, advanced farther into Kitay, and sent his brother Taulay before, with 10,000 men: but having been surrounded by an army of the enemy, consisting of 100,000 forces, must infallibly have perished, if he had not ordered one of his magicians to make the Tsada (or Jada); that is to produce a boisterous winter-season in the midst of summer. By this means Altûn Khân's army being enfeebled, they were all cut to pieces, excepting 5000, who escaped.

Tang

a Tang and Teng. Toley, liking this advice, sent to consult Oktay Khân, who approved of it; the rather, for its having been conformable to the sentiments of Jenghîz Khân^f. Hereupon he assembled his generals, and ordered them to be in readiness in January next, declaring, that he intended to reduce Pyen-king (Q), the capital of the Kin empire. At the same time he gave Toley orders to seize Pau-ki, a city some leagues to the south-west of Fong-tsyang Fû; then to march towards Han-chong, and demand passage from the generals of the Song.

At this time the enemies of Yelu Chû-tsay endeavoured to ruin his credit with Oktay. The principal among them were Wa-chin, chief of the Hongkirat tribe, the emperor's maternal uncle; and She-mo-hyen, a great officer of state. These two represented to Oktay, that it was dangerous to trust all the authority with a stranger, such as was Yelu; and charged him with a thousand crimes. This minister had persuaded the emperor to name Mandarins for the police, the revenues, and the army; who should be independent of each other, and accountable to the emperor, or such ministers as he shall appoint for that purpose. He likewise advised that money, silks, and other rewards, should be given to the great lords, instead of cities and provinces; which the Khân was inclined to bestow on them, having promised to distribute the conquered countries among them. Yelu represented how dangerous such a measure would be to the royal authority, and ruinous to the people.

THE Khân, persuaded that his scheme was right, rejected the accusations of Wa-chin and She-mo-hyen, which he gave them to understand proceeded from jealousy and envy. Wa-chin was confounded at the emperor's answer: yet his great birth, joined to much power and reputation, would have daunted a minister less resolute than Yelu; who still stood firm, and continued to press Oktay to appoint Mandarins for the above-mentioned purposes. He proposed Ching-hay and Nyen-bo to be placed at the head of affairs: but these lords, who had a great deal of merit, and were good military officers, fearing Wa-chin, intreated Yelu not to persist in proposing measures to the emperor which so greatly displeased the grandees. But that minister desired them to let him go on his own way; promising that they should not suffer for any faults of his.

SOME time after, a very strong accusation having been lodged against She-mo-hyen, Oktay referred him to be judged by Yelu Chû-tsay, who told his majesty, that She-mo-hyen had no other fault but that of being too proud; and that, when the war was finished, they might examine what punishment he deserved. The emperor admired this conduct of his minister; and told his courtiers, that Yelu was the example which they ought to imitate. He afterwards caused the registers to be brought, whereby it appeared, that the gold, the silver, the silks, and other things received for his duties, were conformable to what Yelu had proposed the year before. The Mungl lords were surprised at this; and they who had so violently persecuted him changed in his favour. Hereupon the Khân committed to his management all affairs in general, and likewise delivered to him the great seal^g.

MEAN time Toley, pursuant to the emperor's orders, assembled all his troops at Pau-ki; and sent Sû-pû-han to the governor of Myen-chew, in Shen-si, to demand passage: but this governor put that officer to death; and, by so doing, caused the ruin of an infinite number of people, who were subjects of the Song emperor his master. Toley, enraged at this action, declared that he would make the author repent it. He decamped in August; and, having forced the passages, put to the sword the inhabitants of Wha-yang, and Fong-chew, two cities in the district of Han-chong Fû. Then, after he had cut steep rocks to fill deep abysses, and made roads through places almost inaccessible, he came and besieged that city. The people, on his approach, fled to the mountains; and more than 100,000 perished, in a place called Shau.

TOLEY, after the taking of Han-chong Fû, divided his troops, consisting of 30,000 horse; of which one part went westward, to Myen-chew. From thence, after opening the passages of the mountains, that detachment arrived at the river Kya-ling (R); which they crossed on rafts, made of the wood of demolished houses: and then marching along its banks, seized many important posts. They proceeded as far as the city of Si-shû-i; and having destroyed more than 140 cities, towns, or fortresses, returned to the army. The second detachment encamped between Han-chong Fû and Yong-chew, where they seized an important post in the mountains; which are called Tau-tong, six or seven leagues to the north-east of Han-chong Fû. On the other side, the emperor Oktay advanced in October towards Pû-chew, a city of Shan-si, in the district of Ping-yang Fû; which, after a vigorous defence, being taken, he prepared to pass the Whang-ho.

TOLEY, after surmounting infinite difficulties, arrived in December on the borders of Ho-nan; and made a shew as if he designed to attack the capital of the Kin. His entrance, by a passage so little suspected, filled every-body with such astonishment, that all fled before him, without the least resistance. On this advice, the emperor of the Kin assembled a great council, wherein several lords proposed to furnish the court, and other principal cities, with good soldiers; to supply the capital with grain and forage; to quit the field, and oblige the people to shut themselves up in the cities. These grandees pretended, that Toley had ruined his army by his extraordinary march; so that they must either die with hunger, or be forced to retreat. At this discourse the emperor cast a great sigh, and protested that he would rather perish than thus see his people abandoned, after what they had suffered during twenty years for his service. Hereupon he ordered his generals Hota, Ilapûa, and others, to march at the head of the army against the enemy; and they accordingly advanced in the same month to Teng-chew, in the district of Nan-yang Fû^a.

Toley repulsed.
A. D. 1232.

TOLEY, having crossed the Han on the 31st of January 1232, resolved to attack the Kin army, at the same time when they were debating whether they should pass that river to fight the Mungls. The Kin generals ascended the mountain Yu, near Teng-chew (S), to observe the land; and placed the cavalry to the north of that mountain, and the infantry to the south. The Mungls, without losing any time, marched forward in a line, and then stopped a moment. Hota, judging it difficult to attack them, was for deferring the battle: but the Mungls, advancing, sent a body of horse to fall on the Kin, who stood firm. After this the Kin, in their turn, charged their enemies three times; and seeing them open a little, attacked both their right and left wing at once. This obliged them to give way; but they retired in good order. Hereupon Hota was for pursuing them; saying, Toley had with him no more than 30,000 men; and that his soldiers seemed not to have eaten any-thing for three days: but Ilapûa was of opinion that there was no occasion for being so hasty; since, as he said, the passage of the Han was cut off, and the Whang-ho not frozen.

Surprises the Kin.

THE Mungls having gotten out of sight, the scouts brought the Kin generals word, that they had hidden themselves behind a wood; where they made not the least noise, but ate their victuals in the day, and were on horseback all night. Hota and Ilapûa were departed for Teng-chew, when they received this news: but, presently after, they saw the Mungls issue from the forest, and range themselves in order of battle. The Kin generals, much surprised at this, were going also to draw out their forces in a line. This was only a feint of Toley: who, during that time, sent a detachment of horse to seize the heavy baggage of the enemy: which accident obliged Hota and Ilapûa to retire to Teng-chew, where they arrived not till night. They concealed their loss, and sent the emperor word they had gained the battle. This good news filled the court at Kay-fong Fû with joy; and the people, who had retired into that city for its defence, left it again, to return to the country: but a few days after, the van-guard of the Mungls, who had been sent by the emperor Oktay, appeared in the field, and carried off a great number of those who had quitted the capital.

The capital besieged.

IN January 1232, the Khân passed the Whang-ho at Pe-pû, near Ho-tsin-byen, in Shan-si; and the borders of Shen-si being not well guarded, he entered Ho-nan, and came to Ching-chew, eleven or twelve leagues west-south-west of Kay-fong Fû (T), where he encamped. From thence he sent his general Suputay (or Suida), to invest that capital, which was then 120 li (U) in compass; and having only 40,000 soldiers to defend it, they brought in 40,000 more veteran troops, with 100 old officers, from the neighbouring cities, besides 20,000 peasants. At the same time the emperor caused a discourse to be published in the city, which made the inhabitants shed tears, and encouraged them to defend the city to the last. Oktay heard of Toley's entrance into Ho-nan, with extreme joy, and ordered him to send succours to *Suputay*ⁱ.

Toley defeats

As soon as Hota and Ilapûa (X) heard that the court was besieged, they departed immediately, with 150,000 horse and foot, to relieve that great city. As Toley detached no more than 30,000 cavalry to stop their march, Hota ordered them to be attacked; while the Mungls fought retreating, and disappeared: but in the evening, when the Kin were preparing to encamp, they saw the enemy coming upon them; and at the same time Toley caused the roads to be embarrassed with a great number of trees. The Kin arrived within eight miles of Kun-chew (at present called Yu-chew); and not being able to enter, on account of the heavy snow which had fallen, were forced to stop, in order to eat, and repose themselves, after the great fatigues which they had suffered for three days before. At the same instant a courier arriving, commanding Hota to march forthwith to the assistance of the court, that general caused the march to be sounded. One part of his army opened its way through the trees; the other, composed of the gross of the troops, struck off to the mountain San-fong, near Yu-chew.

a TOLEY, who had assembled all his detachments, on the seventh of February caused this latter th. Kin gene- body to be attacked on all sides. The Kin, enfeebled with hunger, which they had suffered erals, for some days past, at first defended themselves; but the Mungls repeating their attacks, they were put to a general rout. Several Kin officers alighted, and, charging their enemies sword in hand, were slain. Hota dismounted likewise, with design to fight: but not seeing his companion Ilapûa, he got again on horseback; and, followed by 100 others, took the road to Kun-chew, which Toley had ordered to be left open. Hereupon that prince, having received a reinforcement from Oktay, during the action, pursued the run-aways; and, being joined soon after by the Khân himself, they both went to besiege Kun-chew, which was quickly taken, Hota having been slain in the first attack^k.

b His colleague Ilapûa was taken in the battle of San-fong; and being a good officer, as well Some taken; as universally beloved, Toley made him great offers to enter into his service: but he modestly and declined them; saying, I am one of the principal Kin generals, and desire to die upon his master's territories. Which request was, with reluctance, granted him, and he was slain. Ho-shang, a put to death, prince of the imperial family of the Kin, and a great commander, whose courage, magnanimity, and many noble actions had rendered him famous, to avoid perishing with the multitude, hid himself, after the rout of San-fong: but having been discovered by some Mungl horse, he desired them to carry him to Toley, to whom he pretended he had something to say. They treated him very civilly: and, being brought to the prince, was asked his name and quality. I am, answered he, of the imperial family, and named Ho-shang. I am general of the troops called the faithful, and have beaten yours (Y) three times. I was not willing to die with an obscure croud. I would have my fidelity appear in the light; and posterity will do me justice.

TOLEY, finding it in vain, by courtesy and great promises, to gain over this commander, gave him up to the soldiers; who cut off his legs, because he would not kneel; and opened his mouth from ear to ear, to hinder him from haranguing. He died satisfied, that he had laid down his life for his sovereign. Several Mungls, charmed with his loyalty, performed in his favour the ceremony of pouring mare's milk on the ground (Z); and wished they might have such a man among the Mungls: supposing that he would rise again.

In February, the Kin troops, which guarded Tong-quan, and the neighbouring posts, received The Kin arming orders to come to the relief of Kay-fong Fû, and bring provisions which were embarked on the Whang-bo; but presently after fell into the hands of the enemy. The troops which marched out of Tong quan, and the neighbouring posts, amounted to 110,000 foot, and 15,000 horse: an infinite number of people followed this army, to try to save their lives. Nothing could prove more unlucky than this effort which was made by the Kin. Several inferior officers yielded to the Mungls, with the troops which they commanded. To-shan, and Na-bo-jun, who led the army, not being able to keep the plain, took to the mountains, where they suffered all sorts of miseries. In the day the sun melting the snows, the mire rendered the roads impassable: at night the frost fell; so that one could not make a step without slipping, and perhaps breaking a limb^l.

c THE more vigorous among them continued their march, leaving behind the weaker people; miserably per- such as children, women, old men, and others reduced to the last extremity, with whom the ishes. lesser roads were filled. The Mungls, being informed of this disorder, sent troops, who put to the sword all such as could not keep up with the rest, and then pursued the army; which faced about at the mountain Tye-ling, in the district of Ho-nan Fû, in order to receive the enemy: but these troops, who were in a manner half-dead, not being able to hold their arms, dispersed themselves. Their generals To-shan and Na-bo-jun, followed by some horse, endeavoured to escape; but were all intercepted and slain. The Mungls took advantage of these distractions, to reduce Ton-quan, and other posts: but the valour of the governor of Quey-te Fû obliged them to raise the siege of that city.

f IN March the Mungls planted their Pau (A) against the city of Lo-yang (or Ho-nan Fû), Lo-yang be- where there were only 3 or 4000 soldiers, who had escaped from the rout of San-fong. The sieged. general who commanded them, not being able to make any sallies, for a distemper which afflicted him, threw himself headlong from the wall into the ditch, and died. The governor of the place was gone to the relief of the capital, and had left in his room an officer named Kyang-shin, who rendered his name immortal by the defence which he made. He procured from the merchants a great quantity of silks to make banners, which he erected on the walls: he likewise placed on them his worst soldiers, and put himself at the head of 400 brave men, whom he ordered to go naked. These he led to all attacks; and the word which he used on such occasions was, cow- Kangshin's ards retire. He invented engines to cast large stones, which required but a few hands to play bravery.

them; and aimed so true, as to hit at 100 paces distance. When their arrows failed, he cut those, shot by the enemy, into four pieces, and, pointing them with brass half-pence, put them into a wooden tube; from whence he discharged them against the Mungls, with as much force as bullets are shot by a musket. These brave nudes, followed by other soldiers, appeared at all the attacks, and made as great an outcry as 10,000 men could do. In this manner Kyang-shin fatigued the Mungls so grievously for three months, that they were obliged to raise the siege, though no fewer than 30,000 strong.

Peace proposed to the Kin. OKTAY KHAN having resolved to return into Tartary, he summoned the Kin emperor to become tributary, and deliver up to him twenty-seven families, which he named; among the rest, the wife, children, and slaves, of the late general Ilapîba. The emperor Shew-su, glad of the occasion, named Mandarins to negotiate the peace. But Suputay, seeming not to know anything of the treaty, pushed on the siege with double vigour^m, and presently filled part of the ditch: while the governor, for fear of obstructing the conference, forbade his soldiers to shoot at the Mungls. This bred great confusion in the city; and the emperor issued hastily out of his palace, with seven horsemen. It rained heavily; and the prince was already bespattered over with dirt, by those who passed along, when the prime minister, with a troop of Mandarins, arrived. They would have covered their monarch, to shelter him from the rain; but he said he would be exposed to it as much as his soldiers. The people, perceiving the king was there, fell on their knees, and wept, as if all had been lost. Presently after, fifty horsemen came to inform him, that the ditches were half-filled up, and none were allowed to defend them. The king answered, that he lived solely for the good of his people, and would therefore become subject and tributary to the Mungls. He added, that he would send the prince his son for a hostage. If, after that, says he, Ta-che (B) do not retire, it will be time to defend ourselves. The hostage was accordingly sent the same dayⁿ.

Suputay disappointed. MEAN time Suputay redoubled his attacks, and the Kin began to defend themselves vigorously. They shot bullets, made of all sorts of stones: and although the Mungls had none in that form, yet they had mill-stones, broken in several pieces, which they played off day and night, by means of their Pau. With these they beat down the towers and battlements: they even broke the thickest pieces of timber in the neighbouring houses; which therefore the inhabitants laid over with horse-dung and straw, covering the whole with felt, and other soft materials, to deaden the force of the stones. As the Mungls then made use of fire-pau (C), they set the houses in a flame, which spread so swiftly, that it was difficult to extinguish it. The walls of this city were built by the emperor Sbi-tsung, of the Chew dynasty (D); who had them covered with a kind of earth, brought from the country of Hû-lau (E), which formed a mass as hard as iron, and proof against bullets. The Mungls raised walls around those which they besieged, 150 li in circumference, furnished with large ditches, towers, and battlements. They likewise placed guards at every thirty paces distance.

Continues the siege; AT the beginning of the siege, the defendants made, before the gates of the city, other gates, which went in zig-zag, and gave admittance to no more than three men a-breast. But experience shewing, that this was a hindrance to their sallies, and gave the Mungls notice of them; the Kin made a fally by a canal, which passed under the ditch, with design to blow up Suputay's batteries: but this attempt did not succeed; nor was that general to be surprised. They had in the city fire-pau, which shot pieces of iron in the form of bombs (F). This bomb was filled with powder, which, being fired, made a noise like thunder, and was heard 100 li distance. The ground where it fell appeared burnt, or scorched, for about 2000 feet round; and if the fire happened to reach the iron cuirasses, it pierced them through. When the Mungls lodged themselves at the foot of the walls, in order to sap them, they kept covered in chambers made under ground, so that those upon the walls could not hurt them. The besieged therefore, to dislodge them, let down these sort of bombs by iron chains; which, as soon as they came into the ditches or subterranean chambers, took fire by a match, and destroyed the enemies. These

(B) One might also use the word Tatan, which is a name given the Mungls.

(C) There are two sorts of Pau, or engines; She-pau, or stone-pau, and Ho-pau, or fire-pau. Gaubil dares not translate either by the name of cannon, because he cannot say they were like ours: nor is he sure that the bullets were shot off in the same manner: although he is satisfied the Chineses have had the use of powder upwards of 1600 years.—They sometimes made use of wooden tubes, or guns, to shoot stones, as was done at first in Europe.

(D) He began his reign in the year of Christ 954, and reigned six years.

(E) Gaubil knew not where this country is.

(F) Although we venture to call these pieces of iron, bombs, Gaubil would not. He observes, that although the Chineses had the use of powder so long, yet it does not appear, that they made very frequent use of it in sieges. Possibly, says he, they, for some time, lost the art of using artillery, or bullets: and the kind of bombs here spoken of were the invention of private persons, which did not pass into common use.

a iron bombs and halberds, charged with powder, which they darted, were what the Mungls dreaded most.

IN sixteen days and nights, during which the attacks continued without intermission, above is forced to re- a million of people were slain on both sides. Upon this Sûpûtay, finding that he could not fire. force the place, to come off with honour, sent the governor word, that he should forbear any further hostilities, since he was now satisfied a negotiation was on foot. The besiegers, glad of this notice, sent that general abundance of refreshments and presents; after which he withdrew, to encamp between the river Lo and the Whang-bo. But Kay-fong Fû was no sooner rid of this calamity, but as great an evil as war, the plague, succeeded; which, in fifty days, destroyed an incredible number of people. When the contagion was ceased, the emperor

b Shew fû bestowed large rewards on those who had defended the city, and performed several acts of humiliation°. He made several good regulations in his court; and the peace, so happily restored, might have continued, if two unlucky accidents had not renewed the war.

QUE GAN-YONG, a Mungl lord, having, in July, reduced Sû-chew, together with some Receives orders other cities in Kyang-nan, and assumed the government of them; Achûlû, one of the Mungl generals, displeased at his proceedings, sent troops to take possession of those places. Gan-yong not only opposed this design, but even slew the officers sent by Achûlû; after which he declared for the Kin, and joined several of their officers, in Shan-tong, against the Mungls.

c The Kin emperor, deceived by false hopes, took Gan-yong into his service, and gave him the title of prince. After this, Oktay Khân having sent an officer with a train of thirty persons, without doubt, says our author, to treat of peace, the Kin commanders slew them all: nor did Shew-fû punish them for it (G). Hereupon Sûpûtay gave the Khân an account of what had passed; and, not doubting but he should receive orders to renew the war, made preparations for that purpose. Oktay accordingly sent his commands to him and the other generals, to continue hostilities: and being informed, about the same time, that the Koreans had slain his officers, he sent an army thither to chastise them^p.

THE Kin emperor had ordered the generals, who commanded his troops in different bodies, The capital to join, and come to the assistance of his capital: but the several parties, being met by the Mungls, before their junction, were all defeated, so that Shew fû was obliged to employ the peasants and common people as soldiers. The inhabitants were taxed likewise to give three

d parts in ten of the rice which they were possessed of, and enjoined to declare how much they had. This order was executed with rigour: and a poor widow, who had lost her husband in the war, was condemned to be bastonaded, for having mixed mugwort-seed with six measures of rice: which thing she had declared. The people, terrified with this example, threw great in great quantities of grain, which they had not discovered, into the bog-houses and common-sewers, for distress. fear of being punished. Mean time, the scarcity becoming very great in the city, the emperor ordered broth to be made, and given to those who were in most distress. One, who had arrived to the degree of doctor, happening to say, that the famine might have been avoided, if they had not exacted the rice tax with so much rigour, he was informed against, and had much ado to get off.

e In September, this year (H), died prince Toley. He was the fourth son of Jenghîz Khân, Toley's death and character and was admired, when a youth, in the wars against the Kin. In the western expedition he commanded great bodies of troops; and did a thousand actions worthy of the greatest heroes. At his return, he signalised him in the war which ruined the kingdom of Hya. After his father's death, he governed the empire with much glory for two years: and, although he might have kept a large part of it for himself, he strictly adhered to the will of Jenghîz Khân. His extraordinary march from Tong-syang Fû, in Shen-si, by way of Han-chong Fû, into Honan, and the manner in which he defeated the great armies of the Kin with a few troops, gained him much reputation among the Chineses, Tatars, and captains of the west, who were in his army. His great merit was enhanced by his uncommon modesty, his filial respect for his father, and f the empress his mother; and by an inviolable attachment to the interest and glory of his brother Oktay.

THESE two princes left Ho-nan in April, to visit Ching-ting-fû and Yen-king (I). Then brotherly af- passing into Tartary, through the great wall by the gate of Kû-pe-kew, in May, the Khân fell section.

(G) It was not unlucky accidents, but the fault of the Kin emperor, which renewed the war. This shews all his pretended humility and love to his people was hypocrisy. The moment the evil which threatened him was removed, he forgot what was past, and provoked his formidable enemy by new acts of injustice.

(H) It is so put in the history of the Mungls, inserted in the Nyen-i she; and in the elogy of Toley, inserted in the Nyen-i-tse: but the Tong-kyen Kangmû places his death in October. Gaubil. D'Herbelot, from the Persian historians, says, p. 760, that Toley died in Jenghîz Khân's life-time. La Croix says, his death happened in 1229, three years after his father.

(I) This city was the seat of the Kin emperors, till taken by Jenghîz Khân. It lay to the south-west of Pe-king; at present about a league distant.

dangerously ill. Toley on this occasion fell on his knees; and, writing his name in a sealed billet, prayed heaven to save his brother's life, and offered to die in his stead. Oktay being recovered, Toley followed him to the sources of the river Tula and the Onon (or Sagbalian); where that great prince died, at the age of forty, generally lamented by his family, the chiefs of tribes, and officers of the army.

Wife and children.

TOLEY married Solu bu-tyey-ni (K), daughter of Akiapû, chief of the tribe, and brother of Toley, prince of the Ka-ra-its. She was a princess of great merit, and had had by him eleven sons. 1. Menko. 2. Churko. 3. Hûtûû. 4. Hû-pi-lay (or Kublay). 5. Not named. 6. Hu-lye-bû (or Hulakû). 7. Alpuko (or Aribuga). 8. Pocho. 9. Moko. 10. Swituko. 11. Sue-pye-tay. The first and fourth were emperors. The sixth made himself famous in the wars of Persia and Syria; and the seventh (L) for the disturbances which he raised in Tartary.

Peace with the Song.

IN December the Mungls made a treaty with the Song emperor (then reigning in southern China); who engaged to join them with his troops, on condition of having the province of Ho-nan delivered up to him, as soon as the Kin dynasty was destroyed: in which he sought rather to be revenged on the Kin, for the mischiefs they had done to his ancestors, than his own real interest. However, this alliance was a deadly blow to the emperor Shew; who, in

A. D. 1233. Distress of the Kin.

January 1233, found himself in a very great plunge. Several bodies of troops, in their way to the court from different parts, were defeated by the Mungls; and the provisions carried away, which were going to supply Pyen-king: so that this capital was in great distress. On the other hand, Sûpûtay appearing resolved to besiege it, the Kin emperor held a council, wherein a Mandarin proposed marching to fight the Mungl general; and shewed, that, as things were circumstanced, one battle would needs determine the fate of the empire. But this advice was rejected, as well as several others, proposing to remove to this or that city; of which the chief was Quey-te-fû, in Pe-che-li; a place very strong by situation, but very ill provided^a.

Emperor goes out.

WHEN the council broke up, the emperor Shew appointed officers to command at the four sides of the city walls, and made a discourse, to encourage them in the defence of their country; declaring, that he would put himself at the head of the army: but this resolution was disapproved of by most of the officers, who were unwilling to go out of a city, which was very ill provided, threatened with a siege, and where they left their families. However, Shew, without regard to their representations, marched out of the place, passed the Whang-ho, and encamped near the city of Chang-ywen, or rather Chang-wan: but as soon as he had crossed that river, a violent wind arose, and hindered part of his troops from passing; which were afterwards beaten. For all this, he sent the best part of those which were with him to besiege Wey-chew (now Wey-whew, to the south-west of Kay-song-fû). The general She-tyen-che, being informed of this, assembled the troops in Pe-che-li, Shan-tong, and other parts; and sent the governor word, that he would soon relieve him. Accordingly, with his usual bravery, he marched to attack Pesa, general of the Kin. The fight was bloody: but, at length, Pesa was compelled to fly, and his army cut in pieces.

His army destroyed.

The capital besieged.

THIS sad piece of news was carried to the emperor, at such time as he knew Sûpûtay was on the road to besiege his capital. Hereupon he, in haste, repassed the Whang-ho, followed by a few of his officers, and retired to Quey-te-fû. From thence he sent for the empresses and queens to come to him. They accordingly set out; but the arrival of Sûpûtay obliged them to re-enter the city. As for his troops, they dispersed as soon as he had left them. The return of the Mungls, and retreat of their emperor, joined to the defeat of the whole army, filled all the people with terror. The western wall was guarded by a general named Tsû-li; who, being of a wicked disposition, went to the ministers, and demanded to know, what course they intended to take, at a time when the emperor had abandoned his capital, and wanted to withdraw his family also. One of the ministers answered, "that they ought to fight and die generously for their prince." "That would be well", replied Tsû-li, "in case so doing would remedy the evil": and then retired.

Tsû-li's villainy.

Soon after, Tsû-li, followed by some officers of his party, cut off the heads of the ministers and ten great lords; giving out, that he did it purely to save the lives of the people. After this he went to the palace, and obliged the empress-mother to declare a prince, whom he named, to be regent. He took to himself the post of prime minister, and general of the army; giving the other employments to his two brothers, and the officers who assisted him. In 1233,

(L) According to the Teng-ken Kang-nû, Toley had but six sons; 1. engko. 2. Chûcû-kô. 3. Hûtûû. 4. Hû-pi-lay. 5. Hu-lye. 6. Olipûko. Such disagreement there is even among the Chinese historians. Lu Croix, p. 399, from the Persian authors, says, Toley left eight sons; and that only four of them are mentioned.

- a Tsu-li resolved to surrender the city to the Mungls; and did it in a very extraordinary manner. Having assumed the equipage belonging to a king, and dressed his people in magnificent habits, he, at the head of a great number of officers, went out to meet Sûputây, who was preparing to form the siege; and, paying him the reverence of a son to his father, promised him fealty. The Mungl general, at the head of his troops, with much honour, received this traitor: who, on his return to the city, demolished the battlements of the walls, and blew up the towers, with all other defences. He set a guard upon the princes of the blood; and took to himself the wives and daughters of the grandees who had followed the emperor to Quey-te-fû. Then, seizing the treasures of the city and palace, his vanity prompted him to raise a stone monument, inscribed with his own fine qualities, and the manner in which he had saved the lives of the people: but he could not compass his design^r.

WHILE Tsu-li was turning all things upside-down at Pyen-king (or Kay-fong-fû), Pu-cha-queen was acting much the same at Quey-te-fu. This general, after the death of Wan-yen (M),^{tor} or Pesa (whom Shew was obliged to sacrifice to the demands of the soldiery), was touched to the quick, to see that the emperor consulted Ma-yong, his enemy, rather than him. Shew endeavoured to reconcile them, but to no purpose; and, at the same time, shocked at the insolence of Pu-cha-queen, who had rose from nothing, ordered him to be closely watched. The officers, who were intrusted with this affair, having betrayed the secret to Pu-cha-queen, this latter, in despair, ordered Ma-yong, with 300 officers and 3000 soldiers of the palace, to be slain. He even presumed to send persons to seize a Mandarin belonging to the emperor, with an intent to put him to death. The prince, provoked at this new insolence, said, he would defend that officer; and that he was almost the only one who was left about him. Presently after, Pu-cha-queen enters with his sword in hand, and tells the emperor, that those whom he had put to death were rebels. Shew, complying with necessity, pretended to believe what he said; and was forced to publish the supposed crimes of those who had been slain. The emperor, for want of courage to put this rebel to death, submitted to his demands, and suffered the authority to remain in his hands.

- MEAN time Tsu-li, going on with his game at Pyen-king, exercised a thousand cruelties, to get money from private persons: and the famine was so extreme, that, in eight days, above a million of people died. In April he seized all the princes and princesses of the blood, a great number of officers, physicians, and workers in silk and other manufactures. He likewise brought out the royal ornaments, jewels, precious stones, and other treasures: then, putting the empress-mother, the empress, queens, and concubines of the palace, in thirty-seven chariots, went and delivered them all to Sûputây: who put to death all those who were of the race imperial; and sent to Holin (or Karakorum) the imperatrices, the queens, and their attendants. This general, at the same time, intreated Oktay to put to death all the inhabitants of Pyen-king, in revenge for the numbers of men he had lost before that city in 1232: but Yelu Chitsay interposed; alleging, that they had not at this time resisted so long as to deserve so cruel a punishment. Hereupon the emperor ordered Sûputây to put to death the princes of the blood, and spare the rest (N): by which means the lives of fourteen hundred thousand families were saved; reckoning inhabitants, and those who took shelter there.

Tsu-li, being informed that Sûputây was preparing to take possession of the capital, got every thing ready for his introduction: and, receiving him at the entrance of the city, conducted him to the palace. After this, returning to his own house, he was much surprised to find it full of Mungl soldiers; who plundered it, and carried away all his treasures. He complained of this injury, and even shed tears; but nobody regarded him: nor was Sûputây himself displeased to see a traitor to his country so justly punished. Let us now return to see what is doing at Quey-te-fû.

- IN May, the Kin emperor proposed to Pu-cha-queen, to surprise the camp of the Mungls, commanded by Te-mûtay; under pretence, that the Mungls had taken prisoner the empress-mother, in order to treat with them. Pu-cha-queen, who wanted neither address nor valour, one night, while a negotiation was on foot, went with 400 choice soldiers; and, slaying the outguards, pierced to the middle of the camp, and either slew, or pushed into the river, above 3,500 men: then, setting the camp on fire, returned, without losing one man. The general Te-mûtay himself, surprised in such a manner, had much ado to escape^s.

PU-CHA-QUEEN, puffed up with this success, had the insolence to shut up the emperor, with some of his domestics, in a great hall. Shew, on this occasion, shed tears; and said to those about him, "that the dynasties did not continue for ever; and that kings were not exempt from the tribute due to death." He added, "that it grieved him to find he did not know the persons he ought to make use of, as well as to see himself imprisoned by a slave, whom

(N) He likewise ordered, that, for the future, those general massacres should not be practised.

“ he had loaded with favours.” Hereupon three trusty officers prevailed on the emperor to consent to get rid of that traitor, at any rate. They advised his majesty to send for him, under pretence of consulting whether it was proper to remove the court to Tsay-chew (now Ju-ning-fû), in Ho-nan: and, as he entered the chamber, one of them gave him a stroke with his sword on the side, which was seconded with another by the emperor. For all this, Pû-cha-quen ran back, in order to escape; but the officer who had given him the first wound pursued and killed him. This was in June. The troops, on this news, took up arms: but the emperor went out in person to appease them, and gave an account of the whole affair.

At this juncture the general Tachar took from the Kin the city of Lo-yang (or Ho-nan-fû), where commanded the brave Kyang-shin: who, finding, after incredible efforts, that there was no keeping the place, took a troop of choice soldiers, and attempted to break through the middle of the Mungl army: but was taken, with all his men. Tachar, who had conceived the highest idea of this brave commander, promised him the first military post, if he would turn his face to the north, and make only one genuflexion, to salute Oktay. But it was all in vain: and when the soldiers by force turned his face towards Tartary, he presently turned to the south, to salute the Kin emperor his master. Tachar, seeing him inflexible, caused him to be slain. The Chinese history heaps elogies on Kyang-shin, and another officer, called Tse-lye, who commanded in conjunction with him. The Mungls took the son of the latter at Pyen-king, and brought him before Lo-yang, to oblige his father to surrender: but Tse-lye answered the summons only with a shower of arrows. As soon as he heard of Tsû-li's treason, it gave him so great concern, that he immediately lost his speech, and soon after died.

AFTER the death of Pu-cha-quen, the emperor Shew left troops and a governor at Quey-te-fû, and departed for Jûning-fû, with 4000 attendants. When he arrived at Po-chew (O) the people wept, and fell on their knees: to whom the prince, with a mild air, said, “ that they ought not to set any value upon him; but call to mind the obligations which they owed his ancestors.” The multitude, still shedding tears, cried aloud, Van-fwi; that is, ten thousand years: which is one of the names given by the Chinese to their emperors, expressing a desire they have that he should reign a long time. Having staid one day at Po-chew, he entered a temple, which he found abandoned, five or six leagues to the south of that city; and was heard to say, with a sigh, all my people are destroyed. When the inhabitants of Ju-ning-fû beheld their prince so sorrowful, his face emaciated, and his person ill attended, it set them weeping; and the principal among them coming to fall on their knees before him, he, with much affability, made them rise, nor could forbear shedding tears.

THE emperor Shew appointed prince Whan-yen Hû-sye-hû for his captain-general and prime minister. He was a person of great merit and approved fidelity. He was day and night on horseback: he sold all he had to buy arms, provisions, and horses; and made choice of 10,000 soldiers, whom he exercised continually. The emperor's presence, and distance of the Mungls, drew much people to Tsay-chew: while the Kin monarch, as if quite out of danger, began to think of building a palace, and marrying a wife. But Hû-sye-hû drew that prince out of the false security in which he began to live. He let him know, that there was no great quantity either of provisions, stores, or silver, in the city; and persuaded him to think of nothing else, but to fortify the place, and defend it.

TWENTY thousand Chinese, under Men-kong, detached from the Song army, commanded by She-song-chî, having already joined Tachar, the two generals, in August, took several cities in Ho-nan; after which, the next month, they came to invest Ju-ning-fû. Tachar, perceiving, by the two first attacks made on the city gates, that he was likely to meet with a long resistance, ordered trenches to be dug, and a wall raised; in which he was assisted by Meng-kong. The garrison, affrighted at the works which were going forward to invest the place, would have surrendered; but Hû-sye-hû, and the emperor himself, by their speeches, so revived their courage, that they all took a resolution to perish in defence of their prince.

IN December, there not being men sufficient to defend the city, and make sallies, Hû-sye-hû picked out the strongest women; and, dressing them in men's clothes, made them carry wood, stones, and other necessaries, to the walls. After this he made an unsuccessful sally; and Meng-kong, having cut off the retreat of his troops, learned from the prisoners, that the city was in want of provisions. The Chinese general gave notice of this to Tachar; and advised him to guard against the despair of the besieged; who, when reduced to extremities, might make a general sally, and so escape by some opening. In December, Tachar sent general Chang-jau, with 5000 men, to attack an angle, where he received several dangerous wounds; and had been slain,

- a with all his soldiers, if Meng-kong had not come to his assistance, and taken him out of the thickest of the enemies troops.
- His principal fortification about Ju-ning-fu was a tower, called Chay-tan, on a redoubt, sixty hundred feet distant from the river. The latter was taken by assault : but the troops dared not approach the tower, upon a report, that the foot of it was defended by a dragon, and the upper part filled with flying darts. Meng-kong one day gave his soldiers wine, and told them, that the darts from the tower did harm to none but those who were at a distance ; but that they who went near to it, had nothing to fear. He likewise assisted Tachar in making drains, to carry off the water into the river Ju. After this, both the generals with their troops passed over dry, and attacked the south walls. In the night 500 choice soldiers sallied, with design to burn the engines, and camp of the besiegers : but these latter, getting timely notice of it, cut them all in pieces. After the general had forced the walls of the south, they gave a general assault to those of the west, and forced them likewise : but were much surprised to see an inner-wall, with chevaux-de-frise, and a ditch ; where the illustrious Hu-fye-hu, with the choicest of the troops, fought for three days and nights, without being forced.
- THE emperor Shew, beholding things in this desperate state, spoke to those who were about him in the following manner. “ I was the heir appointed for ten years, and have since then The emperor's bravery. reigned ten years more. I do not perceive, that I am guilty of any great faults (P). I do not fear death. I see that most of the dynasties terminated in brutish princes, who were either drunkards, debauched, or covetous. You know I am not such an one, and yet in me the dynasty of the Kin ends. This is what I behold with grief. The princes, under whom the dynasties perished, have commonly been abused, or insulted, imprisoned, or treated after an unworthy manner ; but I tell you to-day that the like shall not happen to me.” After he had said these words, he distributed all his precious moveables, put on an ordinary habit, and invited his best troops to follow him. He went out of the east gate, and made extraordinary efforts, either to die with his arms in hand, or to escape. The besieged, who watched, expecting some such desperate attempt, made a resolute stand, and drove the emperor back into the city. On his return, he caused most of the remaining horses to be killed, to support the troops, who had often eaten the prisoners, and those who returned wounded from the sallies *.
- THE first of January 1234, Tachar and Meng-kong made great rejoicings in their camp, to celebrate the first day of the Chinese year ; while the besieged had nothing before their eyes but The besieged distressed ; the most dismal objects. The soldiers, made prisoners at the breach by the Mungls, informed them, that there had been a famine for three months in the city ; where, after the inhabitants had boiled the leather of their saddles, boots, and drums, to make food, they had slain the old and feeble men, with many prisoners, and wounded soldiers, to eat their flesh : that the troops, who remained in a condition to serve, gathered the bones of dead men and animals, to make broth of them and dried herbs. They added, that most of the private men were inclined to surrender. Meng-kong, having learned these particulars, ordered his soldiers to put a bullet in their mouths, to keep them silent ; and, taking advantage of a thick fog, attacked the western side with his whole army. He made five breaches, and employed rope ladders : but, after an attack, which continued from morning till evening, and in which he lost abundance of men, was obliged to retire. On the other hand, the besieged having lost the greater part of their officers and soldiers, there remained for defence of the city no more than a few officers, at the head of the Mandarins of letters (Q) ; and some soldiers, half-dead with hunger, sustained by the example of Hu-fye-hu. repulse the Mungls.
- THE night following, the emperor Shew-su assembled the lords of his court, and told them, that he would transfer his fallen throne to Cheng-lin (R) (or, as others write, Shing-lyen), a prince of the blood ; who, at the emperor's pressing instances, at length accepted of it. Shew, after bestowing praises on him, said, If you escape, you will continue our race, and restore the renversed crown. Next morning, while the Mandarins performed the ceremony of acknowledging Cheng-lin, the Song and Mungl troops mounted the south walls, and forced 200 men, who defended them, to surrender. The Mandarins who were about the new emperor, at this news, flew to succour them ; but found the standards of the enemy planted on the ramparts. Mean time, the south gate being abandoned, Meng-kong and Tachar entered with their troops. Prince Hu-fye-hu, with 1000 soldiers, stopped them in one of the streets, and fought with an intrepidity which made The city taken.

(P) Princes imagine often, that they cannot commit faults. Could he have committed greater faults than those which brought on the renewal of the war, to the destruction of himself and his people ?

the enemy wonder at him. The emperor Shew-su, seeing all irreparably lost, got hastily into a house; where he lodged the seal of the empire; then, causing sheafs of straw to be set round the mansion, entered into it, and ordered the people to set fire to it as soon as he was dead. After this he slew himself (S): and his orders were executed.

The emperor's death.

HU-SYË-HU, who still fought like a lion in the streets, when he heard of his master's death, went and drowned himself in the river Jû; the officers with him, and 500 soldiers, followed his example. Mean time, while the new emperor Chang-lin, attended by some Mandarins, performed the Chinese ceremonies for the death of his predecessor, and gave orders for burying his ashes on the bank of the river, the confederate generals, seizing the palace, divided the spoil^y; and, the same day, Chang-lin was killed in a tumult: which put an end to the dynasty of the Kin, whose beginnings were so glorious and successful^z.

The Song proceedings

offend the Mungls.

AFTER the taking of Ju-ning-fû, the Song and Mungls agreed to settle the limits of the two empires. Ho-nan was to be delivered up to the former, as soon as the war should be finished: but, without either waiting for the expiration of the term, or giving Oktay Khân notice, they introduced their troops into Kay-fong-fû, Lo-yang, or Ho-nan-fû, and other considerable cities, in June and July; without the precaution however of furnishing them with provisions. The Mungls complained of these hasty proceedings; and Sûpûtay, who had encamped to the north of the Whang ho, repassed that river, and resolved to be revenged on the aggressors. A great part of the garrison of Lo-yang, who were out in search of provisions, were cut in pieces by a detachment of the Mungls; and the governor obliged to surrender for want of them. As Sûpûtay seemed resolved to march towards Kay-fong-fû, the Song general, being destitute of all manner of necessaries, abandoned the place: and on these occasions the Song shewed but little conduct. The Song emperor (T), either to satisfy the Mungls, or because his officers had not done their duty, ordered them to be punished, by lowering their degrees in the rank of Mandarins.

IN December, Oktay Khân recalled Sûpûtay into Tatary, to consult him about some new military expeditions. At the same time he sent an officer to Hang-chew, in Che-kyang, the court of the Song, to complain of certain proceedings: on the other hand, the Chinese sent a lord, to continue the peace. The Khân's answer is not mentioned; but the event shewed, that he was not well content.

Several expeditions.

A. D. 1235.

IN spring 1235, and the 7th year of his reign, Oktay ordered the encamping place of Ho-lin (or Karakorum) to be inclosed with walls; and to build the palace (U) called Wan-gan, five li (or furlongs) in circumference. In the first months of the year he sent an army into Korea; and, having levied more than fifteen hundred thousand good troops, resolved to render his name immortal by great conquests. He sent Sûpûtay with 300,000 men, to ravage the countries to the west, north and north-east of the Caspian sea. In this army went Patû (or Batû), eldest son of the late prince Chuchi (or Fuji), Mengko, eldest son of Toley, Quey-yew, eldest son of the emperor himself, with several other princes (X), and lords of tribes: among others were Lyang-bû-tay, son of Sûpûtay, the general, and Mangusar, of the Chalar (or Jalayr) tribe, and family of Che-lau-wên (Y).

The Song attacked.

KOTOVAN, the emperor's second son, with the general Chabay (Z), was ordered to attack the Song in Se-chwen. Prince Kuchû, his third son, with the generals Temutay and Chang-jau^a; prince Pitû, son of Lyew-ko, late king of Lyau-tong, besides other Mungl and Kitan princes, with the general Chaban, were commanded to march towards the borders of Kyang-nan. The Song emperor sent his best officers to the frontiers; and, notwithstanding his great power, began

(S) He hanged himself in the same house, which was called Tseu-lan-lu-yen; and the place where it stood is still shewn at Ju-ning-fû, named, in the history of the Mungls, Tsay-chew, a city of Ho-nan. Abûlghazi Khân says, that it was not known for certain (among the western writers) what became of Altân Khân (by which general name he calls the emperors of Kitay): but that it was believed, he threw himself into a great fire, which he had caused to be made for that purpose.

(T) Named Li-tsung, One of his first queens, being in great favour, obtained high employments for her brother Kya-tse tau, who soon became prime minister; and, by his bad conduct, as well as incapacity for affairs, ruined the empire of the Song, who reigned in South China.

(U) Abûlghazi Khân says, in this year he ordered a magnificent palace to be built in the country of Karakum (or Karakorum), and sent for the most able painters in Kitay, to adorn it: that he enjoined all the princes and great officers of the empire to build handsome houses about it: that he made a fine fountain there, ornamented with a tiger spouting water, in full proportion, all cast in silver: that at some distance from the palace he made a park, two days journey in compass; which he stocked with deer, and other game, for hunting; and inclosed it with pales twelve feet high. Our author adds, that Oktay caused Herât, the capital of Khorasân, in Persia, which had been destroyed by his father's orders, to be rebuilt.

(X) Abûlghazi Khân places among them Pâdur, son of Jagatay; and says, they were sent against the Russians, Jerkas (or Cherkas), Bulgars, the country of Tura, and the Bashkbirs. He makes them return after seven years absence; but in the reign of Oktay.

a to fear the consequences of so many formidable armies coming to attack his dominions : for they consisted of excellent Chinese and Tatar troops, commanded by old captains trained to war, and almost always conquerors. Wang-shi-hyen, an officer of reputation among the Kin, who commanded in Kong-chang-fû, in Shen-si, a strong city, well provided both with troops and stores, knowing that Kotovan was to pass that way, went out to meet, and offered him his troops. The prince hereupon took him under his protection, left him governor of the city, and gave him a considerable military post ^b.

In 1236, the army of prince Kuchû made great ravages in the province of Hû-quang : in January they took the city of Kyang-lin (at present King-chew) ; and in March, Syang-yang, Hû-quang : where they got a great booty in money and warlike provisions ; for the officers of the Song fall-b ing at variance, one of them, through malice, set fire to the magazines of the suburbs ; which gave the Mungls an opportunity of becoming masters of the city. The inhabitants of Te-gan, another city of Hû-quang, were almost all put to the sword in August ; and in October, the Mungls lost their general, prince Kuchû, who was greatly beloved by the emperor his father. Telu-chû-tsay had already persuaded Oktay to repair the hall of Konfufius, or, to speak more properly, the palace, where this ancient sage is honoured. That prince had likewise caused a great sphere to be made, and a palace built, to teach the Chinese sciences. At his minister's request, he also set free many Chinese literati and doctors, who had been made slaves in Hû-quang. In February this year, the Mungls introduced silk or paper-money, which had been used before by Chang-tsung, sixth emperor of the Kin. ^{A. D. 1236. Paper money.}

c PRINCE Kotovan, having passed Kong-chang-fû, prepared to attack the city of Myen, in the Shen-si district of Han-chong-fû, in Shen-si ; into which, after forcing the passages, he entered with an army of 500,000 men, consisting of Chineses, Mungls, Tatars, and strangers from the west. Tsau yew-ven, governor of Myen, one of the best officers belonging to the Song, after being driven from the fort and pass of Syen-jin, near the city of Fong, in the district before-mentioned, with 10,000 choice men, passed the river in the night, and put his troops in ambuscade, in a place called Lew-ki, with orders to beat their drums and light fires within, while they cried without kill, kill. Tsau-wan, Yew-ven's brother, had the boldness to attack general Ta-bay, who began to appear with 10,000 horse and foot, while the troops in ambush lighted fires. Yew-ven divided his forces into three bodies, and, followed by 3000 soldiers, d advanced towards a gorge of the mountains, called Kitovan ; where he posted in the most difficult places 800 stout horse ; who, though surrounded by the enemy, stood their ground, resolved to die.

As the wind and rain obstructed their march, the officers intreated him to stop ; but Yew-ven ^{Terrible battle :} refused, and arrived at Long-wey-few : while his brother Tsau-wan having joined him, a great battle was fought between the Song and the Mungls, with such slaughter, that the blood ran for two leagues together. At break of day, the Mungl forces being joined by general Tabay, the little army of the Song was surrounded, and great havock made on both sides. Tsau-yew-ven, seeing all lost without resource, resolved to sell his life very dear : It is the decree of heaven, said he, I must die. After this he slew his horse, giving abusive language all the while to the e Mungls. Then, with sword in hand, he charged a great body of the enemy ; in which brisk attack he was slain, with his brother, and almost all his soldiers. The Mungls lost a great number of men in this action. The battle was fought in July, near Yang-ping, a fort to the west of the city Pau ching, which last is two or three leagues to the north-west of Han-chong-fû.

AFTER the defeat of general Tsau, prince Kotovan entered Se-chwen, and encamped near Se-chwen Ching-tû-fû, the capital of that province : most of whose cities fell into the hands of the ^{reduced.} Mungls ; who yet could not reduce Ho-chew, Quey-chew, Lû-chew, and Shun-king-fû. In October, a detachment of his troops went and besieged Ven-chew, as it is still named ; a city belonging to the Song, in the district of Kong-chang-fû. Lyew-jû-i, who commanded in the place, finding no hopes of being relieved, after he had fought night and day for some time, f assembled his domestics, and advised them to poison themselves. Among the rest, a child of six years old fell on his knees ; and, having desired he might have leave to do the like, took the cup, and died courageously. Afterwards Lyew-jû-i, and his two children, slew themselves ; and more than 40,000 people, soldiers and inhabitants, chose to follow his example, rather than surrender ^c.

MEAN time Kew-when-pu-wha ravaged great part of the countries which are on the borders ^{Success in} of Kyang-nan, Hu-quang, and Ho-nan ; then marched towards Whang-chew, a considerable Hû-quang : city in Hu-quang. In November, Meng-kong put himself at the head of an army of the Song ; and, advancing towards King-chew, destroyed more than twenty posts where the Mungls had left troops. General Chaban had laid siege to Ching-chew, a city in Kyang-nan, on the Kyang, g at present called I-ching-kyen : but was obliged to raise it, through the activity of the governor

Kyew-yo, who made great destruction of the Mungls by his ambuscades, by his engines for casting stones, and by setting fire to their quarters almost every-where.

Check at Gan-tong, A. D. 1237. In May 1237, Meng-kong appearing in view of the city of Wbang-chew, then besieged by Kew-when-pû-wba; this prince, whose army was fatigued, thought it better to withdraw his forces, than venture a battle. After this, he gave orders for investing Gan-tong, now Shew-chew, in the district of Fong-yang-fû in Kyang-nan: but this siege succeeded with him no better than the former. Tû-kew, the governor, in his frequent sallies, burnt twenty-seven intrenchments, which the Mungls had made over the ditches, after they had filled them up. He likewise rendered ineffectual their bombs: while Lu-ven-te, an excellent officer, and native of the place, during the confusion, in which the attack of their trenches had thrown the enemy, broke through their troops with some brave soldiers, and got into the city; where, in conjunction with Tû-kew, he, by his vigilance and activity, obliged them to raise the siege, after sustaining great loss of men.

and Lu-chew. A. D. 1238. CHAHAN, who had charge of the engines, and other instruments made use of before Gan-tong, resolved, in 1238, to raise the siege of Lu-chew, a strong city in Kyang-nan. To effect this, he gave out, that he had with him 800,000 men; that he would build barks on the lake Tsau, and, after taking Lu-chew, ravage the countries along the Kyang. Chahan caused the city to be surrounded with a rampart of earth, secured by a double ditch. Mean time Tû-kew, who had previously thrown himself into the place, having ordered infinite bundles of herbs to be steeped in oil, and cast into the Mungl intrenchments, at the same time shot stones down upon them from a tower seven stories high. The Mungls, attacked in this unexpected manner, could neither defend themselves from the shot, nor extinguish the fire, which spread on all sides. Tû-kew at the same time made a general sally; so that the Mungls, being surprised, were constrained to retreat, for fear of seeing their whole army perish. The Song pursued them for above three miles; and this was one of the greatest checks which the Mungls had as yet received. Lu-ven-te, the son of Tû-kew, possessed all the defiles, so that the enemy were obliged in September to retire towards the north.

Mungls baffled A. D. 1239. In Hû-quang, general Meng-kong every-where beat the Mungls; and, in March 1239, retook Syang-yang, which he fortified, as well as Fan-ching, situated over against it: representing to the emperor his master the importance of those two posts, and determined always to have a great army in the neighbourhood. The forces of Kotovan, after taking great spoil in Se-chwen, retired to the borders of Shen-si. The Song, taking advantage of this retreat, retook Ching-tû-fû, capital of that province, and assembled there a great body of troops. Ta-hay Mongu, the Mungl general, hereupon re-entered Se-chwen, defeated the Song army in a pitched battle near Ching-tû-fû; seized the metropolis, and set forward to penetrate into Hû-quang, by way of Quey-chew. Meng-kong, on this advice, furnished all the posts on the borders of Se-chwen and Hû-quang, with men and provisions; then caused all the passages of the Kyang to be guarded; and, having ordered a great number of barks to be prepared, in December began his march. This general rendered ineffectual the Mungl enterprises, and gained great honour by the reduction of Quey-chew; which was a place of great importance to the Mungls, situate on the north side of the Kyang, and on the borders of the two before-mentioned provinces.

Customs farmed. SINCE the conquest of Ho-nan, Yelu-chû-tsay had raised the customs of the countries of China, subject to the Mungls, to 110 Van of Lyang, or Taëls in silver. Gautû-lauman, a Whey-bû (Z), offered 220 Van for those customs. The minister opposed a bargain which tended to ruin the people: but his arguments not prevailing, he, in anger, gave a heavy sigh, and said openly; that the misery to which they were going to reduce the Chineses, would be quickly followed by the greatest evils.

Meng-kong's exploits. A. D. 1240. In 1240, Oktay Khân ordered his eldest son Quey-yew to return into Tatary, with the detachment which he commanded in the west: where, it is said, he made great conquests, without mentioning the countries which he subdued. The same year Meng-kong became famous by the great advantages which he obtained over the Mungls. He burned the magazines of provisions which they had at Ju-ning-fû in Honan: and the wood which they had laid up at Teng-chew, in the same province, for building barks; he likewise recovered the booty and slaves which they had made in Hû-quang, and secured in the city Swi-chew. After these great advantages he visited the frontier posts, and trained to war a great number of peasants, whom he furnished with arms and officers: in short, he had the glory to see all the countries between Se-chwen and the rivers Kyang and Han filled with husbandmen; who were in a condition to defend their lands, fill their magazines, and form, in a short time, bodies of troops.

Oktay fails sick. In February 1241, Oktay Khân, after a great hunting near the lake Kye-kye-chay-ha, was taken very ill: hereupon the empress Tolyekona, apprehending that he would not live long, sent a for the minister Yelu-Chû-tsay, to consult him on the occasion. Chû-tsay told her boldly, that the emperor had bad counsellors : that avarice reigned at court ; that employments were sold, and the prisons filled with honest men ; whose only crime was their disapproving of the unlawful means which were practised to get money ; while persons of no worth, and loaded with a thousand crimes, were in place. The empress took measures to free the prisoners, when her husband began to mend ; a general amnesty was published ; and in October the Chinese were allowed to become inferior Mandarins in the tribunals.

THE emperor loved wine passionately, and Chû-tsay had often warned him against it : but His death : although that prince took his advice as the effect of his zeal, yet he did not forbear the practice. In November the grandees invited him to a hunting ; and, contrary to the minister's remonstrances, he went. The fifth day, being come to the mountain U-lye kû-bûlan, he sat up all night drinking, by the persuasion of Gautû lauman ; which debauch cost him his life : for he died next morning, aged fifty-six, after a reign of thirteen years. He nominated for his heir and successor his grandson She-lye-men (A), the son of his third son Kû-chew, who died in Hû-quang, in 1236 ; as hath been before related.

OKTAY (or, as the Mungls call him, Ogotay) was a prince of courage, much prudence and greatness of soul. Yelu-Chû-tsay had inspired him with a love for the sciences, and application to the affairs of government. This Khân had a great authority over the princes, as well those of his family, as such who were his vassals : he loved good order, and had much integrity. his character :

OKTAY had several wives who bore the title of empress. The first, Polaba, of the house of Hong-kila (or Kongorat), by whom he had no issue. The second Gang-whey, who brought up prince Miengko (or Mangû), eldest son of Toley and (B) Sarkutra. The sixth was Tolyekona (C), a princess, who, besides the advantages of her person (D), was endowed with an uncommon share of wit and address. By his several wives he had seven princes (E) ; and one princess, married to the prince of Honkila ^{his wives :}.

THE western historians of Asia seem to have been but little acquainted with the actions of Oktay Khân, or his successors ; especially if we may judge by what has been communicated from them by European authors. Besides the remarks already inserted in the notes, we learn from them, that, in the year 1225, he sent Argun Aga into Kherassân, as governor ; and the Amîr Azzoddîn Mokaddem Herâwî, surnamed Jamebâf, to rebuild Herât, and cause the land to be again cultivated, in 1238 ^{great liberality.} : that Soltân Alao'ddîn, the Seljukian, who reigned at Konîyah, or Ikoniûm, in Anatolia, sent a celebrated embassy to congratulate him on his accession to the throne of the Mungls ; and that Oktay, in return for his civility, was pleased to offer him an employment in his palace ^{b} : which compliment Alao'ddîn did not at all relish. It is added, that this prince was so generous and liberal, that he bestowed more than ten millions of gold in presents ^{c}. We shall illustrate this part of his character, as well as his justice, by some instances related by Abû'lghazi Khân.

A POOR smith, having made six iron skewers, went to the market in order to sell them ; and, observing Ugaday Khân to pass by, held them up that he might see them. The Khân hereupon sent to ask what he meant by that motion ? The smith answered, that they were six skewers, which he had a mind to make him a present of. The Khân accepted of them ; and, in return, gave him so many dinârs, or crowns of gold. An instance.

AN indigent person, who had neither wives nor children, having waited on Ugaday, one day gave him to understand, that he had an inclination to fall into some little way of trade, but wanted money to carry it on. Hereupon the Khân ordered 200 dinârs of gold to be given him out of the treasury. Some court lords, who were present, would have dissuaded the Khân from this bounty, on a suggestion, that the man, having no family, the money, after his death, would pass to strangers. But Ugaday did not countermand the order ; saying, Another.

(C) This princess was of the tribe of Naymachîn, and is the same whom D'Herbelot, p. 358, calls Turakinah Khâtûn ; which last word is Mogul, and signifies queen, or empress. That author believes she was a Christian ; but the Chinese history says nothing of her religion : however that be, he is much deceived as to the time of her death, which happened in 1265, under the reign of Kûpilay (or Kublai). Gaubil.—D'Herbelot puts her death twenty years earlier.

(D) According to Abû'lghazi Khân, Oktay had four lawful wives : 1. Burakjin. 2. Taragana (mother of Kayuk), of the Markat tribe, according to some ; according to others, wife of a chief of the Virats : who being taken captive, and her husband slain, Oktay married her ; and loved her better than his other wives, although she was not very handsome. 3. Zazin, or Jajin. The name of the fourth is not known.

(E) La Croix affirms, the oriental historians make no mention of Oktay's children, excepting Keyûk, the eldest ; but Abû'lghazi Khân says, he had five, all by Turagana (or Turakina) : 1. Kayûk, who, during his father's life, resided in the country of Pamak, and was always in a languishing state of health. 2. Kutan. 3. Kuku, who was a promising prince, but died before his father. 4. Karazar, or Karajar. 5. Kâfî, so called because born at the time when Jenghîz Khân conquered Tangut. But as he gave himself up to excessive drinking, he died in the flower of his age.

" Since this man has implored my assistance, it would be unjust in me to send him away empty-handed, when it is in my power to help him." Hereupon he commanded the money to be paid him immediately ; adding, " Now have I done my part, he may die when it pleaseth God." In effect, the old man had scarce received the sum, before he fell down stark dead.

A third.

ANOTHER poor man, named Muffies, having complained to Ugaday Khân, that he had not wherewithal to support life ; he ordered 500 dinârs to be given him. When he had eaten out that money, he came again to see the Khân, and received 500 more. Those being spent, like the rest, he came a-new to implore the monarch's assistance. Hereupon the lords, who were then in waiting, chid him for daring still to importune the Khân for money, after he had received so much already : saying, it was unjust to give such a quantity to one man ; and that, considering how the cash already bestowed on him had been squandered, the treasury would not suffice to supply his expences long. But Ugaday finding, on enquiry, that he employed the sums he had received only in providing well for his back and belly ; he declared he could see no cause to reprimand the man so much ; and, at the same time, ordered 500 dinârs more to be given him : recommending to him, however, to be more frugal of them than he had been of the former thousand.

Instances of

ON a time, a man, belonging to the tribe of Virats (Oyrats, or Brats), who hated the Mohammedans exceedingly, came and told Ugaday, or Oktay, that Jenghiz Khân had appeared to him in a dream ; and commanded him to acquaint his majesty, that he would have all the Mohammedans in his dominions put to the sword. The Khân asked him, If Jenghiz Khân had spoken to him in person, or by an interpreter ? The man having answered, In person ; the Khân asked him again, If he could speak the Mungl language ? The Virat replied, that he could not. Upon this Ugaday said to him, " My father spoke no other language : how durst you then come to tell me, that he spoke to you ; seeing, that neither you understood his language, nor he yours ?" And having, in this manner, detected him in a lye, he ordered that his impudence should be punished with death.

ANOTHER time, Ugaday having forbidden the killing of sheep any other way than by striking a knife into the breast ; it happened that a Mohammedan, who had bought a mutton, carried it into his house, and privately cut the head off. A Mungl, who suspected what the Mohammedan intended to do, by the care he took to shut the door, got upon the house, to look down the chimney : and having, by that means, been witness to the fact, came down ; and seizing the man by the collar, carried him bound before the Khân. Ugaday, having well considered the affair, ordered the Mungl to be put to death, and the Mohammedan set at liberty : for this reason, that the latter, by taking all possible care not to be seen by any body, had, in effect, obeyed the law ; whereas the former had openly violated the law, by getting upon his neighbour's house without his knowledge^k.

The regency of Tolyekona ; and reign of Quey-yew Khân.

S E C T. I.

The regency of Tolyekona, or Turakina Khatûn.

*Chû-tsai's

AFTER the death of Oktay, the empress Tolyekona (A) caused herself to be acknowledged for regent of the empire at Karakorum, in spite of all the remonstrances of Yelu Chû-tsai ; who declared that She lye-men ought to be declared emperor, in obedience to his grandfather's will. But the empress rejected this proposal, under various pretences ; and knowing dextrously how to take advantage of the absence of the best generals, who were in China and the

(A) According to La Croix, the empress Turakina was sister to Soltân Jalâlo'ddin. Mem. de Trevoux, May 1711.—The Chinese history makes her of the Nay-machin tribe ; and she had Quey-yew in 1206 ; before

a well, she, by the support of her son Quey-yew, and several chiefs of tribes, governed the state with the authority of an emperor. Mean time she gave notice to the commanders who were in foreign parts, and sent them orders relating to the wars. This princess had a great deal of address, and knew how to gain the interest of the grantees. She particularly made use of the services of Gautu-lauman, the Whey-hu lord before-mentioned, who was much esteemed by her; and through her means had insinuated himself into the favour of her late husband. As this grandee managed the treasury, he furnished Tolyekona with a great deal of money; which she employed to pay the troops, make creatures, and dispose all parties to consent that her son should be emperor.

YELU CHU-TSAY, finding he only lost time in endeavouring to persuade the empress to a speedy enthronement of She-lye-men, attempted to remove Gautu-lauman from the ministry; by representing to her that the finances were out of order, and that every thing was done at Karakorum by dint of money. But, far from paying any regard to his remonstrances, Gautu-lauman gained a greater ascendant than ever in the mind of the empress, who besides was much esteemed by all the Mungls. Yelu Chü-tsai became so greatly chagrined to see himself as it were disgraced, after the figure which he had made in the state, that, taking it deeply to heart, he died two years after (B) at Karakorum, at the age of fifty-five. He dies with grief.

THIS great man was a prince of the Liau family, as the term Yelu in his name indicates. The first time he was brought before Jenghiz Khan, that prince asked him, "If he was not pleased to see his house revenged of the evils which it had suffered from that of the kin?" Chü-tsai answered, "That, in honour, he was obliged to be affected with the misfortunes of princes, to whom he had been much beholden, both in point of interest and honour." Afterwards, when become the Khan's prime minister, his whole study was to render his reign glorious. He was continually inspiring that prince, his children, and the Mungls in general, with an aversion to slaughter and pillage, as well as a love for the people, and good government. The pains which he took to reform the manners and dispositions of the Mungls cannot be sufficiently commended. He was their first master, and, as it were, their lawgiver: he made for them a kalendar, which he finished in Persia, after the conferences which he had with the mathematicians of that country. His character.

HE was well versed in the Chinese sciences and history; and possessed, in an eminent degree, the qualifications of a minister. He had a firmness of resolution not to be shaken, an extraordinary presence of mind, a vast knowledge of the countries subject to his master, discernment in the choice of persons, and sure resources for supplies of money and provisions on all emergencies. His zeal was purely disinterested; and he continually sacrificed his own advantages to those of the state. He was at great expence to procure the Mungls workmen, officers, and engineers, from all countries. At the taking of Ning-hya, capital of the Hya kingdom, the Mungls committed great disorders in plundering the city and palace of the king: Chü-tsai took for his part the geographical maps, the books, paintings, and several bales of rhubarb. The army, after this, being afflicted with a malignant fever, and other diseases, the minister became the physician, and, by giving rhubarb to the soldiers, saved their lives. great knowledge:

HIS zeal for advancing the sciences was very ardent. He rescued from death many thousand Chinese literati, and caused public colleges to be built; in which the Mungls were taught history, geography, arithmetic, and astronomy. He sent for learned men from the countries of the Igürs, Arabia, Persia, and other western regions; and ordered many books to be translated. It would be endless to enumerate all the great things which this sage minister did for the glory of his master, and happiness of the people. This appeared in nothing more sensibly than in his regulations with regard to the customs, commerce, the public granaries, and the subordination which he introduced among the Mandarins both civil and military. The natural ferocity of the Mungls, their ignorance, and the manner in which they had been educated, were great obstacles to the execution of his grand designs. He procured to be abolished the custom of selecting, at certain times, the most beautiful maidens for the emperor's palace. He was, with regard to himself, quite irreproachable. His sons and grandsons were educated by himself, and formed by his hand to the love of the sciences and virtue. One of his sons was particularly eminent that way; and, from his father's memoirs, composed the history of the kin and Liau. zeal for learning:

AFTER the death of Yelu Chü-tsai, Tolyekona, at the instigation of his enemies, had an enquiry made into his effects; but that enquiry filled them with confusion: they found only a small quantity of money, but a great number of volumes, written with his own hand, on history, astronomy, agriculture, government, and commerce. They likewise met with ancient coins, musical instruments, old books, and inscriptions, cut either on stones, marble, or metal. His disinterestedness.

(B) In March 1243.

He was very sedulous in his travels to amass these sorts of curiosities, instead of the immense riches which he might have acquired. Chû-tsay had many enemies, but the history (C) has done justice to him; and the Mungls, to this day, bestow on him the greatest eulogies. The remains of his tomb are still to be seen some leagues to the south-west of Pe-king. Let us now return to the Mungl affairs.

A brave
governor.

A. D. 1241.

In 1241, the Song generals, who had retaken Ching-tû-fû, the capital of Se-chwen, left there for governor a good officer, named Ching-long-chi: but Wang-shi-hyen (D) having been sent by general Tabay to besiege him; he was, after ten days brave defence, betrayed by an officer, who delivered up the city. Long-chi, being taken, was put in a chariot, and carried before Han-chew, a city in the same district, in order to oblige the governor to surrender: but, as soon as he became acquainted with their design, he cried out as loud as he could, to let that commander know, that he ought to die rather than surrender: on saying which words, he was immediately slain. After this, 3000 of the garrison sallied to attack the Mungls; but, being surrounded, were all put to the sword. Mean time Yue-lima-tse, a foreigner, but remarkable for his fidelity, was sent with a train of seventy persons to the Song, with proposals of peace: but, on his way through Hu-quang, he was stopped at Chang-sha, by the officer who commanded there; and when that lord could not be prevailed on, either by threats or promises, to enter into the Chinese service, the Mandarin imprisoned him in a fortress, where he died soon after, at the age of thirty-six: but Hû-pi-lay (or Koplay) Khân rewarded the son for the loyalty of his father.

Meng-kong's care.

A POTENT army, commanded by Yeko Noyen, a great Mungl lord, and Yelu Ko, a Kitân prince, having marched by the way of Si-gan-fû, capital of Shen-si, and entered Se-chwen, laid siege to Lû-chew. This news coming to the ears of Meng-kong, in the beginning of 1242, he caused the frontiers on the side of Hû-quang, which he guarded with great attention, to be examined; and, finding a city not well provided, according to his orders, cut off the governor's head. This example of severity made the other officers more vigilant; and it had been happy for the Song if all their generals had been of Meng-kong's character^b.

A. D. 1244.

Quey-yew declared Khân.

PRINCE Gan-chi-tay, who commanded at Tsi-nan-fû, had orders in 1244 to attack the Song on the side of Fong-yang-fû in Kyang-nan; and in July 1245, the generals Chang-jau and Chaban made incursions into that province, as far as Yang-chew. In the same month the empress Tûrakinab, or more properly Tolyekona, having convened a general assembly of the grandees and princes, by her intrigues got her son Quey-yew to be declared Khân; and, soon after his installation, the princes Patû, Mengko, with the general Sûpûtay, Mangkûsar, and others, arrived at Karakorum, after an absence of several years. Their first expedition was to the north of the Caspian, where Mengko defeated a prince called Pacheman; who was taken and slain, as he was flying to one of the islands in that sea. After this expedition, they marched against the Oltse (or Russians), took the city of Tuli-tse-ko, and sacked that of Ye-li-tsan; in both which they met with a very great resistance. Then they ravaged the country of Ye-lye-pan, made a road over the mountain Atsali, took the country of Machar (E), and vanquished king Kyo-lyen. Being advanced to the river Kon-ning, a great battle was there fought, in which the Mungls were beaten. Upon this ill success Patû and Mengko were for retiring; but Sûpûtay kept up the courage of those princes.

Conquests in west.

Death of *Sû-
pûtay*.

THE news of Oktay's death made them resolve to return; and they arrived at Karakorum towards the end of the year 1246. Not long after, Sûpûtay died at the age of thirty-seven, lamented by all the princes of the imperial family; and especially by the Mungl officers who had served under him. The history remarks, that the army commanded by this general, Patû, and Mengko, entered a country whose inhabitants had blue eyes and fair hair: that the days, at the summer solstice, were very long; and that they had scarce any night at that season. We know that this, and other armies of the Mungls, ravaged Russia, Poland, Moravia, Bohemia, Austria, and Hungary: but it is difficult to discover the names which are given to those countries in the Chinese history, which speaks of them in so concise and confused a manner^c.

S E C T. II.

The reign of Quey-yew, or Kayûk Khân.

- a THE emperor Quey-yew (A) having had a very great respect and tenderness for his mother The Bonzas Tolyekona, that princess had the greater share of government in her hands. Ching-hay, encouraged. and Gautû-lauman, before-mentioned, were his chief counsellors (B); and it is under this Khân that the Chinese history begins to speak of the extraordinary credit which the Bonzas of the west (C) had at the Mungl court; whereas during the reigns of Jenghîz Khân and Oktay Khân, neither the Bonzas nor Lamas were employed in affairs. Among the occidental Bonzas were two brothers, born in (D) Chû-kyen (or Kashmîr), the elder named Wa-to-chi, the younger Namo. They were both very learned in the doctrines of Fo, and loved by the emperor: who gave the former a gold seal, which he wore at his girdle; and sent him as commissioner over the empire, to examine into the distresses of the people.
- b IN September this year the Song empire received one of the greatest losses which could have Meng-kong happened to it, in the death of general Meng-kong. He was a native of Tsau yang, a city in dies. the district of Syang-yang in Hû-quang. From the time of the war in Ho-nan, the Mungl commanders held him in great account for his valour and knowlege in military affairs. Wherever he had occasion to fight the Mungls, he defeated them. A series of considerable actions, with a great neglect of pleasures and riches; much liberality, as well as assiduity, to comfort the poor officers and soldiers, joined to a thorough knowledge of the places where he made war, and this supported by an extraordinary degree of intrepidity and activity, gained him a high reputation among the Chinese and Tatars. He was withal learned, and delighted to read the ancient book Iking (E).
- c THE kingdom of Korea having refused to pay tribute to the Mungls, in 1247 Quey-yew Korea hum- sent thither an army, which obliged the king not only to submit to that imposition, but like- bl. d. wise to receive commanders appointed by the Mungls. The history says very little concerning A. D. 1247. the reign of this Khân, or his actions either in China or Tartary; and although it speaks of an army sent by him into the west, yet it neither mentions what it did there, nor the country to which it was destined.
- IN March 1248 (F), the emperor Quey-yew died, at the age of forty-three, in the country Death of of Hong-syang-i-eul (G). He had by the empress Wauli-hamish, named by the western Asiatic Quey-yew. writers Ogulganmish (H), three sons and two daughters. No mention is made of the actions of the three princes (I). The eldest of the princesses married the prince of the Pe-Tata (or white Tata), descended from Alakus, mentioned in the reign of Jenghîz Khân. The younger was married to the grandson of Stûgû, prince of Turfan.
- d AFTER his death, the empress Wauli-hamish (K) governed the empire; and, whether by Empress Wau- order li regent.

(A) Called Gâyûk, or Kayûk, by the Persian and Ta- rar historians.

(B) It does not appear on what grounds La Croix affirms, that the two first ministers of Keyûk Kéân were Christians; nor can Gaubil tell what to think of Christians being spread through Tartary, and the court of the Mungls. It is certain, that the Chinese have often considered, as western Bonzas and Mohammedans, the Christians whom they have seen among them; and, notwithstanding all that has been said by the above-mentioned author, D'Herbelot, Le Chaise, in the life of St. Lewis, Marco Polo, and others; yet, when matters come to be compared and weighed, one must needs adhere to what is related in the Chinese history. Gaubil.

(C) These are the Lamas, or priests of Tibet: called of the west, to distinguish them from the Chinese priests of Fo; who are simply named Bonzas by the Portugueses, and Ho-sheng by the Chinese.

(D) The country of Kashmîr, the most northern province of the Mogul empire in India — It is in the history expressly said to be Kashmîr. Gaub.

(E) One of the classical books among the Chinese, explained by Kong-fû-tse, or Konfusius.

(F) The year of his death is marked in the history by that of the ape; and it is certain, that his death happened in 1248. Gaubil. Frier Rubruquis could never learn the circumstances of this prince's death, whom he calls Kan Khân. One Frier Andrews told him, it was occasioned by the poison given to him by Baatu's orders: others said, that Baatu, being sent for to court, and being afraid, sent his brother Stitchin before; and, while he presented Ken Khân the cup at table, a quarrel arising between them, they slew each other. Purch. Pilgr. vol. iii. p. 23, & seq. — Monkish lies, or ignorance.

(G) Others say, in Whey-mi-sye-yang-ki-eul. Its situation is not marked; but it could not be far from Karakorum. Gaub.

(H) So we find her named in D'Herbelot, p. 358, of his Biblioth. orient.

(I) Nor, it seems, of their names. La Croix says, the oriental historians make no mention of Keyûk's children; yet Abû'lghazi Khân, p. 157, says, he left three sons, Kheja, Ogul, and Bagu, born of the same mother, named Khamish (doubtless the Haymish of the Chinese, and Gannish of the Persian historians). He adds, that Bagu, had a son called Oku; and Oku, ten sons. Both this author, and La Croix, put Kayûk's death in 1246.

(K) The history blames Key-yew for not having governed by himself; for giving too much power to his mother, and the great men, as well as favouring too much the Bonzas of the west; but praises him for his liberality and his courage in the wars. He commanded in chief the armies sent against Korea; and conquered the country of Asû, near the Caspian sea. Gaub. — order of her husband, or of her own accord, she resolved to cause prince She-lye-men to be declared emperor, pursuant to the appointment of the emperor Ogotay. Her regency was not very happy. Prince She-lye-men, who wanted nothing of the emperor but the name, made very little account of the grandees and princes; giving access to none of them, but such as his mother, the empress dowager, the empress Wauli, and the empress Tolyekona, thought fit. People complained loudly that the court was too expensive in jewels and precious stones, which they purchased dear of the Wbey-bû (L.) merchants; and that the subjects were continually forced to furnish horses to the lords, who rode post day and night. Mean time the drought and mortality among the cattle had reduced many countries to famine; and there was not money to pay the great armies which were on foot. At length the empress regent agreed with the princes and great lords to hold a general assembly at Ho-lin (or Karakorom), in the beginning of the year 1251.
